With each step he died once. His body fell through him, giving him a sight of a single day, through which he moved through, seeing himself live through a different body than the last one, which had strangely come, through all the tracks, sometimes molding itself or opening the doors as he moved back and forth into the room of gore, until he took his place into the pavillion of many lights that started coming. It was a distater he couldn’t avoid. He had been given something as the creature abandoned his guise of cloth.

‘You’re not a priest.’

‘And you have never been a servant of the one.’

He revealed his malignant form, almost gargoyle-like in the sand-like torn body that came after, through some barreling wonder of many attuned cuirass belts which dragged his skin as it never ended in the fall. But it was too late, as this trickster, this mad being cursed Ringer in the end. He couldn’t happen to get away from all those who entered him and took his place. Though he kept his mind, the man never looked the same. When the time had come for the warden to return back to life, he had finally succumbed to the wonder of spying, through the cutting, the butcher’s work had to be enacted by him in order to get rid of him now and for all.

‘I’ll make sure to batter your head in a termite’s bed.’

‘You won’t do this, you shouldn’t be capable of breathing. I saw you die, I saw you wither away.’

‘But you have never given me a single killing blow, I see. You have only come to think of me as a disease you could’ve dealt with. Stricken down and made to have been used around before the melting.’

‘How do you now of the furnace? That’s off the limits for all of the living beings, especially for the inmates before their time had come and before they could be burnt alive.’

‘Ah, but I see that you have failed to realise something about me. I have never been a part of it and I have never considered become the disease you call this place.’

The complex has never taken over my mind. I have faced its perils, stood against confusion and have come to accept it for what it is. In turn, I see that I am to live forever at the bottom of its halls, never to return once my time is done.’

He felt nothing as he said, as a matter of function, he could feel nothing either for lost days. He would keep up to the promise of broken days and see to it that he shall never convey no other emotion out in the open, not where he might be seen. For now he settled with this as well.

‘I shall make you suffer you little insolent creep!’

But the warden had barely any strength to come back up. His worming body, his serpentine form only showed close signs of rotting and lacerations, which only ended when needed. It couldn’t be thought, he couldn’t be alive for long. Now he suffered what he had promised to do upon Keyringer himself, past the making and into the beheading.

Many of his leg-simian replicas had been stumped upon, despite his incredible assault at the man who appeared or who would appear to be breaking them one by one. He couldn’t stand the scent, thence he ripped a few bodies out of his way, throwing them into the well of the blood making and drowning some of the little glancers that loomed around.

Ah, I see that there are others just like me who had managed to get through unscathed. I shall make a great deal out of all of them, or so he thought. For some reason he had been satisfied, without trying to pry in and make for one of the many exits. Since the first crushed skulls managed to stunt the warden, he came closer and pulled one of the many lumps across the body. For some reason, there was no satisfaction. He was only fighting a lepper who had done nothing but attempt to defend itself through the days of the taking and the making of the armament of evil which loomed through.

‘I see what you have done there, and I can only ask this.

Have you prepared for something while I was out?’

In the midst of the asking, one great hand had almost crushed his entire body in, right before he could get away. Just as the romm, the warden and everything else flashed inside, with all the colors that might come, another body appeared in his place. It had to be earned, this darkness looming inside of him as well as the blood-letting quietness after the infection needle-like substance thrust in. Pain would loom around, he could do nothing more than shout in dark. He waited, then stood like a guard. He couldn’t wait for long enough until he came back to life.

‘I breathe through a new set of lungs, I see through a whole new different face. What am I?’

Ringer asked, but none had answered. There was no way back after doing this. They would know where to find you.

‘And what is logic if not the lack of common sense?’

It could not be distinguished from what else went around then, headless baloon-scalps floated around the lower mazes, in the needle-racks of the bowel tracks where the other trams walked forever. Since the main tram had been partially molded inside one of the sutured pieces of the wall, in a time which still loomed around like dirt in a moving pool of water, the stream had revealed as much.

Below the floor the tram emerged and moved in a partially distinct almost cellular, ambiguous cocoon-like form, where the passangers were barely being born by the minute, unable to breathe properly yet very much alive in some form or another.

There were only a few other margins of error, which crept in the head.

‘I see the colors of the rainbow, there’s a conk inside one of them.’

‘And what does it say of the sky?’

‘It tried telling me that it’s all dead, deceased, the garen can no longer hold the rainbow from being bloated with the disgusting colors.’

They watched but couldn’t feel. It lost its appeal as soon as they found themselves staring at the dancer, in their most morbid nuanced feet. Some of them were cut and unable to look after each other before the realisation came that they had beaten each other over the head. Some of them were evenly placed inside dead-rows of fully grown pinpointed sights, the criminals ate each other in disgust, without being aware they ran in dead circles, no one was to blame.

‘I see that it is time to accept it.’

But there was not a single man present there.

Another stranger came in. Some of the rules were present even before they had been made aware of them. Two men walking in squared, the insides of the facility was completely made out of bodies which replaced the wall.

‘I have done it!’

Shouted the one Jackal-man who came out of nowhere, unable to look in no direction, while feeling his blood remain in pints that couldn’t be drank. They hurled themselves over and couldn’t comprehend missing a single man oer’ the world. He had testified against the kindness of a mind and the world of uncut soldiers that followed with their guns.

Half bodies coming through, most of them being long since hybridized in order to make it through the new world, one without fear or pain, in which they would remain for as long as they were needed to continue the living. In darkness, they were bold. Old but mistakenly shoved inside each level which had been tramped and fallen forth. There, in a corner, a hole had lain for days. The Jackal-man ran towards it and leaped it.

‘The mondo-man had done it. He had thrown himself it.’

Guttural noises entered and ran up the pace. It was the time of the day for the man without a face to show himself and look for no survivor. Out of the hole, the Jackal-mans gut threw themselves out, from a round-about of many teeth, the rows had turned him into a wild disease. Yet none for nothing, they couldn’t spare to wait a second more before they drew in to check for him.

There had to be more there but they were hiding it in plain sight. Some numbers written on all the collums and the peculiar towering stone structures that were curved along the bottom steps and the peculiar tower heads which spiked around the meallic collar around which they started pushing in.

There was no reason to fight the waves, not without the risk of burning. They were in the open now, a tiny portion of their cage exposed, from a point where air appeared to come out of. It was decently lighted, enough for a tiny dog to draw near the edges.

It was obvious enough that no one wanted to look at it, yet they wondered what was wrong. Some sight could be even more docile, yet they broke everything from sight. In only a few moments they saw the dog fly in both directions before spreading away by the wings of a bloated cat. Behind them, a spine-hero emerged. He flew with large backpacks-growth in his back.

A vision of him eating them quickly turned their guts inside out; since most of them didn’t understand what the reason for it was. There, in the distance.

One of them pointed.

Despite being together for so long, they felt as if they were simple nomads searching for better pastures. They would milk the throngs, not to faint. One of the men woke up from the sleeping stillness he had been stuck in for hours. He did not know how to look at the world any longer, since it had been vaguely If nor only permanently disabled to his eyes. Still were moving across the walls, images he couldn’t grasp on. He was mental, he had gone through the break and his mind was nowhere near anything which might be clinically right. There, he poked one of his fingers but infamy started protruding his fingernails out like the keys. Still beating as the player hid himself inside the complex. They've been made aware of him, somewhere in the past, but in reality, who hasn't. Not a single soul appeared to have forgotten of his existence. And he was a pale thing, which only crept in every now and then, his song being tainted or stopped by missing fingers.

'It stopped again.'

'Stop looking after the dog and come on already, we got somewhere else to be.'

The men from the prison avoided the warden. This time around, the warden had been completely set on its tail, almost hanged as his head was dripping down, the hole of a giant blow given to a mellow leaving nothing but some rounded edges that were plainly round inside his skull. He wasn't releasing any blood but some kind of hardened pair of atoms which only now appeared to come into full motion as they produced the meat-sleighs. A man touched one of them, it was clear now. After all this time he was fully dead, and no amount of materialisation could change it.

'There's no infection here.'

'I said stop looking at the dog.'

'Did you hear what I said?'

'Of course I have, but what about the others? They keep obsessing which that piece of a dog which had been eaten.'

For our god damn sake, just move on, can't you see he's trying to lure you in and eat your bodies as well? I can't be the only one with half a common sense here.'

It was much worse to begotten, as they couldn't fathom staying for too long. It was way too risky now, especially since they came after. Tall and embroidered, somewhat stagnatingly morose; as a matter of fact they ripped themselves with not being able to breathe for long periods of time, through which there was only this strange actor which appeared out of nowhere. Right outside the gates, this obese strut, long-armed almost-man, he came out of nowhere with a weird baton. Before long, he started wailing down on the first of us who wanted to cross the gate and finally make it to freedom. We were unaware of something happening.

Already, by the time we have realised it, something started creeping in. The sick-soul of a sole lonely pride, coming out of the man who was beaten head-on; which told us not to interfere.

'I can take him all by myself.'

He said with an unmet confidence which made him ever so sure that he could get away with it. He waited, as did the others. Quickly enough on their feet, they started tapping into which direction, trying to get something close to a reaction. It wouldn't normally go well for him, he had to match their sound-liquors before prodding in. They were plain, in their quarrel.

As soon as he got the upper-hand on him, grabbing the baton, he slimly grazed the fat-man's knee off, making him stumble before he rolled into a wild direction.

‘Come on already, we got to get as far as we can before they catch us.’

‘There’s no one else to catch us here.’

‘Pointer, Dull, stop looking at that hole in the wall, can’t you see that it’s shrinking?’

At least the very size of it appeared to be completely ebbed into a direction. Manno could swear that was the case. It couldn’t go the other way around.

Seeing for too long. He had a deep desire to go blind which stretched as far as his nerves went. It could only work so easily as he was set on it. His fingers were bent, he was starving like a dog, yet he couldn’t concentrate on anything else but those wild pieces of architecture which started throwing themselves away. Something was stuck in the walls. Some great-on-look left him staring at a giant simian, lightly glowing creature which appeared ever-so slightly deformed by the very stones which intruded in its face and body.

He dared not come close, instead, he chose to walk away with the others, only to be met by the same image which would be projected just about in whichever place he could look again. His eyes were somewhat still caught by the ebbing of some distress that crept in. His neck was in need of strangulation. Boren knew this. It was an unhealthy thought, but he had doubted the others would understand.

Though he himself failed to look at the connection the others had with him. Especially since the other members of their pass had never stopped seeing that hole either. And the canine was still moving around, whoever that devourer being, couldn’t be seen. It was, undoubtedly the only thing he could spare, a look, he wanted to be there, to climb and come closer to the pup. I could save him, he thought. Though he relentlessly hadn’t even considered the fact that it was perilous, to even leave the tiny mutt dripping on his face.

‘Snap out of it, you imbecile!’

‘What, what happened?’

Despite not seeing any hole in the ceiling, he had seen that piece of dog which had dripped on his face. Somewhat molded now, this had become a permanent piece of his face, right around the cheek where the teeth growled and the nose sniffer and two almost formed eyes blinked. Yet they weren’t completely formed, and appeared to force the jaw to open in order to account for the glow. A green-cherub crystal with a yellowish pus inside of it, to the epitome of a dark iris appeared to be creeping right in the back, tinted by some unfathomable color he couldn’t dare lay eyes upon.

Inside of it, there was only one simple finger which belonged to him.

For the likes of him, he couldn’t understand how it had gotten there to begin with. As a matter of fact, he had been just as disturbed as they had been after looking around.

‘We’re in a glass of jar!’

Pointer seemed to believe. Despite there being no signs to conclude what his suspicions were, he had clearly made a cut against his wrists.

‘Stop it, you’re going to.’

Boren had been struck by this wild insomniac gas which came out of his wrist. The lack of blood was the first thing that gave it away, instead, there being nothing more but oil. A lot of it started pumping out until there was nothing that worked any longer. He was too struck by it to realise that there would be no way to breathe through the air any longer. Not without the burning pain which accompanied it.

‘What did you do to us?’

‘It’s simple, I inflicted a lung-disease upon all of you, out of the bottom of my red-cells. Are you seriously surprised by it?’

‘Of course I’m not, it’s just that I didn’t expect any of this to happen.’

‘I didn’t expect it to happen either, not until he told me, you know, the time he was around me.’

‘And who would that be?’

His eyes were orange, there were no irises any longer. A white-blind, yolk-embded, close to being pale appeared to constantly churning inside. It was clear that he wasn’t right in the head any longer. Neither of us were, which lead us to this point in it.

Before we knew it, we were done for. Touched, or not, unable to get out of our way to life the Crane that fell on us.

While running out, across the hall, he simply tackled me and broke eight ribs.

‘Stop him before he kills us all.’

But the others had little chance against the man, as he only started creeping out and pushing in without daring to come a finger out of his pouring eye-cave. He was not human, at least not in the traditional sense, and his strength held no boundaries, not even as close as the pain he took pleasure, in some sick way in shaping their bodies and cradling them as they started giving into the animals they were being turned into. Alas, he left, choosing to spare Boren. An only man, as a sold survivor, with the pay being given in meat; as from the emerging hole above them, the sinew-hero came out, like a vile demon who flew in and started eating the animals he had made out of man. We couldn’t be spared of the sight, we couldn’t dare look back or even hope there’d be a shot at making it through.

It came as no surprise that they were not in the midst of butcher’s play, but they listened to the analogue clock as it conveyed the end of another day.

Next one, a few scream woke up whichever hick happened to be around.

Hard to tell who was alarmed by it and who was only faking it to draw the pity out of the outer craddles which inhabited the soulless ground they walked upon.

Still no one to talk to, or have a normal conversation; it was pitiful trying to continue this way.

Pitiful, that’s what it looked like.

‘We should go.’

‘Where to? If we take left, we might only go in circles, if we go right.’

‘Then we’ll walk in circles if we need to Christine. Stall for as much time as possible if we can help it, or at least, if I can help it.

I work better when there’s enough time to come up with something.’

‘Will you at least let me lead the way?’

I was about to say that I don’t know if we can walk into circles in this place to begin with. It changes.’

‘What does?’

‘It’s hard to explain Ringer. It’s not the walls or the ground or the doors or the details. Call it a bad feeling, but I think it’s simply changed. As in already done with.

We’re no longer in the same spot as we used to be a few days ago.’

Or years, but she didn’t know about that, she couldn’t know about it in any case. If there was something they could both agree on, it was that this place was a mess. Some days were even worse than others; minutes at a time when no one could ever look onto something without disagreeing on. But neither of us said a thing.

That tube and that strange vase weren’t supposed to be outside the cage. Neither of us were, and most importantly, I was not myself. But I looked like it, all ten fingers moved perfectly in motion.

It was out of question, staying there for the night, yet she insisted on it.

A small slip erupted; an entry into a wicked world.

Like every infirm creature out there, it could only look into one direction. Most of them were rabid sons, nothing more, nothing inside them working properly. Constant organ failure could be clearly observed inside of them; all but one appeared to survive one of the clear passings through the after-life, if that’s what it could be called.

On a first note, there was something which needed to be said about the spoils of their insides. They were clearly trying to push themselves inside the wall, seeking constant warm. Needless in their attempts, another one approached, before he came inside the house.

This one was weirded, far more peculiar than the other, bloated, even fatter, despite them having observed and come to no conclusion whatsoever. Their minds were missing in some way, blasted inside their ribs, with some extra meaty reeding bits that never went away. And their malignant bodies kept churning and twisting despite them showing little to no emotion coming from the bloated surroundings. A common likeness could be seen or shared, it was damaging, all that wait. Obnoxious tendons kept pushing out of their heads, which took away from them whatever means they could find on feeding. It went over the wet sinking plum beings which crept inside the other fakes.

Some of them were confused, each of them refused to move out of the small pits which had been created by the constant digging of their large malignant paws, most of which retracted once the change happened. Not a single doubt remained, not one of them could survive by the time he would return to check on them. He wasn't one of the leftovers, but the new tormentor who came after. Constantly, he snapped and wailed, seeing how the peculiar bodies had no way to defend themselves, let alone remain in their dented dens, behind the fences and into the strange homes they put together for themselves. It felt uncanny, trying to wait for someone.

At times, there was the song, but it wasn't the same.

No, it would not even appeal to him. To take care of them would be too much of a bother, not to mention that, he had other better things to look for. In the nearest alcove, he started tainting the land.

Blorhr, a named amphibious, almost pile-like being, the one who had all of his limbs removed away from him, as he called himself, moved on his own with tiny legs that didn't belong to him. Acquired in the passing, he could only carry them for so long before giving them away.

Others had to feed. He couldn't hope to pass the opportunity to be tainted or be called for in the passing. He would be mad if he'd do it. And it couldn't go either way.

'You know you could always land me an arm, right?'

'Of course I know that, but you know I'm not doing anything here, do you?'

Look around you, we're dying by the hands.'

'How would you know what one looks like?'

There was the hook, which started spilling steel inside his veins. He couldn't help it, of course he had to ask and pity himself while doing so.

So many things passed the ear. No one could be blamed for the creeping-ghoulish figures that fell through the grates. Too many things were taken for granted, it couldn't be believed either, going through each pass, each fall and trying to make out who were the ones that survived. Every moment appeared to make a difference, no matter how hard, yet peculiar one looked into it.

'I want to die down there, if you don't mind.'

'I can only make your passing so much easier, but you must know that there will be some pain, regardless of the reason for you choosing this place, I will stay with you until you'll be able to breathe in no longer.'

'I shall appreciate your courage and bring with me as many of the other-ones in the afterlife as we greed you on the way to the Eet.'

'That shall be, brother, that shall be.'

He placed himself as humbly as he could, then he laid low for a while. It was weird, how their bodies contorted, but he could say nothing of the kind. Otherwise, he would appear to be rude. And that wasn't something he looked forward to, especially after being so close to someone's end. It was crude, bluntly put in hase, as the swollen fists of a boxer's ending match would act upon delivering the final uppercut. He was skinny, too tainted. Shaking or being shaken as he started pushing himself out of the way.

'I suppose this is farwell now.'

'I suppose it is.'

That was enough, between the two of them, there was nothing which would allow them to make peace now. He simply left this world without a final breath, but a tiny slurr, as he melted in a matter of seconds. He would be untouched and uneaten, as no one else dared draw near Blorhr.

Despite his ancient age of eight hundred, he still had something on them. All those limitations and he couldn't draw a single finger off his own throat. It went through his head, at least several time that he would not know how to react if he were the next one in line. Could it be, then?

A second more and he might've missed it; but he was there just in time to witness the slight hinge which lay behind one of the gates. The other, despite their misshapen nature, their lack of eyes meaning nothing to beings who sensed and moved around their prodding mess only felt reassured of what they've done. They lived just long enough to see the prodding of some robust-looking disgusting tendond-shaped reptile-like creatures they could feed on. And most joyfully, they were dumped in masses. So much more could be taken now, near their delight.

But he chose to ignore the feeding, knowing better than to throw himself at the first sign of greatness. What they others didn't expect, at least not since they were starved was the fact that so many of them would simply die unless properly treated. And that had been something neither of them could deal with. It went through their pseudo-wings, they went away. It was dreadful, they were paranoid, afraid, after a while.

Since they made away with what they had, they could not wait longer.

It was a tight-lock, which snapped itself back into place. There was still that problem no one wanted to have to deal with. Short out of breath, he decided to fall back and question what happened around him.

Some of them came near, caressing one another out of the desire for heat.

After ignoring their pleas, he chose to approach some familiar shape. Chaffed around the throat, he would only look at it from whichever direction without trying to take in the brith for too long. Everyone looked the same, but there was something which distinguished their disfigured grayish-morbid bodies. It was hard to say. They looked even more different with each step which completely threw the hurricane of bones and organs inside their sack-like skin. No one bothered to think or use their wild cognition. They would be even more damned if they waited for long enough to scratch each other's backs. Then they came to a stop.

After internally hemorrhaging for at least twenty minutes, they started pushing it out and making noise. Another group appeared, dangerous, a lack of emotion clear enough for them not to care for what was going around their surroundings. Understanding the fact that there was no escape left with little choice in the matter; making everything all so mechanical, that it could not be perceived as anything other than an absurd trap, a hole or part of the giant faced yet toothless buildings to lay there, housing if not nurturing most of his kin back to life. Every now and then, they moved, though by all accounts, only a few creatures managed to get a grasp of a few tiny legs which could walk on nothing else but carpet-burns as they carried an unfathomable amount of weight underneath their belt. Desperation set in, confined to this spot, some brutes, as they could be called nothing else started terrorizing one another out of the veil of terror they began spreading inside the enclosed walls. Filth spread amuck, but that wasn't to be taken for granted, nor could it be plainly ignored simply because it was there and it spread across the walls. In it, there was knowledge, there was some power which hid itself from the blind yet to be kind members of blotches, their skin ever-pouring out. But never had he considered what he was about to do now. In the blindness of a quick eye, when no one was paying any awareness, this one blotch, necrosis-like toe that he looked like in some manner, this decayed sea-horse sack started opening his long trunk face as he began eating the toxic pieces of fluttering mass which was dripping around his mouth.

Dreadful as it were, he could not confine himself to anything else, much more to some creeping taste which poisoned him immediately, without even having to travel through his convoluted body in one piece. He started seeing the high unseeable patches through which he promptly got through. This time around he wouldn't end up being one of the bodies, instead he turned towards the strange house he lived in for so long and spat on the floor. Looking back arrogantly no more, out of his own desire to make a ruse. He had lost his mind and played a flute song out of his insides, then he walked away.

'Another escapee, I see, do not worry about it, this happens ever so often.'

Were he to come much sooner, he would've found himself beaten if not strangled in the worst possible manner. But that had nothing to do with their lives there. This was the first outsider he lay sight upon. Strangely, he wasn't any different than anyone he had ever seen before. As a matter of fact, he was plain, almost too plain for him to form a conclusion about him. Hence, he greeted him back.

'May I be sent into the right direction?'

'Nonsense, there's not such thing as a wrong or a right way to go. You only switched to a bigger cell, you haven't escaped your prison yet.'

Though it looked, certainly out of which direction, in some manner of speaking, it looked less than something which could be described as crude or vulgar. Giant bone-hands, peculiar stalk-like faces with leaking tongues and exposed ribcages inhabited the place. And that thing was eating yet another, smaller-headed green colored, almost poignant weak-man. Around the place, the lights were sparse, yet the houses appeared to be all the same in whichever direction he decided to look towards.

'Is there nothing more then?'

'There's plenty of space for you to stretch your innards, but be aware that it all comes at a very ill-defined price. Set forth and end up feeling pain and disappointment knowing that you will have returned here all the same. I have set this journey forth, during a time when I had been in the same body as yours.'

Though I cannot say what might happen to you precisely, since you appeared to be of much particular weakness, I can only tell you this.

Be weary of whom you talk to as this outside world feeds us air.'

He felt it, just as he said it. With every breath he felt hunger no longer. It was pleasant, being saved of that dreadful feeling of starvation, which ever gnawed on him from the bowels of his body. Clearly he was there waiting for someone, but he didn't ask.

Blorh started dragging himself backwardly. It was the new way of transporation here. Somehow it was safer than anyhting he dared touch, but this place was filth and he was corrupt.

A pocket-watch appeared on the ground.

On this basis alone, he decided to walk forth and ask for common directions.

He was still with her, though it was clear that something about the complex wasn't right. At least not in the main artery they were in. Not after what happened there.

'I wish I could take you somewhere warmer.'

'Had a change of thought now? I thought you would remain.'

'It's not that. I feel as if I've grown accustomed, yet I'm sickened of this place. I can't explain it just yet.

Suppose you did put it in the best way possible, what then? Should I simply admit that there's no escape from this place any longer? Will I be trapped in another strange part of the complex?

I don't know what to believe any longer.'

'You know I only tried helping you, right?'

'When it ought to have been the other way around.'

She smiled and nodded. Christine was different, perhaps not in the same way this place was, but different nonetheless. It would be crude, much more so to push deeper into it. He was out of the place and back in. Though that thing was much harder to expalin, as, his mind got clearer, the more stationary he became. And that was a good thing, since what happened outside the bridge only appeared in his mind now, like a quick recall, a reminiscence of it going on, replaying like a broken tape which wouldn't let in. Out there it was snowing and by now, he stopped trying to rescue Filler. As he finally leaped inside the frozen river, he stooped a moment to look forth.

The constant blasting of snow would soon enough become a storm. That would take away whatever beauty still laid in the place. Leaves of snow, acres of plummage made in white, the lake painted in light. He could not see those things anywhere else and for once he considered staying, for as long as it would take him to move on from his eventual death.

There was no way to win here. Leap in the ice-cold water, hypothermia would much sooner hit you. It had to go one way or another. No one wanted to chip the ice that formed around the frozen iron beds. Ringer had been sleeping for the last twenty minutes before he rose. His feet were cold, but not enough to stop.

'How long have I been out for?'

‘Just as usual; but you shouldn’t worry about it. Things like these happen more than a few times around, you’ll get used to it.’

‘I’ve never grown used to it during my entire stay here.’

Some doubt could be seen on her face. It only paled in comparison to the strange drop of insides that started pushing out of the cove. She had an open chest. Her body was made out of some immaterial rock, grayed on the inside, almost clay-like, turned with a white-coated, almost light grayish wound that pushed out of her. Christine wasn’t well, at least not in the same way she used to be. She didn’t act like it any longer and chose many to keep to herself until the breaks happened.

Her heart pounded from time to time. It was audible, like the beating of a drum set. Important note, it could just as well be seen as it pumped outside her chest, like a yanking ball which kept expanding until it was no longer of any use. There was that constant fear he had that she might suffer of a stroke, but he’s never taken the liking of telling her. It was way too dangerous.

That went over his head, close to it at least. And he asked her just as quickly.

‘What happened to you?’

‘I’ve had an encounter with my brother while you fainted.’

‘He’s the one who’s done that?’

‘Not exactly, but it was there before he decided to approach me.’

She opened her blouse. It was no hole but merely a large opening which expanded downwardly. It formed a strange scar which dug too deeply. She looked like the work of a clay sculptor who was driven mad by the beauty he created and decided to ruin her. A clear view revealed that this gash went as well as to release everything down to the very soles of her feet. Nothing could be said about her as she soon covered herself up.

‘This’ been going on for a while now?’

‘Longer than I expected, but at least I was spared by my brother.’

This time around in any case, as for the previous round, he still had a good view of her lifeless body. From that he could never escape. And no amount of wishful thinking would do him well. He relented. Now came the question.

‘Are you alive?’

‘Not any longer, as you can see.’

A tiny slither of desperation in her glimmer, she did not enjoy talking about it. Sparingly, at least with every second, she decided to walk in whichever direction and ask nothing from the lifeless ones that stared about. So many open doors, yet their rooms were empty. It disturbed Ringer who wanted to look for more.

Blue was somewhere beyond the watch. He walked with Charles, both of them having made the pass, walking over it for the longest time possible. This was the uniformed man of Ultramarine, so had he been called at least. The farther they got from the watch, the lousier had his strange shades become. Within every blue there was an oyster, and within every oyster, no pearl but the sea spilled away.

His pockets were wet.

Behind them, a trail of water. Still, that claustrophobic feeling appeared to dictate their precise actions as they would push this road on both sides, seeing it extend before them.

‘There, I think that would be a good start.’

A house among the crimson-orange road, it was just in the color of Blue. An open door invited them, but before that there came the man of Sinew, hero of eated canines and felines, who took a liking in disturbing people.

‘You’re not from around the place. How did you make it past the watch?’

This contorted bone-faces, face impaled face only spoke nonsense when he didn’t like being inquired of. He approached with a small bone-knife and a battle-suit which was made out of cats. They still made their desired noises, and appeared to have eyes of green crystals.

‘I’m the first one who came here. I claim the first right to enter the house.’

‘Friend, you’d better drop the knife if you know what’s right for you. I’m not going to repeat that again.’

He pulled out what appeared to be the most gorgeously crafted gun Charles had ever seen, made out of some peculiarly shaped quartz, yet likely to function by the looks of it, although he had no need to inquire of it any more than he should. It would work.

A few steps away from the ensuing fight. Mostly because he planned on escaping if things went down south.

‘Drop it, I said. I’m not going to give you a second warning.’

First warning shot appeared to shoot a blue, almost phosphorescent bullet which claimed the like a small cat. Not in the least, as it ran away and scared the others, the man of the sinew was exposed. He held on whatever rags he held underneath, though he dropped the knife only accidentally. As soon as it was down, he shot it as far as he might, without giving the man a chance for recourse. He couldn’t suffer trying to bid his life, to hick-looking draggers, with broken pieces of tooth-blades now spread across the floor and sound.

‘A bell just rang.’

But out of shame, the hero couldn’t move.

‘Take the nearest route outside and pray that you may not meet us again. I won’t be as pleasant the next time we meet.’

He smiled morosely and then left himself past his feet.

After that peculiar incident, one would have to be weary of the bridge. As the bridge itself honed the body of a great many faced solidly trapped crescent being, whose horns were battling constantly to be carved out. Each of them bearing armies of hundreds of humanoid, in turn, horned loyalists who would fight for the great fiend if they were allowed the chance to be freed and fight for it. A looming presence in their minds, since their heads weren't working properly, they would not fathom staying too long and satiating the disease which was the looming hatred creeping, a giant spiked-spindle knuckled pincer-like arm which constantly tormented the creature.

In hopes of quieting the rage, they would not fathom satiating it until all of its many closed eyes opened in order to reveal which pair was the real working ones. He was a man, the greatest beast, though he was no primate in change, this giant who submerged. Through multiple anchored, deeply penetrating fileds and rows of uncouth pincer-arms, which grew inside his shoulder, the horns and the skin benign, could not deal with the drop which waited if he was unchained no more.

His legs were many, separated, entrapped, but they were too far from any surface that he might grasp upon and never let to. If the bridge were to be extended, if he had lain there untouched, he might've fallen to his death, into the abyss, through some nether he could not even, for the likes of him grasp. Hence, he took the torture, to the point where he had taken a liking to it, never to approach anything more than what seemed to be. The likes of a blasted head which crept around, never to see, and point and laugh from the sutured features, painted in morose and depressing colors, but never to attempt what appeared to be dead roses which crept inside his brain. Some of them allowed some growth, some incontestable filthy-looking neuros which spread around.

At times it sang. But was it listened? Without a doubt, he had been sent by the other one above the bridge, in charge of torture but never pleased with the result.

'One of these days I shall make you suffer until your plays will be done with and you shall complain no longer.'

'But what can I do if not complain at the pain you're causing me eternally?'

'We've been through this before, haven't we? We only started a few days ago, and we shall be done by the end of the month.'

'What crime have I been found guilty of then?'

'Is it not obvious? Your attempt to grow inside the compound, this place where only humans walk. You tried to snick under their gaze and this is what shall be gotten onto your mind.'

'I only wanted to live like them and see for myself what could be if only I were given a chance to be like them instead of messing.'

With what would he be messing with? What kind of damage had he done around?

Behind him, from the molded carapace, where his wings spanned below, rounded and flat, like those of a wasp-like faceless cripple, he stores enough time and enough going to have messed with everyone, out of the simple guilt, the sympathy of having taken a liking to them.

‘You keep bringing them where they aren’t supposed to walk to. Your name being?’

‘I am Eruphaer, but we have spoken of this before.’

‘Indeed we have, when you first arrived and spoke to me in a blue-moon, taken to heed my intrusion and the access I have asked for.’

In the midst of it, he thought about where he’s been wrong exactly. There were open field and rows of memory, all of which darted from one corner of the mind to another, until he could not fathom doing it any longer, there. He took the fall, he would do it somehow, slowly trying to make himself slip through the cracks, even if it were for him to fall forever.

‘It won’t work, I’ve already thought of this long before you were placed in my care.’

‘But why have you done this to me?’

‘You know that I cannot entertain your inquiries unless you come up with something new. And this time around there shall be no fall, since there’s another bridge under you which will only extend your suffering a month more.’

‘And what if you’re lying to me?’

There was the chance, he could do it just as easily as anyone else, not to pay too much attention, not to direct himself to the damning evidence which had been the seething of his necked throat, the battering of an advent coming from the ends of a rope, he’d do it; if the chance came along.

But there, in the distance, one of the peculiar beings came forth. For one like them to make it there, to look the way he had, it was something he wouldn’t have believed or taken, not to mention that. He couldn’t accept being walked upon by such a lowly, insolent-looking mindless parasite as he was. Fees would not direct his kidneys, nor would he accept his offer, as it came to him for one last time, he would simply aim to push his neck around and eat the whole of him as soon as he came close enough for him to do it.

‘Come closer, you insignificant mongrel, I shall eat you whole.’

Though he dared not make a single step out of the very fear which had guided him so far. Without the doubt to push him on, without wondering, he would’ve stopped.

Curious as to see what happened there, he slowly came forth. Approaching only on a single looped-toe, which took away from him whatever passing might’ve set him on.

‘Will you devour me if I pass?’

‘Of course I will, you know I cannot stop myself, you should know it. I cannot lie.’

Ancient

Far into the mountains, where the waves of wind failed to touch, there stood the Thrishche watch, which looked upon the wild stretched and guarded them against the wretched.

And they marched upon the plains in man-bodied chariots, oddly-shaped whale bones, in a sea of burning spermaceti which made the land. And turning it into their wild access, they spoke to blinds. Beating them, as they invaded during the night, one of which carried a child, but the child of an invader did not belong to the human kind.

Thence they took of their largely made, wolf-headed axes which bore spikes on every handle, for they endured much pain. And hooks in the back so they might manage to impale, both the children and those who prayed to other gods, for in-between them there stood only one god. He spoke of evil. And evil-words guided them against the enemy of the people, for, in ancient times they knew of pain, and knew that legacy would not remain, with no cruelty to take away their guts, and spill the blood of innocent children in the making of outsiders who did not cherish the lands, under which the mass of stones, the infants, masses of mongoloids who had been strewn to chests.

Each child which would be impaled on the back of the hook shook, as he would slowly be assimilated inside the axe, he could be taken past the hook, he'd spill. Each limb twisting and contorting as the Asiatic race flowed through. A time like this in the making spoke, deflecting word and bitter swords and those who desperately tried to come forth.

Later in the day, they grouped. Taking a few women that shook from an invading tribe, had their way with them as they liked, they ripped them off their skin. Peeling them off from the bottom, within, only to pull from what remained, a blood that bore the yellow gaze of a single sun that rose from East. They rose on their feet and started searching inside, through what appeared to be the depth of a few taken forty-five shoe's sized feet in a straight direction, until they found what they were looking for. It was a strange creature-like puddle which gathered no emotion from the tribe. Instead they looked like the abomination of miscegenation which was made in the image of both of their kinds. It could not be believed. Such filth and disquiet taken from within it could not be anything but doomed to fail.

He looked anatomically like a man, but he had grown too soon, in the span of a few hours, which took from the late hours in the evening when they got at it, through the making of the night and even through the morning when they were done butchering their so called taken wives. Some of them bled the yellow, which took on the yolk with it, as their skin paled upon the trunks they had been tied with, never to be approached. Then it was settled, the child would be allowed to live.

It fought for its life, despite being the abomination it were, the mongoloid of no nation, the hybrid which fed on his mother's corpses, only to survive. Then they threw the wolves at him but they showed nothing else but the fear of the benign, which could not be mismatched, it could not be confounded.

The beast had to be starved, as it was one of uncanny evil, bred in the like of no god they knew about.

'What shall we do with him?'

Dopolous asked. He had stared in disbelief and could not fathom drawing forth his axe. He had something wild prepared but at this point the creature was no man. For his mongoloid features started showing themselves in the back, down at the spine when they pushed forth like four aligned deep-sea rays which bore forth a split head, with long and deformed horn-like tusks which pushed forth and aligned themselves like pneumatic sleighs, upon which, from the opening inside of it, there pushed out all of the fat it had stored from the past, until it managed to create its own pseudo-cartilage bone foundation which was desperately needed for the foundation of its body.

A pair of ribs could be observed as they were strung about the lower barely formed yet exposed abdomen which seemed to scrape some of the skin off it. Below it, there were ringed bipedal feet which allowed it to move.

This abomination of a hybrid simply taunted the men with nothing else but the similarities of faces which had been replicated as some sort of weird imitations which were equally placed along the long-curved ray-like cartilage which pushed forth and around itself, managing to apply sutured through the whisker-like wax made out of the spermaceti fat it had devoured off the ground after it was done devouring its mongoloid predecessors.

Each tribesman-like face had been equally placed next to one another, with a key difference being taken from it, as each was bore with an equal distance of fifteen centimeters coming from both sides, until it managed to give itself the uncanny filth-look that bore the scent of a filth-kind, in which it started moving through.

Another hole formed on top of the main body which projected the ray-like back like a hunchback's long tumor which was still attached, this time coming out of his chest. From there, nothing could be seen on the other side, only the torment of barely attached bones which were slowly being liquefied and softened as they were carried through by the creature in the back. The natural state of the being dictated that it would slowly be assimilated into a much longer, more evolved, stronger and long-footed hold of a defiler, which would only bring more chaos on the land.

'He's grown much wider than before. If it keeps going this way, it shall never be stopped, nor will we get our god's worth in tribute.'

The Red man was watching, through vile unseen eyes.

A few Onghor' soldiers joined the men no soon after.

The yellow broads practically offered themselves to the men as a one-side transaction. It was what their part of the offer just so they could avoid being killed. It was how it happened, it was how they acted and if they were given the chance, they would've killed their own children if they could. The reason for it was the plague within their racial blood, which made them colder, much colder and unapproachable when compared to other races that would've driven themselves in a stone-wall if they could.

Both tribes met nonetheless and began discussing this peril that proceeded to wreath its ugly body out, as the skin yellow even further down the south, and as it mourned no longer, it would start preparing itself for yet another charge. This time they would be prepared, be it under wolf-canopy or the old iron forge which started fumigating at the beast approached. And they would sharp themselves spears and blades, and falchions, and pottery tools, anything that might throw it off balance as the beast would be distracted by the sharpness of the light. It could just be that it waned, that it might want to remain but it could not be allowed to stay.

For every second it had satiated nothing more but a disease, in its distress, the long-line it bore, stretch far back to the Negroid. Such was its filth and the danger it bore, as the filth of its line only carried the most deranged things of them all. A line of scum and one of peril, one which would defile the land if they allowed it to carry. 'Shall we begin then?'

'If you would kindly join me now, we should be starting in a matter of a few seconds.'

That much was well implied, there was no need to deny the fact that they ripped off a single man's inner bone protrusion which shot in his head like an arching-spear drone. Looking like a drawn pole which was represented in a five-point perspective architectural drawing where the head would be placed at the highest point of the highest axis, the spear-bone beginning at the lowest opposite point and the sphere inside of which the entire representation lay would somehow be abhorrently deformed, if it were to be seen from around the man against which the pressure was being forced against.

And at the end of the strange bone protrusion, four tunnel-like ends came out, shooting in whichever way, never ending as they started gazing out with features made out of bone, fragmented in the remains of both of his brain lobes that were shot through.

'Try making a few cuts in her, she's on her period.'

It was all too obvious, by the way her children started pushing out, breeding one another as they grew second heads out of the expanding liquid which hardened after liquefying out of their eyes.

'I should've imagined as much, she's going to spend a lot more time doing it, isn't she?'

'Of course she is, I could see this stretching along over a few more generations at least, there's nothing stopping her from proceeding into it, is there?'

'Proceeding into doing what now?'

'Giving birth to herself, making another breeder who should take care of her resting periods and double the ratio at which they're being bred.'

'Will the two of you stop it already? Can't you see that what you're doing is wrong?'

'What do you mean?'

'That creature which was born out of the missing genes is nothing which may even come close to being a, you know what? It's a defect.'

'We cannot place it in any other way. It's a deformed mistake. It shouldn't be displaying those features to begin with.'

But the members of the tribe could not be satisfied with what that had become. The manta-ray like back had only thrown further until it bred many more of their own defiled kind, which in itself could not be held as their responsibility, as they all shied away in their corners, unable to fight the sight of it. For it would take only a single blow to deal a deadly spake, to which its body would be taken and thrown to rot in the sun as well as under the moonlight swoon which was predicted by their bronze chimes.

‘I think we need to reach a consensus first, what exactly is it? It looked like a man at first, a heir of the kind.’

‘But it isn’t and we can clearly see that, and we can see that it started breeding, which means that it doesn’t belong to this world, making it nothing else but an abomination, a deformed abomination in need of putting down. Can’t you see that there’s no other way we might make sure of the loss of its survival?

That we may curb its suffering and put an end to it before it sports through another breeding session?’

‘First we need to figure out what it is.’

‘Nay, can’t you see it’s pointless to ask? We don’t need anything else other than a single bump and a single blow on top its head and it should be done for. Don’t try arguing with me, as I know better than a bunch of missionaries of a man whose claims are that of a single.’

Dead quiet, they looked ahead. Inverted colors, which brought forth only the dead of sky, a blank of painter oil dirt-ivory, taken from them as they finally began walking forth on strange elongated legs which took breaks in the back while stretching as far as to become almost like the holding tails of snakes, dialled in the rack of the machines they were. Almost whimsical in the weird smiles, their faces stretched across their torsos as their arms became nothing more but their long-ear plain spikes. Torn but made out of four sides, spikes that would constantly plunge into each other before one made the difference and asked for an excuse to die. It was asked for as much as it was needed, they wanted to bleed.

Especially since they realised that there was no metal, only a bronze shell covering them like an armour which bore eighteen wolves on top of their backs, like war-ants which stretched as far out of their kingdom as they would remain in the quietness of their own mildew, blindly following orders, unable to retreat. At their feet, a false god sang. He was that evil, little man, flattened, painted in red once, now in a purple and another one of the eighteen additions to magenta which travelled throughout the universe in the verses of the other songs, spoken by the deathless ones, all of whom hanged at once, traitorous whence who could not regret a single doubt.

One would have to yet inquired, why they refused to sing their songs and in the making they stood strong. Unable to perform the intonations, they recited what they could. Did what they could and attempted to charge.

And through this change, on top of one another, they stood like two brothers, a manta-covered pair of spines, all of which were made of spines, a blasphemy which came on top, multiple bodies merged with fat. As the fat was the decided and the fat was the thing which made it work. Which tied everything, placing it forth in front of the interlopers who could not help themselves no longer, weakened by the passing, they stopped. Asking forth, crossing at that.

‘I shall find a way to, least of all behead you through one of the breaks. See how times go and see them as well through that I may know of something coming from the vertical plane.’

In a town, smaller one, more compact, placed around, a brutal look to it, yet still more rural.

‘Dosskoln, you shall be my first son, in name and in weapon, the way you shall carve the path ahead of you should only make it less clear that you consumed by body in order to carve your way through.’

Never, there was no way, no possible way he could still hear him.

‘Bastard, I should’ve made it. Don’t look at them, if you saw it, they will be able to figure it out as well. And if they do.’

Too late, it was already too late to question in. They were watching him way too closely for him to be able to try anything without being spotted. Somewhere around the place, during a time when they could not face each other in the plains, all too flat-looking, all too filled with boredom and decadence.

Large yellow-tinted edges upon the giant irons on which they seemed to be propelling one another as they rested for no reason. Lazy creatures had to be exterminated. Beaten on top of being humiliated for being what they were. And somehow, everything ended up in the same place, as if it were left there, in place. In the spot, men lifted themselves up. And women as usually bred, with whomever they could. No value laying in their wombs, which drove the world into the point of extinction, where it had become way too damaging to live. Saying too much was the way of the despot, driving everything into the wall. It wasn’t needed, it didn’t go too far.

Only him, the hero, no, they, both of them, all four, even stood against the flayed carcass, buildings got left behind, just in the same way children would because their parents had died before getting the chance to try their hands in. Traps for them, fingers got cut, hands followed after that. In a replica of two continents which overlapped, it was hard to tell who was human and who was not. Someone got shot into one of the two directions, they promoted their miscegenation, only to find themselves completely castrated for the messages they seemed to bear. It was too damaging, going through their gains. Knowing what the consequences were. Greed and avarice was punished, severely, more so in their case.

And then there were the work-force which was being brought in. Dark-skinned slaves which were just as useless as the ones that remained, mindlessly doing what they were told to, never bothering to look in whichever direction their masters pushed through. It was a lane, many remained, all too deeply planted, until twenty meters remained empty, they dared. Some fairer skinned passed. It was the result of millions of years of selective breeding and pure lines, somehow they survived. And they governed over everyone else. It went deeper than their shades, deeper than the primal need to survive and reciprocate. Brain structure was different, of course it would be. Even more so, it could not be detected by no neuro-surgeon of the time, mostly because of the intricacies that were being carried over with each new generation.

Perhaps in a few more decades of advancement, which would not be represented in a linear fashion, instead there seemed to be something more directly called for, twenty necks strung in line, they waited and watered down.

‘I see, so it’s still something we’ve not come yet to discover.’

‘Unfortunately, I believe it’s not something that may ever be drawn upon. For obvious reasons, I think there’s something going on with the chemicals in the brain.’

It's the very molecules that make them which are different and need to be preserved under delicate and precise care. Unless we are to throw hundreds of years of advancement, we cannot, for the likes of us do any of it to get off.'

Michelle Andall was one of the men who got off her only to return to his small group and follow them around. It was a bad habit, but he couldn't help it. They were tool-heads, which only drove into walls when needed so they couldn't be held accountable for any wrong-doing they've done. Such is the way with animals. It's a matter of how they ought to be trained. Dangerous even, mostly so, pushed aloud.

Loudly announcing that animals are eating at the table, yet no one was thrilled that they made a table just for them. It was impossible to account for every single simian-ledges against which their thinning bodies appeared to have merged into. Largely placed, separated and chemically docile, twas' the right way to deal with them, but most importantly, a part of their brains had been completely lobotomized for the sole reason that they weren't up for it. Living in a civilized world, not without being lynched for stepping out of line, that betraying only the fact that they should've been kept in line, stripped and beaten, then pushed into the first dug-out they rotten in.

Some would cannibalise one another because of the very fact that they were unable to control their own impulses over a long stretch of time. Hence the coming of the obscure end, their joy ended after a dinner, then they were sent back to work.

'Why are we locked in Crezhns?'

It was a muttered word, the petty work of a poor builder who only did so when he needed to get a word in. Patience, he thought.

Not him, of the lower line.

But the man in the back, Cornchop.

'Patience, lord, patience, there's still more time.

You can handle them at any time and still come up front with no finger and no hands under your belt. With no bleeding stock which is still needed for the work.

Make sure they're all being used like they're supposed to and we might just get off easily without blood being spoiled.'

Thence he looked at the so-called cattle. Many of the pinned brain-devices were shot through their heads. It was no wonder they went through and lost the spirit they concluded with.

Amassing filth

Long straws sitting across New York, pushed through shafts of middle-wheels, which twisted around their Negro shins, which stood atop a throne of cotton which sipped in through his nostrils, entering his guts, which turned his eyes into white as he was foaming cotton out of his mouth. And bunch of kikes, standing, drooling, eating out their slaves, a-gore. And the Moor, standing watched, as he guarded through the bore.

He could not believe his eyes, as they became, a single piece of the object he refrained himself to look upon.

‘That filthy creature molested a child, it should be punished immediately without a trial.’

‘And what should the punishment be in that case?’

‘Complete and utter annihilation of both lobes, we shall force a quick lobotomy on top of him and we shall extract what we can.’

‘But what first?’

‘Good thing you asked. I’ve been thinking about something for a long time now, though I could never focus on anything else other than it.

It’s about this strange Jewess I’ve had a strange fixation over a long period of time.

I’ve been fantasizing about her as of lately, which had taken over, what seems to be, most of my leisure.’

‘And whom would that be, Commissioner?’

‘Why, I’ve been obsessing myself of no one else but Ayn Rand, which happened ever since I delighted myself ever since I began reading Atlas Shrugged.’

But he had not dared talk about her previous work, which he considered to be something, not as near, as to fear an uprising, but more docile version of the former, being Fountainhead. After all, the Commissioner, for some strange, yet unexplained reason seemed to have indulged himself into Objectivism, which in turn, seemed to drive him even closer to her. Though they may have been of different times and she may have been long dead since, there was nothing stopping him to progress further on in his mind. Not to be too vulgar now, as there were details there he refused to acknowledge, but there were so many poses of the kind, some shakes of the hands, uncannily going into one and either, close direction, only until they established contact.

‘I’ve thought about her and even came to the consideration of her relationship with her husband. Though it may have been disgusting in every kind of sense, I would’ve loved to punish both of them in turn. Regardless what my personal feelings for that woman might’ve been.’

And as they spoke, the land polluted itself with cotton around them, leaving nothing to be breathed as if from the cool air and everything else which pushed from it. In the closest thing which happened to be theirs.

‘I see. Have you spoke to someone else other than I about this obsession of yours?’

‘No one that wouldn’t judge me as soon as I have opened my mouth, though I delight myself in the pleasure of knowing that someone of them would go as far. And close to it, at large, to imagine both of us together as lovers; although, from what I heard there might’ve been a few.

More than so, and her husband knew about them all. As he had given much of his consent to further in, as she would do as she pleased.’

‘And what would you have done to her?’

‘I would’ve beaten her day and night. I would’ve dirtied her with purple around her eyes and gut. I would’ve done so until her followers hated me, until I drove myself to county jail.

But most importantly, I would’ve done so out of love, because I do feel as if I love her, uncontested by no one as God alone is my witness.’

‘Would that be the same god they killed?’

‘My dear fellow, but your vision is obscured and unclear, you know nothing of desire and what it feels like being a man.

If you had known it, you would’ve seen the clear light of day just as I had seen her during the first years of my life. You would’ve heard the soldiers on the field bombing, even without knowing of the war.

And working on the field, dying out of heat-fever and such, everything a man does is for a woman he likes, even though she may not be wholly sane as you and I are, my friend.’

‘Commissioner, I do not think you’re wholly right in the head. As a matter of fact, I think you’re far out gone.’

‘You don’t know the half of it now. Because, know that I have managed to track one of her descendants and I have plans, great plans, to marry her. We ought to carry out our engagement in December if everything goes accordingly to plan.’

‘Have you met this woman yet then?’

The Commissioner thought about it. He never attained the habit of lying and this fellow happened to be an acquaintance he knew well enough to share some close thoughts with. He had gone in great depths to plan civilizing the woman until he ruled out every possibility that he may be ruined by her.

As it only represented the duality of the relationship between the two of them, as men created and women ruined, that being so, he needed, yet he loathed the creature. But his obsession drew him farther on.

Large clouds had already been corroded by the cotton, which had attained a tawny color, forcing the lumps to look as strangely bottom-barrel bellies of pig-like open cannibalized boars mate out of freshly barging coal that had been struck inside a tightly sewn iron point which pushed out of it.

The clouds had been given a strange look which was borderline impossible to attribute to the negro-cotton alone. Too sharp' an angle came out of it, drawing out with its pest-head, which only made it look like a spiked stone taken from some sea-shell which had accumulated rancid scales on top of it. And inside the hardening, silky-smooth exterior which lay on top of every possible horn, which in itself was a distant reminiscence of some lost Negro artifact, there were the bowels of the beast, corroded by their own inadequacies which appeared to mold into each corner and every hold of a pin-bloated needle which kept everything from falling on.

For the insides seemed to be structured in this precise manner. Seen from inside, atop the view, one would see the open and exposed half-cut body of a boar which included most of the exposed rib-cages which had lain in it. This body would be inside the greater yolk of skin which had been eaten by its predecessor.

Though the bones appeared to be made of no cartilage but metal, and each line of metal had a few holes which were going as far as to push twenty millimeters in, as they held some wildly elastic and highly mobile needles which only pushed on around and manipulated the upper torsions which were kept on top. Then came the bowels, the lumps which constantly moved on top of one another, like a writhing mass of worms which seemed to push and foam as they were preparing the foam inside of them. But they could not fall through the open spaces, despite the fact that the needles appeared to be too frail and thin to be able to keep the mass from falling through.

As this mass seemed to have formed a strong knot which prevented them from falling through. But they had been responsible for, not only the redistribution of chemicals they had assimilated inside of them while they were taken from below the earth as they passed through the underground tunnels which lead to one of the greatest chemical evaporator factories that seemed to be developed in the county, but they also seemed to rematerialize the elements which had been extracted from below the earth.

And with that close addition and rendition of the chemicals they stole and absorbed through the cotton, they finally started forming solid pieces of cotton which had finally been fashioned into large archs, sharp pointy-heads and various other, dangerous to look at and to touch ends.

Various other clouds went to that process and would remain so, lying lower and lower in the air as they started their descent towards the ground. Soon they'd fall, and as a matter of fact, a lot of them started falling and pushing through their ranks, leaving the open fields exposed to a valley's worth of spiked bushes made of cotton.

It was obvious, they ate the dog, mongoloids of eight headed births, all of which looked like they were one great tumor tower-lane, which turned around their necks, producing their young as they started pushing forth their sons.

But irrelevant nonetheless, as the Commissioner had other plans for the woman, which distracted him from what was going on around.

It was dying off, slowly.

There was nothing preventing him from fading off, like the lost delusion of a man searching for something senseless. He stalked the first woman who came into contact with him and never let go of that.

Although she was a real descendent nonetheless, of one of her sister's daughter's side of the absorbed population, of which features seemed to have emerged so thoroughly that he had come to the immediate realization that the woman must be one of her long removed nephews.

Many of who lay hanged around her house even to this day, while she had gone to great depths to hide everything from the authorities, the scent being in some way incarcerated in small holding cells made of plastic.

It came to be that the Commissioner moved in. Though he had found himself cajoled by his very own daring act, he had also been drained by the thought dwelled back in.

'We should exterminate some people. Not everyone deserves to exist, some people could do without living.'

'All right.'

The woman said, being too disgracefully yellow.

It was a nasty way of thinking but the Commissioner could not help it.

They were sharing something together. Though it may have been short lived, he could see the glimmer in her eyes. She didn't actually know it yet, but he owned her. And he would be force her to acknowledge it.

'Know now that I have planned this over a long period of time by now. But If I were to come to power, there would be so much to pay for everything that's been taken and done to the people.

So many people would be in need of punishment, of rotting and torture of the highest kind. It is only natural there there's a need of someone in the right measure to deliver that punishment to all unworthy people of this world.

Thos who had betrayed their kin and would parlay with the darkest people they would sell their souls to. The highest bidders whose infamy has driven them to an uncounted for degeneracy and.'

He took a break and planned ahead.

'Marvelous, perfect cylinder upon which they will hang, but no spiked on them or sharp fangs, but large hooks to hold their pray.'

The weird thing was that. They could not look way past beyond it, as it lay in hiding no longer, being placed on one of the large squared, largely-outdrawn four-sided, highly-raised adamant platforms, whereupon few long horned statuesque goats which knelt like Sphinxes lay. Out of the bowels of which, spear-shaped canons prepared to launched the most uncannily prepared head-on black powder-filled barrel's worth of headless masses, all of whom exploded on touched as they released the after-images of men's bodies, the sights of which being reflected in the smoke their threw on.

And the man who came out of it was no one other than him, after he had left the bar, before he could take it into the sight of the benign. Fumigating in no quiet, as he had evolved into the sight of the Leviathan he had yearned to be made in the image of, being infested just like all of them, this cure of desperation never fading out his glands.

It should end in a matter of seconds now. A grin, from which the scent of gin appeared only filled his nostrils with a senses of dread-cattle, through which he ate a piece of her, the night that followed. And through the weeks, she was compelled to stick with him despite her personal feeling in matter.

‘I’m confused.’

‘As was I when I first had you but that seems to seal the dead, wouldn’t you say?’

‘There’s not much of a way back any longer.’

‘I’m glad you agree.’

‘I didn’t mean it that way. I found out that you were right about me, in any case.’

‘Of course I was, there was no need for me too lie, I’m not a low-life, lying is only for their kind. I can only see as far as I need to.’

‘And how did you find out then?’

‘I don’t know, you could call it a hunch if you want to but I feel as if there was much more than that when it happened. I didn’t suddenly wake up that way, thinking you’d be her niece.’

But of a long-distant branch three more of her descendants remained. And something had to be done about them, only to prevent another catastrophe from happening. He could only see it for so long before tripping over his words. And they were blessed as far as this place would tell them of.

‘I have to leave.’

‘Then you won’t mind me changing the lock now, would you?’

‘I’ve already rang the man, the taxidermist should be here in an hour.’

It was a given with everything being involved in the place. For the same reason she thought it to be so, there was the exact hole through which the head of an antelope would come to be. That would be enough to carry through her, if its horned beak pushed out for her to see. And she had not been disturbed nor had she cared about the quietness that loomed over. As he waited for some reason to stay, he found nothing. He would leave and would probably miss coming back to what he lost. She wouldn’t be here the next time he came and that was in no need of confirmation. He would have to find out sooner or later if that was true. Which put him at risk, his wallet was empty.

But there was one bus thicket, as he waited in line. He seemed to have had some change left from the other part of town, where he used to, at a point in time bought a couple of pickles, but not for no reason. It was a special delivery he carried with him, wrapped inside an old newspaper where the Socks played the Red Indians, twenty five days ago. No one would notice this, nor would they report when it happened.

The Commissioner tracked her down. It was another one of the daughters, which put everyone at peril. Close to it, through and through, it could only go into one good direction from this point on. Apparently, from what he managed to find out from the various sources, the woman hadn't been liked by anyone in the neighborhood, probably wasn't liked by her own mother. But the time he found her apartment, the lock was busted. Regularly robbed as well, she didn't bother anymore. It was the scent of musk as well. Going into pieces, going round the side. An old tv set seemed to liven up the rack. A rack nonetheless which she didn't bother to clean, bringing him even closer to her, so he could hear out a slight tinge from upstairs. Whatever they were doing there, it was a miracle that the whole apartment didn't fall through.

'Think you're up to turning around?'

'I don't need to do it. You'll come over.'

He did. There was no explanation, the Commissioner was sure to bring in the acquaintance he had been talking to over a while now. They were both in the right set of mind to do it. As much as it seemed out of place, he had something about him. A charm which made other people do what he wanted. He did that and it always crossed his mind that it would bite him in the back one day.

'Brought your scout along?'

'I needed someone to watch my back in case something happened. He's gone something on him as well.'

'I see.'

Other than that, there wasn't much about her. Not much protest, she didn't resist. She was old, too far gone already to mind the wrap coming off, then the lid, then the acid.

And like that they were gone out of the building and had no plans on coming back to the area. No one seemed to have taken notice of their short-going around the apartments. There wasn't any bellboy or anyone at the counter either, it was no hotel, though there were the sings outside. And the whole place seemed to have that strange bootleggerly vibe to it, that passed them by.

It seemed like they forgot themselves after a while and kept driving.

'How did you feel about it?'

'How do you think I felt?'

'I think you felt great enough, haven't you?'

'You're toying with me now.'

'Of course I am, otherwise, there wouldn't be a chance in hell I'd do something to you.'

'Will you?'

'You're a witness.'

You could go ahead and press on with a testimony against me. Do you have any realization what that means to me?’

He thought about it. Only one term came to mind. The right one, disposable.

He made sure to rub it in as well. He made sure to spit in my face as he was doing it and never ask for anything else, not even the slightest, slimiest reason why he’d told me so.

‘I like you that’s why. And I don’t intend on proceeding with any accident whatsoever.

I only wanted to make one thing clear, that I had and still have my eyes on you and it will be so from now on.’

‘Think we can stop at the nearest gas station?’

‘Sure, but no funny. Nevermind, I don’t think you’d do that.’

‘You wouldn’t think I’d do what?’

Throwing it all away now, either here or twenty miles down south in the direction they were going towards. One of the coppers was there, parked right around, but he didn’t make any sound as to allude to them. It was all too clear that they were being trailed.

‘I’ll wait inside but don’t spend too much time there, I’m still looking for the others and as soon as words goes out.’

She could warn them. And she hadn’t used her name yet, Lisa. She inherited her father’s first name as well, which probably took her out of the map almost completely, for every other lunatic out there who was out to get here. Many of them were like the Commissioner. So many breaks were unearned.

‘Eyes on the road while I’m in, we wouldn’t want someone to fly in while I’m missing, would we?

What, don’t trust me?’

‘Of course I do, it’s not that. I’m not ashamed to say this.’

‘Then spit it out.’

‘I don’t want you around the coppers, that’s all.’

‘Then leave as soon as you see them busting through the door. You should be off the side road and through the old lanes by the time they make it for the car.

Or at least, you know, only one of them makes it.’

‘Think they would ring you in as well?’

‘And why wouldn’t they? I wouldn’t be surprised if they did. I’m not too soft on the features either. I have no doubt that I’m as shady as you are.

Despite not being as scrawny.'

'Leave then.'

And he had. Twenty minutes in and he hadn't returned. A man was on the rocker and the other cradles the radio through a few old stations. Then they finally decided to show up. It was strange. They came out of nowhere, as if there had never been a time they opened their car's door. Which had been clearly seen by him as he had been staring at the rearview windows for the last twenty minutes or so, leaving nothing to be drawn from their sudden apparition which was followed soon after by a single tap on the door. Not the one on his side but one of them in the back, pushing outwardly into each direction. He couldn't see where the noise source dragged towards. Moving on in this exact, precise and counted for order. Looking at the car from the top view, whereas the car would face the road ahead, as to shine two widely spread unwrapped inverted cones that would point towards the lights, it would be something like this. Originally starting on the lower right side of the back door, the left side following after, twice while opposite to the first, one on the ceiling, one below and one fifty feet ahead, yet looked for as it perfectly imitated the exact same noise coming from inside the car.

And by the time his retina rested in its original position, the coppers were gone, as they had already made it towards the shop inside the station. They would have to pay for the refilling. Of which third figure appeared there. It stood with its chained gas-filler, dragging a hand over, knowing it was being watched by him. He didn't want to say too much, nor would he do it after a while. He knew better than that. He pushed through, dangling the keys from one point to another as if it mattered or as if it made any difference whatsoever.

That figure, as shrouded as it were looked different each time. And each time it was looked upon, he could see something or drag something from it without looking astonished at his wild behavior. The car moved without him realizing it yet. A few more rolls of the tires. He was getting nearer with each passing second, but he had already been there for eighteen seconds.

Watching closely over him as if it didn't even matter in the first place, leaving them widely open, leaving them broken around their heads. Both of them, the kidnapped people they kept wrapped in the backseat. They were no coppers and he was no man. He missed something, a key thing, but he was no thing and no monster, at least not one who could make it seem so. Instead he took breaks from breathing, which only made him breathe harder until his face lay scarred. But then he was again looking in the distance and the car was back in its place.

It was the victims he changed places with and that's what he was seeing, that and the deformed car and the insides of it which were livid, filled with the skins of whoever came into those seats before they came to their senses or wanted to push on for another time.

'Twenty more minutes and I'll leave.'

He said.

The insides of the shop, right around where he stood, he came near and asked for nothing more, nothing that would bring too much of some importance, least of all would they bring some quiet through. They were listening to the sounds of day and heard the birds during a night painted by a sky of wildly discolored oil colors. Many of them did not work together, nor would they work when mixed. It was way too damaging for the eyes to stare for long.

It was one of those sights which would be somewhat ignored if stared at for too long. Is it actually an obsession or simply an out of reach infatuation with the ladies involved in the whole affair? During the moment of respite, he found a single moment to search his mind and think about it. There was no rightness or greater pointer leading inside his head. Only her and the remaining sisters who appeared to be widespread around the county, but that couldn't last long either. He knew that he stood the chance to miss them if he waited for too long instead of acting as swiftly as he could. It was dragging for too long. He kind of doubted the man but there was no chance for him to banish the thought. He left.

Twenty miles down the road, towards the twin South's, there were a few headlights still pointing at the road. You could smell them but didn't have to look any further than where in was needed. They were there, long before the acquaintance had been revealed inside the car, trapped and wrapped just like the other victims who lay around their back-side. It couldn't be drawn from there any longer, they were desperate for a single shout. A single pint of a voice they could record and get their sickly pleasure done with.

'Say a few words and we'll let your friend go.'

'He's not my friend though.'

'That isn't enough, the intonations need to match up to a most perfect amph sphere along the scale, toes will appear otherwise and the three of us will be dead.'

'Toes from inside the scale?'

'Of course, they crawl fast enough. In no more than twenty seconds we will be dead. And so will you if you stall for more.'

'What will be the cause for it then? Are you going to be the ones killing us or those toes?'

There was a slyness which was not involved until the point where he revealed the gums. The Commissioner seemed to bear a certain pattern on top of them, left there by the small prick of a hot iron which had been used to seal something inside of them. And every bite felt like an overbite and an underbite which fought against one another in order to align his bite properly. Not to mention that sometimes his teeth became soft. There was something going even deeper than that, as all of his pain nerves had been completely misplaced around his mouth.

Someone made an example out of the man, and it would be sure to rise again if he'd done it.

'Here, you'll have to settle with this for the night. Otherwise, I want you to piss off and mind your own business.'

'Have him, he wasn't as useful as we had originally planned him to be. Too.'

But there was a cut, after realizing that the voice wasn't enough for them to gather their strength and move on. Their sockets were filled with prodding toes-like formations, which could not have resembled something more unnatural if they had attempted. Nails-bit, they moved from the spot. It wouldn't last for too long now, getting out of the high-way.

The man was calm.

He always kept that solidly cold demeanor when he was approached. Somehow, this time was different. He was a mollusk of the mind, his brain had a hole in it which pushed farther in. Between the two of them he had been the closest to them and it showed, in every possible way. He missed the first turn and had to make it this way from this point on.

'We're going to have to drive through the night, if you want to sleep for a few hours before you take the shift, there's a blanket in the back. '

'I'm not interested much in sleeping any longer. I would've preferred some lone time but I'm not going to get it unless you dump me somewhere along the way.'

'Or unless you kill me.'

Another block on the road, which made the entirety of the car shake itself out of the falling moss which had rained on top of them, creeping in further through dreadfully erect lanes. There were other beings present, which seemed to have already exposed their empty heads in some wild attempt to get something from them if they could help it. Flashing from beneath their eyes, wild organs produced the dye, which sorted itself out as it started tainting the land.

It was docile, for now, the mass of dye which had attained, as much weight as it would drag everything inside of it, conveying nothing but their screams in turns, until they couldn't help it anymore than they needed to, which prompted shaking. A wild euphoric scent, two headed like the rest of them had to have revealed itself. He had to know who waited in the wilds or if he was seeing things because he tired.

'I'll leave you alone for ten minutes. I'm taking the keys. Hopefully you don't know the wiring. You never hit me of the like.'

'You never know what happens when you're not around.'

'I suppose I don't. But I'm not going to trust myself enough that I'll leave them.'

That meant alone, he wasn't there after all. The Commissioner went alone on the side. He entered the gray zone, which only dyed his surroundings and his palms which started looking even worse than they had initially had. It could only be that he didn't trust either of them. Firefly-bits of eyes, he knew they were there, past the lanes, hiding inside rotten cars with their cousins. Brothers, whichever they got withy them.

And this would be the last show of lights before the night could finally end. He had to record everything in his mind, otherwise, he would miss it again, failing to recognize what was going on. He was trying, but failing as a single pull of his head. It bobbed around the neck and lost itself, no longer erected upon some pints.

‘I see there’s a reason of respite and there’s nothing in the back of the deathless track, the heads were writhing in, I saw them thin the body.’

But they lacked in the weariness of the cold flatness of the stretch.

Thinking back at some of the good ol’ days, he dwelled even deeper on it, since it stroke him as being appropriate all of the sudden, since the company was not included there.

The Commissioner seemed to be struck by it. A peculiar passage from his own self-written memoir, which was just as existant as that acquaintance of his; which went something like this.

‘I seem to recall the good old days, when a man could raise his hand at a woman and take her life away without facing any kind of consequence for his action.

And I recall having my hand wrapped around a good lady of mine just in the same way. Having a go at it as I would keep striking until she became red like the Ma’am of Glory, there in the sky o’ pink. Where the good folk looked the other way around and no one asked what happened or what went through your mind when you did it.’

He was set on that thought alone, wanting to bloody a woman now and again, until his palms became not red but a deeper shade of purple. No oil and not the nuisance of healing herbs and nothing to make him look like the bastard he was. Since there was no way for self reflection, he could only count the minutes on his block, wondering who might come around the door this way around.

His car stopped, the apartments.

There was no way his so-called but left that station that day, the hood was closed and there had been the after-echo of the beating in the car.

‘You’re supposed to beat a woman until she can’t walk any longer, only that way would she understand that some lines you cannot cross.

Don’t hurt a man that way. He cared about you too much and it’s nothing but pleasure, it’s nothing but the fondness of his heart being shown from which he draws the needed courage to put you in your place. Otherwise, you as a woman would go out of your way and destroy the man.

That is how the world get destroyed, when a man stops beating a woman, all of the sudden every wheel in the world stops turning. It yearns no longer for progress, the cogs don’t go through the needed stress they need in order to start the machine.

This machine can only take so much by itself and once the amount of beating is diverted from the woman towards the mechanisms, then it can no long function like it needs to. Then it can no longer work right.’

The Commissioner said outside his apartment. It was ever so obvious that he meant it, he had all those recollections on him beating all the women he’s ever been with.

Only to remove some of the earlier remarks, there was a clear distinction in his mind between the types of beatings a woman should and the ones she ought to receive. One would not want to push too far in and cripple the poor creature before she had her chance to sing. No, instead, he would only lend to her what was right and nothing more than that.

‘I don’t want to harm you, I don’t want to cross that threshold and this is something every man should know after a while. In order to keep her down in order to subdue some of her female nature, which in turn is somewhat inhumane-like, as that of a large primate which can build nothing and can only play with itself in dirt, so does the woman in her turn.’

Then he took a single moment to try a few more times to fit in the key. Still, he could not find the lock. It was a sense he missed, despite having the years of practice.

‘She only needs to be prevented from doing too much harm to herself and others in turn because it’s simply the way they are.’

Commissioner thought, as he did stumble upon the very strange reflection of his very own thoughts. It was as strange as it was peculiar, trying his hands over and over as a device that would not listen to him. And in another way, it reflected his entire ordeal and general interaction with women. He knew them, well. Even more than most of them would. Why would so many of them end up staying with him even after being dirty eyes and thrown against the rocky mud?

It was just as unsurprising as it showed itself to be.

But he shook his head and smiled. Another time; he’s been alone for such a long time and when he finally returned, though that disgraceful lock stood on top of a wildly rotten door, he finally came home. And he was greeted by nothing else other than the inside of the Sistine chapel, in all its beauty and might, and nothing more than every figure that’s ever stared Michelangelo up there in the sky. During the moment God spoke to him as a man, as he’s painted him reaching for his divine heir. There was beauty, there was the divine and it was all made by a single man, whose hands dared reached a beauty unlike no one else could during his time.

It was empty, yet his soul was warm. He was filled by warmth unlike anything else he had ever felt before. During which, after being gone for months, it was almost as if that disease of the mind finally left him. As he was no longer the Commissioner, as he was no longer a man, as he finally stepped in, leaving everything behind.

A man whose heart did not die that day, but one who chose not stay behind as he pushed on.

Other savages

He were dead, if only for a second. And the splits across his hairline faded, they only pushed away, then missed their chance, and the spot against their head was going.

He could not fathom living anymore, no longer shackled against the floor, unable to eat the grain, walked, he walked out of the soothing rain and in the two pits which yelled out loudly. Never stricken in the head, the coloured came and started eating him in part. He was to be boiled and cannibalized, or would've been so, if they were of the same species. Instead, in turn, they seemed to worship something beyond their own. For starters, he was not a pupil, despite the fact that he may have studied a lot in his youth, he was an inborn imbecile who managed to burn their shack, that lousy poor shack they were living in. With many of them inside, being burned alive, only to come out of their way, with their smallish bodies getting burns ahead and everywhere. They looked for water.

Some of it was blocked, the access to the river-salt. In their nostrils, they could sense the canines, who were after them in order to prevent this act from ever happening. It could only go this way.

‘Today I declare, as I have come to the conclusion that there were eighteen of us still underway, that we have found only a family man, one of our own, to have survived in the heart of the jungle. Whereas his family has been entirely eaten alive in front of him. ‘

‘Savages, savages!’

‘Filthy savages, we need to find the culprits.’

‘Be reasonable men, women, and those of work, we need to take this matter seriously and logically, before we lose even more of our own instead.’

‘Lynch them, we have to lynch them.’

The mob protested. If anything, they were rather caught off guard by their reaction to the news of the onslaught. To the point where they may have considered just handing the coloured to them only but to see how they would be ripped apart and made to with their bodies, hanged. It was pleasant in some way, thinking of them as nothing else but the primitive animals, of which behaviour they could only convey in the wild sounds they made.

As many of the natives could not be, by any means be reasoned with. They could not be approached for a good reason at that. Some signs in their makings, they displayed a lack of affection or empathy towards those outside their tribe. It was lacking, this type of behaviour being only a sign of their madly introverted nature and the fact that they seemed to be caught by their own superstitions in a manner of speaking. Many of them appeared to have adopted, in some peculiar manner, both of their ancestral ordeals to the very point of being unable to distinguish what went on around them and why they felt, like outsiders being on their way to another tribal murder.

Spoken to the chief of the tribe, though he was just as irrationally blinded by the events which underwent during the time the camps were being settled around their small jungle, he appeared to be of some rationale that was not found amongst the common savage. He was, after all, of a much fairer skin shade than that of compatriots, which seemed to offer him, despite the circumstance which ought not be entirely discussed, a somewhat sharper mind. He was still a savage, still a coloured, yet, for one of his shade, he had done a much greater good to his people than any of the darker shaded ones. Which also bring in the question of the betrayal, as there are no written records which may manifest themselves during a time when they're needed about any short-coming migration of coming, passing or any kind of travel of any people that may have left their genetic imprint upon their tribe.

This only complicated things even further as the signs were all there. Some of the features were more pronounced, sharper got to the point where the facial progression had stopped resembling or showing similarities to that of the common simian ancestors the Negroes appeared to bear. It was a somewhat dull, yet barely touched upon mystery that no one wanted to acknowledge at all. Yet the men who were present, with their rifles appeared, at times, though ever so momentarily, to hesitate. Though no shot had been taken onto them, it had been obvious, to some degree, that their fairer skin line had not come from anywhere else but out of the line of some hardy-folk men who carved their way through the heat of the jungle and of whom ordeal seems likely to have ended their line.

It was a pitiful, ungrateful thing, thinking about it. Yet so many of them seemed likely to have made good folk if their female ancestors had been of the same species as theirs; though, with that being said, alas, there can be no other heart in the making. There was only one jungle and the sun was in the air. And no other man of today would leave their paradise in search for anything else. Other than, of course, company included, those that might be sent towards the southern lands out of some commission coming out from a greater gentleman whose name shall not be named, as he desired, out of the bottom of his heart, as a great hobbyist who took great pleasures at length into taxidermy, to acquire the head of one of the coloured in order for him to quintessentially complete his collection.

That could only bring him closer to the other side of the deal. That being finally settled in a private matter with the Professor Hoxton, that he got his fair share of research being dragged over on behalf of no one else but his personal desire to catalogue this strange mixed species. And lo' and behold, as fate had fared his travel well, that he only thought of it as nothing else but his great chance and his entirely earned for gamble with fate, that he stumbled upon his benefactor upon which interests seemed to have aligned.

Both of them being very much inclined to do mind their own business as a matter of sea-faring and looking around, it was time that one of the envoys approached a member of this strange tribe for nothing less of an extraction.

A deal with their king, though this may appear to be somewhat counterintuitive, with everything which was being said before, this spiritual leaders of theirs only appeared to be somewhat educated within their own ways and nothing more. With the very least said about him, being the fact that he could not speak properly, yet he didn't attack Hoxton on sight. That was much more than could be said about his brethren, of which savagery held no bounds and could not be accounted by any means, as they were of the lot that took pleasure in hunting children of their own making, masked as nothing else but a ritual of hardening the spirit and battering their young. Despite such practices being somewhat traceable in much older tribes than theirs and in far greater, more civilized areas of the world, those belong to the realms of legends with only a slim chance of them having any real basis in reality. At the very least, not to the same level as was being told today.

It felt as if they were hunting or trying to kill their young. Merciless in their charge, if it weren't for the fact that they themselves appeared to have thinned out as well as they were unable to continue at the same level as they had before; mother mercy should be mentioned for good luck here. Our men were told, as a direct stance, which only added more to the insult as well as everything else, not to intervene in their practices, as we could not fathom to upset the balance that may give us one perfectly preserved head, in great conditions, well-kept, in whichever possible way one found in it.

Thence the leader approached. And Hoxton couldn't tell much about the figure, let alone the man who showed up in front of him. From the wild ramblings, out of the top of his head, he only came up with the name Ukliku, that being barely taken out from already wild interpretations he himself could not believe he stumbled on. They were too uncanny for any man, fearing of the Lord to thread upon and push deeper.

He could feel it now, the stories he would tell that happened in that tribe, some that aroused the most abhorrent feelings in his heart, as well as everything else that pushed onto being unspeakable, for his countenance alone to take. Not that he was a brave man, his reputation being at stake with him in the front, standing between the tribe and his own men, at the chance of being shot during the crossfire, but he felt like the peoples were out of place. And he had dared not say a thing on the subject, out of the fear of his very heart being somewhat misplaced. He had not feared the savages entirely, but had only thought of his family instead. What of them if he, all of the sudden were to perish in this place?

Whereas they had little to no consideration of their families, he could not stop thinking of them.

Breaking through

The past kept spilling in through the cracks, ill-contained through the various valve-like puddles which were made by the rain. Under a metal canopy a few metallic enfolded beasts waited, cradling their electric young. Some of them were lacerated, but not in the way a machine would be deconstructed, pushed in through the crack, there one long diamond-rod, which had holstered a tiny metallic grappler with many legs behind its back. It shot tongues of energy from which small power electric currents became tiny atom-beings of their own. From a giant body, which in turn had been completely submerged underneath the ground, touched by none.

It seemed like he had done a great job making It past them without being seen by either one. Or they would've certainly, if not, they might've calmly sounded the alarm, alerting everyone of his presence as well as the fact that he wore ill-contact which were of another world. In the wool of his skin, he appeared to have kissed as much as a single pin-needle on his jacket, as he pretended to be from around the place. What a quickly dumbfounded mistake it was.

'Who was that?'

'Couldn't tell you, but I haven't seen him out.'

No questioners.

Coronm made it through the gates, from what he could tell, a part of his mind had already adapted to their common patterns, no matter how complicated they first appeared to be. He would indulge in nothing more and ask for nothing else until he made sure he found that room. Twenty-C, that had to be it. But not a single door had a letter on it. He found it remarkable, how they simply found their way around without trying to space themselves and move away from what went on through their heads.

Ugly things, those shaky hands which came around the neck of the robe, you could not have stumbled on them on a better day.

Farther away, in one of the hidden corners, where they dealt with the makings.

‘Waited for at the end of the road, get the one bottle and put it in your pocket. Everything I owe Lorn is should be there.’

‘Even the diamonds?’

‘All five of them.’

‘Even the two gods themselves?’

‘Completely struck and left to blot their speeches inside the black bottle.’

They could still be felt, even from the distance, with everything about them being jotted down. It wasn’t what it seemed to be. For starters, there was no muck of skin and no divine figure in the bottle, only the writings which bounced around each other as they plummeted through, sinking a few inches farther into the glass. It was peculiar, trying to forage something they weren’t there for.

A few more bottles had been passed around that day and the collector brought Lorn everything which had been owed by the people in his employ. He got as much as he hadn’t been afraid to show it. Gern had once owed him, it was important to know. He didn’t simply owe him a sum of money but appeared to have gone with something else as well on his attempt to get out.

Though many would’ve looked away at such an infraction, regardless of how meaningless it appeared to seem, he chose not to turn a blind eye on him. He had been watched for a long while and appeared not to press on it any longer. His knees fell in just thinking of it now. He could only hold so many things at once in there. Many times, at least many more times, had it happened, all to as of late for him to wrong Lorn in some way or another, which prompted him to be solemnly punished, no matter how he looked at it. For his inhibitions could only be as damaging as he allowed.

‘Don’t cross this threshold or I’ll make sure you’ll be taken again, right by the scruffs of the back of your throat, inside of it, then back through your skull.’

He thought as much. And not for a single second had he considered the alternative. The man was mad, he was looking for wild surroundings and for ways to push it through some uncanny feel he had of ingratitude for his service. But that was Lorn, he only remembered when he was wronged. He was the type of man who would be lynched otherwise, if he weren’t in power, the type that seemed to have his friends and fellows sparse and in-between. He was not looking for a way out any longer, only some way to get back at him for all the years he had spent in his employ, which didn’t add up to much any longer.

Since he looked for no other reason to be alive, other than the fact, which was in place, one way or another, he looked for something to gobble. Another job, another piece of meat to look at, she owed him something. She owed the chief something and it seemed like the day of pay approached.

It was borrowed time he was on. Gern knew that long before he set out or knew where he would be prodding from this point on.

‘They’re not going to allow themselves to work to death, are they?’

‘I’m sure they will. Since it’s an acceptable alternative Lorn could put them through.’

It was plain to see that he knew what he was talking about, at least after a while, when they started tiring themselves out. They couldn’t see sense, so they had to be made to feel it. Otherwise, there would be no emotion widespread between the four of them. All present, now sitting against one of the long rack in which all of the tools had been completely misplaced. For the lack of a better day, they spent the night in the same extended room, which appeared to be one of the top apartments in the cheap hotel they rented. Lights were somewhat dim and appeared only to prod around when they could not help it. Some fingers were crossed, but it was wishful thinking, trying to get a word in when the phone rang.

‘I see, I’ll make sure everything’s in place, sir. Don’t worry, I won’t disappoint you if I can help it.’

Took his damn time, whereas they had already prepared themselves to wait for it, in whichever errand being made for, they couldn’t listen to the talks any longer. It was harmful, trying to see how it was turning over the tide. Even blasted in some way, the taint of the walls which came off.

‘Where have you taken us to?’

‘Don’t worry about it, most of it is normal. It’s an after-effect of the drugs both of you were administered before we entered the county.’

Long drive, twelve hours, both of them were mostly placing, a pad of swords holding them down, tied around the bed, but hardly keeping them in place. If they wanted to leap out of hold, they could. Nothing stopped them, yet they knew better than to make noise. So they kept quiet for a while, keeping an eye on Gern and on LT.

The two workers tried, relentlessly so, to look for a refuge somewhere. It could only go so far into whichever direction. In their minds it had already been way too clear that they couldn’t leap out of the window and make it for the car. Fifth floor, both car doors locked and they could be tried for coercion. Especially after being caught; if they even made it that far, which wasn’t the case. Lt. had something on him, a revolver. It looked like an old mark-four which was only trimmed around the edges and had enough force to act like a tranquilizer for some eighteen pound mammoth.

‘It’s loaded. In case you were wondering, modified, call it what you want. Look at it for a while if you can. I’m not going to show it to you twice.’

He had something else prepared for them in case they considered going out that way. He was fast but he was a snake. Not even Lorn trusted Lt. As a matter of fact, that’s why they were placed together. A third partner entered the room. He had been done cleaning the chambers, he was dressed in floor-white, the insides of a stall looking just as incident as he did. He smelled of piss and looked not even closed to being satisfied with what he wore.

‘You done yet?’

‘Almost, I only need to make sure the scent wears off.’

It was as much as he could do now. Trying to fix everything around the outside of their room after their rough going and after their attempt to force the two workers in failed. It was pitiful, trying to see it happen. But after a while they accepted it. Worn out or not, they could see the rough marks around their necks. Heavily sedated, too much.

‘What did you do to them?’

‘We made sure they were quiet. What else do you did think we’d do?’

‘I don’t know, that’s why I asked in the first place.’

You could’ve inserted opium in their throats from all I know.’

He smiled at that. Of course he had, how else would this work exactly?

It could only go as far as passing through, but they didn’t listen any longer, more than they should. It felt lifeless, them trying to explain it any longer, not since half an hour later they died.

The Lt. lied, he did end up show them the revolver twice, and he made a large mess out of them as well. Not a clean scene either, they drew too much attention and had to leave.

‘Most likely the weather, officer, but I don’t think I saw who they were, I couldn’t identify them if you asked me to.’

‘Who is trying to enter my hold?’

From the access of green, that petulance within it started glowing until it could not retreat. No longer on the whim of the ones that faded from around its insides, would he approach. But every step set him forth, towards the Magulant stones, the insides shone with the souls of the forgetful orators.

Balefully, he asked, by then no longer asked or watched to do as he was asked to, he listened to the mild pride, the disemboweled stride only pushing him to no worth’s ledger. Here, he asked for two of worth, of them not way opened but he was allowed to touch them as the vision loathed, never wanted and caught the lances of their led. Another man emerged and cried out to him:

‘I have seen worse fates than you could possibly imagine.’

And I have finally come to my end’s meat. For it is of no worth that I may wrong myself and further my exploration, and lose my mind.

He was silenced.

As well as he could be.

Robert White had lived a long and prosperous life, it seemed. For some reason he appeared to be younger than he had been.

‘We don’t need anyone now, as long as we are here, we can immortal, we don’t how to set out there, we won’t have to be mistreated, we can.

We can.

We can be safe.

Look around us, there’s no one who’s going to look at us as if we’re different, no one make us feel as if we don’t belong. It’s perfect.

The halls are set, the floors are polishes, there are no ends, there are no ways they shall keep us down and we can think and say whatever we desired. Right as we planned.’

And there was madness in his eyes, but it was not vile, it was simply the right kind. The one that made you forget and never question anything else. It was pure. It was almost divine. It was the supreme escape.

The place where even gods died and had their bodies rot and with their deaths, they brought no ruin, no fall of no civilization, nothing that existed, never to have emerged, in the same way a pointed cancer of which brush strokes could ever return.

‘And for the time being, we should torture this dolphin and open it up.’

Therefore, from that point on, they brought the modified dolphin further in and started prying into it, with little paws, made out of metal canine raw-chipping ankles, which had been rolled and properly stored inside wooden stoves which burned with eye-formulas.

One of them took its tails, the other, its flipper, though the bottom side which appeared to have had only a single human larvae pointer, a joint made out of eighteen arms, a leg that had been completely pushed inside itself, and a single remnant of the maker, whose entire torso got pushed in an inverted gut, a malady which was brought to its knees, though it fought still so, against the breeders, dead.

A mansion burned.

The lad joined, the Count, in ploy, and ever-after, looking at both of them, while the Compatriot had lain this side.

Dmitri, spelled like a man a tree, its voice looked upon a place soon to be grown, out of some wicked hold and the making of a bold fallen structure which had lain underneath it. As no barn laid beneath, nothing but a vine-cellar, which seemed his and his only hope to grow in power. It never pushed the lonely shower of a distant rain, which dripped aside, the bottle’s craze.

He had undertaken this responsibility as his own, now that the mansion was nothing else but a wild pile of flowing ashes which, in their flight, managed to saw a postman’s fingers off while he was on his towards the main road. In the parcel, past the crane, of which apparition had only revealed the colors of pink, which almost made the symbol real, for it bred like a man here, in the gut and everywhere.

‘A body, the body of a man is there, underneath the fence standing.’

‘Look away and don’t approach it, there’s something wrong about that house.’

And there was something which was wildly misplaced there, an image which had almost made it look as haunted as in the day it had been split in half. But that had been another time and they were no longer to dine on watching, nor could they help it but stare.

A few feet away, standing, like a small cottage, which only grew shorter, holding the tools inside, by now many of which were in the making of the a man. An after-shadow belonging to someone was there, left alone and never disturbed by anyone who came alone. There, they would see that there also marks for fearing, as his life had never yelled, nor yearned, no result and ever-crashing. Through the mass of corpses, watching, he had met the shade of another man.

‘But what will happen to me now?’

His echo could only be allocated to the broken mind he bore inside. And the mass of tar which amounted inside, locked inside and in the making, always watching over the ground.

Outside, from the sight of burning, where he yearned to look benign, there seemed to be something storming, as half the ashes marked themselves. Letter in the making of disease, one would have to prize himself uncannily as he would prick his fingers in.

‘Half the mansion’s missing.’

Another echo seemed to shout.

It disturbed poor Dmitri, as he heard them argue above the highly raised grounds. He hated being around the rocks, as they called them, in the locks of the cellar, where he could only see the light lifting the mood during the night. A family had lived there, and he feared something about them, this location and just about everywhere he could stare. He feared to ask and even thought lesser of himself as he would imagine himself surrounded by many of the inhibitors of the old house. In his place.

‘I see that there’s another commotion.’

‘Shall we resolve to flee towards the cellars?’

‘Please don’t.’

The boy protests. He closes his mouth, with an immediate crest upon his tongue. A bite like it had never crowned him, nor would it cower him inside. Abashed and wonderingly, placing his finger wrongly on the dumb-lit, he stood there and stooped low, wondering what would happen if the coffins rowed. He couldn’t account for it any longer, nor had he any chance to face the demise of the cellar being flooded, though it was no water, only wine and he couldn’t help himself, up-blind. To no purpose, would he care to stray, nor could he care about it in any other way. He had imagined his life better than that, other than going through the motions which had forced him on the poorly made raft on top the two coffins he made.

And scouring himself as he met him, the peculiarly deformed man who rowed, who'd bring him on the other side, never to know if he could come back.

'You burned and blasted, your way back lasted no more than two days' worth of return.'

To which he only dreaded, least of all, to ask.

'Where am I going to be taken now?'

'We shall row towards no place that exists yet, in its bowels we shall see the rest of the world and seethe no longer after the watch.'

He contemplated on what he'd done, never asking, he was done for now.

Thence there was the other man, the one who died with dignity and had gone through the alacrity of vileness, priding himself with nothing else he could put his thoughts through. Thoroughly deformed under the arm, he followed Hern around.

Compatriot said nothing, as he chose to return to the roofs. A few weeks passed since he woke up and he had never considered returning until he was truly needed and in search for something close to it now.

'I called you here.'

Another man.

'Could you please check every pane and every roof-Dane for something that might've been done? Someone should've left at least a clue of their killings.'

But the children were all gone as were the remnants of their many brothers who had lain paralyzed, their necks remained somewhere in the sky. Floating in the distance, but unseen by them, corroded by some gluttony which poured in and changed the waves, because of them, nothing could remain in the same way as they had been. Whatever was seen before could not come to be of the same stock, the bitter clock ticking in days.

'I think we should take a break from the search.'

'Already? We barely started.'

He pointed around, nowhere near the ground but to some place up close, near which they seemed to have risen from, one by one like tainted garden gnomes in search for whom was missing. Pissing themselves for the shimmers their spines, and never asking why were there adults there again? Have they come to kill them again?

First it were the scouts, that must've been their scouting party, as there would be no reason to believe otherwise, they sent one of their diplomats.

And the necks started producing dogs of pus and long baring crane-like brass, out of which the hands that came after, in the disemboweled being which came after, could only sing from two front-ends. Both of which appeared to have erected themselves in two knots, unable to procreate with the faces that did not speaking of no lost days. In cancerous dances, the flying ships, in large heaps of lunges, the bitter dominance of simple tendons threw everyone in town in various trances, from which the colors merged. No longer were they on the roof top, but on a wild auburn-green and yellow reddish, pushing through some bitter will which passed.

‘Hang yourself now, friend of Hern.’

And he had done so without judging what was going on. Nor could he master what he was saying, praying for himself during a day through which time could not pass properly any longer.

‘Another man lynched.’

In the sky, the rope had a blind spot which remained that way, until the Compatriot introduced himself as the lazily defiler his attire pushed itself on top of him. Hanged again, another man, asked no longer, but he chose to do it, rightly to the man. Whoever passed, another cross, and they had dined with death another time.

‘I see there is a need to hear.’

But the voice did not appear this time around. Something changed with the vileness which passed their heads. As it happened for death itself never to stop them, as these pretenders started digging inside their necks, deep through their throats, until the very voice constructs emerged, there spilled the blood, painting the roof tops in dull-purple. Prunes for the talk.

And Elliot, who was one of the first men to have killed himself walked and talked of strange strings which started pushing in his toes, replacing them with an uncanny wrongness his parents, the giants centipedes had spoken off. During a time like this, when peace rang in his ears, Hern could only think of the moon and the various stages through which he could only fear what went through his head. Dead, dead, dead, then quiet, a few shots from his flintlock.

‘Fool, Trencheon of mad thought, did you not realize that you cannot shoot more than once?’

‘What have I fired then?’

Bubbles-of color, or what seemed to be brush stroked circles which would’ve seen one another in any other way. Pain could not defile their minds, and they would now feel the pain of a sky which was of no purple, but the guts of the man walking with a pricked head.

‘Pinned around the making?’

What had happened? There was no reason for the bridges to be placed on top the tops. Of wood malignant and the mad, yet the children recognized the man, and chose to ignore the others who were very much dead and unable to return to pass. In the making of the brass, a finger snatched. Another followed, never counting up until the shallow composition of his innards started to change, into a mechanism which would not contain the proper working hear of a mammal but something similar to it which pumped. Through it, a few annexed, smaller holes moved on and appeared to suture everything they left behind as they moved, with long wiry heart-wires, made out of the matter which built the heart. Plenty of lungs could somehow be seen.

‘I saw it.’

From the round night, when the other colors came about, there were yellow cockroaches coming from below the stars and on them, no one rode but a single man whose name was known as Alabaster, the man who appeared as a contrast to all mad events. He missed it once and never passed. Unable to call it off, he fell. High heavens filled with glowing insects would tell of his tale and look as their only human solider came never to have been well. In the head and in the body, broken as he would be nobody, broken to the needs, breeds died as well as cats, dogs, mice, rats, birds, and even some crocodiles which were there.

But mostly him, a man who survived the initial fall, only to be aimed at by Hern, which even the children warned not to shoot the man, instead, he could be spared.

‘No, I think I’ll take his life because I can actually do it and I shall.’

He spared no second more and shot the man while he was on the ground, with broken hands and knees and faces, all of which did not belong to him, in all the trenches, this was the war.

And the children ducked, so did he and the dead men, as the Obsidian hybrids could only push onto that field the Compatriot was still on. Unable to control himself, he swiveled and wished for no luck, plucking one of his eyes off, going twenty feet back into his house, where he would pick a fake eye from one of the many cabinets he held inside.

Not before he took the rifle, from the gun cabinet, where he expected them to thrive on his affairs. Many of which were unspoken for, as it would be unfair. Asked and brought to justice, pissed in the head, dead in twenty minutes if they made it through the line, but he would not give up, no longer pressing on instead. He abandoned the little faith he had and chose to walk around on unsteady ground, until he found a single reason which may ring true to his head.

‘If I move, I’m dead, so I’ll stay inside the house.’

Which prompted him to sit in the same spot with them as the bombs dropped, first in the line of many, of which, none were real, all made out of the same color which afflicted this world. A sky, unlike theirs, many people out of color, there, here in the making of the poor. Some of them looking like the famed Moors of Spain, invaders who looked like chocolate pores. Dosed in gasoline which brought the fire head on as they lighted themselves only for this distraction, an attraction, as regretful as it would come; nothing about him would sound right. A delight like this could settle no one on their stark and moisture. Departing from the farther lands; in which they pitted themselves.

‘I shall cut the bear of brown and green, his shades made by Pushkin.’

In one of his many stories which dwelled between the days, the pass. About this day, nothing came about, only the morose and the lack of dancing, which made the colors fade to blue. An ever-quiet hiding spot, he fell through the roof and ended up in an abandoned roof.

‘If only I were to stay here, I know I could force myself to survive.’

As much as he could survey the area, he hadn’t a single care in the world, other than to dye the walls in the colors of the burrows.

‘We were made out of one piece and that’s the problem, you can’t see it yet.

But if I die here, so will you and no amount of attempts might pull me back.’

Through the filth tunnels and through the uncannily forlorn, one of them, and a no one nonetheless; the first signs of an outsider which started fitting in.

‘An end of a cause and the beheading of a small child, it’s what the books pointed towards and we shall only see the degeneracy of the language proceeding forth.’

‘Which leaves us with only one last chance, we have to give it all and deform all, so none may touch any of this.’

There was a break. It served as nothing else but a reminder.

‘We got this far.

The end of the break is over. We tried, and if we cannot do it, it’s simple.

We shall proceed with our initial plan.

We shall end our lives, rather than face the loss of everything we both strived for, partner.

That way, there won’t be any consequences for the fall. There will be no repercussions for what we’ve done.’

And upon the failure, there would be none to judge, if anything, there would finally be a sign of awe. Compassion from someone, in the lone crowd; but something happened nonetheless. There was no voice to guide this whole plane of existence, nothing to give life after. If one were to search far enough in the bowels made by the entire heaviness of the. Didn’t matter much, it didn’t make any difference as long as someone came and pushed a word in.

‘We cannot force you to do it if you don’t want it.

You either commit to it, or you shall feel its ends. And at each writhing corner, you shall face the bodies of all the dead men and women you left behind, all because you were too selfish to continue.’

No clarity came out of his voice either, only the swollen time and the dimes which entered his towering mind, one which lost.

‘I can’t do it.’

Said the man, right before the first blood had been drawn, un-blue and through it only one could see how much degeneracy had remained. But it was pointless past a point, degrading, ever-present and never-ending as.

Still empty.

During one of the prime years in the Enclave.

There were plenty of times they could've worn each other off if they tried it. During some of them, beneath the central valley upon which they build the grounds, there had been one simply exchange between two central holds.

It started moving in unison with the other cities upon the grand rails between the sand-stalk terminal and the deep rocked mountain fire pit upon which the chains held it from being swallow behind and below the feet of the grit.

Some pillars had been raised along the tunnels, not for any support, but as a homage to the original builders, hoping that they might one day feel their constant beating coming from the vibrations being sent throughout the ground after they pushed through the rails and let go of themselves.

Two eights, it was all they needed before they could put it back together.

'We're still yet to build it.'

'Can you see it well enough?'

'No, not yet, what is it?'

They pushed through the first points where the heads met with the bodies and looked no further than they had to. It was a given that neither of them wanted to continue the progress on the machine. Something misfired from it, and for a moment the world shook. It was a meaningless wave, which should've gone as soon as no one remained in the room. Yet they found themselves unable to open the door. As butter knives would turn and twist away from a chef's hand upon the strong pull coming from a single strong magnet. For a moment, faded, the will inside their eyes as their nails turned towards their writ's ends. Most of them were normal men, scientists who was worked as well as they could throughout their lives, never meeting any of that false mundane hope life provided.

Slowly the pull came, but there was no gravity involved in the process. Instead they seemed to have become something asking to dust, cut in halves by the aerial power the machine pushed on. Yet nothing else in the room appeared to converge the power through which it drew upon.

Somewhere it was cold.

Lucky, lucky growing hairs, hardened by their bodies, a lot of globules would be harnessing the wretch. How much of it would there be at its base, if one were to pull. They munched slowly on ribs and could only listen when the time came with the help of their feet to the unnatural guttural sounds that managed to overcome their minds, but plaster entered the hold. And a home lay there, in a block of cold. In a giant ice-cube, surrounded by eighty-one recycled and flattened tanks which held the heat from spreading around, leaving everything exposed. Watching how they melted and formed the inner shell of the house was satisfying. It was the most satisfying feeling to be achieved by anyone who was even remotely human or looked humane in any case.

A simple family lived in there, looking for a way out in any case, though they could not be denied anything going on around them. It was too harsh of a condition to be entirely dismissed, yet they suffered of shell-wrong, a mind was gone. That of the father, he was out of the picture, not there, as he set out for the cold weather, never wanting any better.

‘The nerve gas has done much for our family.’

A mother of four, but all of them had their mouths at the back of their throats, digging deeper in what appeared to be another stomach. And it showed as well as each child had eight necks, all sprouting into nothingness as they bore no extra head. But each of them had mouths, and for every mouth, as it was said. On more than one occasion, they’d eat each other’s children. Acts of incest and profanity disjointed them from reality. They were only acting as they would, in a nature which only shook the brain, left to act. Whatever happened after that could not be pressed on them. As one should know and never throw one eye in doubt. Wretched singers, now were gone.

Likely but not so, within the period of incubation, the inner stomach had turned their outer limbs into large grapplers, placed everywhere around the giant tank they lived in, though that was not a single tank but a tank welded and combined with a cruiser, and the strange insides of a nuclear submarine, with all the machines being somewhat functional in one way or another. Not to bother any sight, it was unclear what other vehicles there were in that fold, though one could see the strangely green tinted wings as well as the engines of a plane attached to them. Little to the thought, they were only spreading their giant arms and limbs around their house, outside and everywhere, where they’d be warmed by the peculiarly placed tanks. Some would fire, disembowel and turn their insides into the outside of a cattle meeting his butcher-gut. A cleaver for each son, only to be reached again, and they shared nothing but the fear of the other day.

‘What had father brought us?’

The father was a flying torso, which bore a few fake planted roots coming from below of him. He arrived through one of the metallic holes and visited his children which were only worse. And had gotten worse and worn out since the limbs acted on their own accords and they refused to share what went on. Inside of them, there lay prisms of the wrong making, made out of bloated duds. Many of the rockets had been clearly aimed and launched against them, in order to put them out of their misery. Even metal knew remorse at that.

Then he would be asked at last.

‘Do me well, bearer of my children, for I have finally come clean and brought you something within.’

‘What did you bring me then?’

It was a tail, the giant tail of two mammals which could only pushed out of him and tell their story.

On how they got here; truth be told, they looked like whales, but they weren’t, at least not inside, and they were as small as fish would be, or the common snapper, which explained why the father was there for a reason the others couldn't explain. He stored everything inside of him, even the keys and the other most inconspicuous knives he planned on terminating his family with. He was living through the matches, and every fire brought the innards, a passage.

'We came through a distant passage in a day of May. And I could see that we would be shattered by the largest naval-fleet that thought might convey. It was everywhere.'

The other whale intervened.

'The top of every ship looked like the upper waist of straight-placed Spartan warriors which had been forced together, through their insides, until one of them grew too wide to be covered, died and started rotting inside the other until the only one standing was the one in the front. And the other ones from behind appeared to be kneeling down and entering the tunnel made through his chest.

Inside that tunnel, there was a canon made of bone. As it excavated through the remaining meat, one could see the servants of the occult coming out of the Spartan chambers, encased in common thoraxes that masked their mandibles and pushed out.'

'And then we died.'

'We were shot and we died, and the water got destroyed as well.

Humanity died out there because I could not hold my mouth shut.'

It was true enough, they could not help it. But so much damage had been done, that they had been missing their upper jaws, and were only in debt of being saved and throwing it all to waste seemed to be, nothing. Passing through the common-askers, some were satiated during the disaster and appeared to drink out of the blood of a twin-strap, a false neck which attached itself to the Father-torso.

'May the Father-torso then appear?'

'I've come near you, now that our children are fed with the mammals, shall we proceed with the process through which I may inseminate you?'

'There's no reason for you not to.'

Thence they listened to reason and as they had, they paid their respects after that, and entered bed, laying together after a while, unable to understand the writings on the walls. Most of them were of a gibberish of the highest kind, lacking in wont.

It didn't matter, she was there for a reason, her legs didn't work properly, anatomically inhuman, and by the looks of it, there was something pushing out of the back of the head, pronounced until it forced itself like the body of a bovine, with an archer on top, who held a bow of bones, covered in muscle and everything which pushed out of it were small saw-like longer fingers, which looked as if they bore no eyes, but that would not satisfy the wretched priest, of whose incantation had given form, a live of their own, to every manifestation of a saw that lay in the folds of the universe. Taken as if they were fools, they could not look anywhere else, but the tools of their doings.

It was hard felt, seeing her split her legs for him. As the entry was wrong, botched at large, and the sight and the doing shall not be spoken off.

Twenty giant centipedes, had entered through the metallic lungs that the tanks bore in their large antler ant-shaped large horizontal sheets which were used to cut through the ice and through the metal, then spread by each side until they could enter inside and watch the colours of fake rainbows being reflected inside the aurora that came. Within the end of the century, they saw only the machination of the flying soldier, made out of glowing sharply tongued colors.

‘I wish to challenge you to a fist-a-cuff if you don’t mind the challenge. I think it so, unless you’re cowardly and unless I ought to know of something better, I think I’ll take my chance and have you.’

They leaped out of their way, fighters of which souls not even the light of dawns could convey such heat, that even the ice started melting and pushing through, below their feet. Mighty actors, giants who had resurrected, yet stood there like frozen anchors. But giants of which kind? They were limbless and appeared to have a strange turn, the whirl of a giant hive which pushed inwardly, until they receded to a single point. As soft as they looked, there was nothing of this race that shook the world or made it so they would enable. No destruction could be conveyed, and there was gluttony on its way.

Carried from another world. They were frozen, but were being fed by the manifestations of meat inside their bodies, ending. Letters of misgivings would only push as they enabled them to draw out. They also wore, around the upper-mid chest cavity, outwardly stretch to a twenty degree angle, fourteen hundred miles in length, looking kindly deprave, through the headings of a single largely accosted tongue, which beat like the fealty of a single drum. Largely abated, their heads were too empty to be caught. Brought ot their knees, the giants would not fall.

They held the cube and the house from falling over.

Outside, farther away, where another tiny Laplander was communicating with the long-reindeers, he’d been caught instead. Upon losing his compassion, even for a single second, needn’t it be accounted for, the Lapp had been shot, but a hunter with another one of those fancy flintlocks, bemused by the skill of a hunter who would not have grinned any other way.

‘I am Grindk and I have claimed another life. With this, I bring another one of you to servitude.’

But he could not finish it in doubt. Many of the hard towering firewood listened with ears that would shake even those who would not listen to fish. Or push against the pressing and storing of food before the wreckage came. He could not remain in time and listen. It was a land, after all where even timber had blisters that would not come to fall. In the midst of the fall, of a single comet pushing through it as one could be shaken by the sight, no wonder that so many of them chose to hide.

Winter was unforgiving to all in sight. That could not be forgotten as well as it would be pushed away, from the lights. Fading just like the warning shots which had been launched during the day. And they didn’t know when it might fall of why.

‘Another one might come unless we pay attention to what’s happening in the north-tusk.’

‘Then we’ll go there, if we have to, but I don’t do that by choice.’

D'Argos

Among the plains of Sicily, out there, in the flanks came the Sicilian hares. They planted themselves in soft dirt and came only out during the night, when they had spied upon themselves during nights of Easter. Various mockups would be accepted, or so they called them, in actuality they were nothing more but an excuse for them to seek some kind of release and come out into the vile nature of the city-watch. Near the aqueducts which had been left by various peoples who had once inhabited the place, they climbed on top of them and watched the city lights fade into the midst of night.

‘Waking hour is coming, the waking hour is coming. Make sure you bar your windows and don’t leave the house.’

Then came the bells as the hares could be heard from the distance as they traveled through their musky smell of rancid dirt. In it they buried themselves in tiny moles and appeared to have thrown themselves long-after through deformed horn-like contours which forced their heads to shimmer in, and come out as long and twisted as those ivory things they replicated during the sounding of the alarms. They were mobile nonetheless, there was none they could impress or try to wager during a time like theirs.

Various watches were set but the men could only do so much to prevent a widespread invasion of this kind. Rabid paddles were set around the river, those would be well placed and stir the waters as their disgust spread.

In as much as twenty hours, most people would not know what to know once the water supply started hardening.

Nor could they deal with the constant nuisance which spread about the place.

‘Cecillio, I’m done with it. I managed to cover every hole in town.’

‘Good, I think you did great, son. I’m glad to have you by my side now.’

There’s not much you could do any longer, so take a rest.’

‘But father, I still think we could do something to deal with the hares, perhaps we could.’

‘That would be enough, Cecillio. Come, join me.’

Didodo pushed one of the extra chairs out, before he invited his son to join him. They were not trying to impress one another with the amount of effort they had put in it but they relented at least. It was strange, after this much effort to see it all crumble in front of his eyes, but it was just as much as he could do. Wishful thinking at best, which was a contagion could not take them away from what was going on there.

‘Father, I why are there no more roses in Sicily?’

When we last sat together, long before, when mother still lived, you spoke to me of a time when the lands of Sicily had been one of the pink gems of Italy. During a time where roses grew in the land, when its heart was luscious, pure, filled with beauty.

Long before the invaders came through and marched on us and our backs. When we were in charge, when there was nothing to be taken away from the land.'

During such a time, he had cherished his stories most, as they spoke of nothing less than some peculiar, world which was uncannily out of his reach. Where the spikes were holding the barbarians back, down the shores and their giant roots planted themselves inside their boats as they prevented further inquiries.

During such a time they had lived peacefully secluded for the longest of time, when the long line of evil, the servants had been dormant in their buds.

And they were pure themselves and untouched by the likes of Greeks, by the Italians or the barbarians who they themselves saw them as naught else in return. It was only during a time like that they found solace in the words of chanteys, and old sailors' vests which were left ashore.

'I wish I could visit such a Sicily one day.'

Cecillio had not only wished it, but he had done his share of planting during winter, during summer, during the days after. And they had been untouched, in a land of hares who would devour everything in their path, that they would end themselves rather give in what they had taken from the land of man.

Further on the lands of Sicily.

'The sun's still up, isn't it?'

'Sure it is. It should be up there for a few more hours, shouldn't it?'

'Come on then, the hill shouldn't be that far now.'

She smiled. He followed.

It wasn't far now. Only a few more lays out there, off the road, at a point where there was no verdure of asphalt or stone. Past it, they went. It was never of matter of going out like that. Only that seeing the sun rise left no ripples spreading through.

There was no sky nor water, only the hill. And they made it there before the rain.

'I think you should wait at the base of the hill, just in case something might happen.'

'Don't worry, I will. I think I will. Nothing should happen, right?'

'Not if I can help it.'

The boy was named Charles and he held her hands. Charles stood with her for some time now and refused to go until she gave him the pass. It felt like it would take some time, despite all being somewhat too disgusting to be contained.

All of them formed the hill, I could see them, in the insides of dirt, they all hid from me. I wanted to pull them off like ants from the insides of a dirt-hive, but I couldn't.

They were in there, deep in there, grasping one another as they dragged each other back, unable to handle themselves, unable to control themselves. Pitiful attempts followed and they prompted the hatred, all of them. Many hands were unattached, yet they were set in flight from one corner to another, trying to grasp for something while being unable to creep about. Such arrogance was unmet. Both Charles and the girl were taken from the spot as they were dragged deeper inside with little to no way to defend themselves. A show of force was somehow needed. IT drove everyone to create and destroy.

But those inside the hill were unable to contain it all. Hatred drove no hand of creation, which in turn only ripped the boy and his girl to pieces until they could not fathom living any longer. They were as they looked, no match for the amount of pain and the pouting and the deciding factor which had been their deaths and the pain spread between them before they were shaped into nothing. Ripped apart, only a great piece of a great token, a zirconium isotope like fiend emerged, though it had a colour and looked surreal, from the implosion that came into it, there popped the cube-shaped pillar which had taken over the hatred they shared between each other as they drove forth.

'I see the light in there, no eyes.'

But the maniacal cackle could not define no end and no woe, nothing which might cross too far and nothing that would even pass.

'We were supposed to be the only ones making it on the other side, what happened to the plan?'

It didn't go through. Wearing it would mean a body was well-worn. There was a floor, somewhere around the place. Infuriating to the bit of the bone, chow was being spread between them, under the supervising unit, he could not tell. Nor would he try to munch on it under. Regardless of plains being wasted and the breeding proceeding through, they could not fathom seething at their marks. Lesser beings followed as well, between their ranks.

Some followed, some remained but neither or, nor could they feign the quietness which faded through. It was a blessing which had to be passed, and lesser blessing through their ranks.

'I see that we need to dine.'

'On my time.'

'I already told you that I'll find a way to make up for it.'

'How?'

'Not in this lifetime, perhaps in the other, but I shall somehow find you and make sure to treat you like one of my brothers, even though I may not fully recognise you by any means.

I'd still do it, by whichever credence and the cut. Through you and only through you am I able to see the world.'

'And why is that?'

‘This’ because you’re the only one that remained pure, after everything which went on here, inside the hill, for everyone who entered and was lost, you’re the only one I take at heart. As my true and only disciple, my friend ever since the arrival of my mind and the consciousness which pressed me on to do what I’m doing.’

The old could not fathom competing with the new again, out of the habit. No more of the new, a replica went through at an unprecedented rate. It wasn’t worth it, seeing them eye to eye again. Only their like should remain there and none would remember what happened from one day to the other, that was the order as which mankind performed best. But they were not men, yet they emulated their success out of jealousy. It came out as a result of pulling so many humans in by force. No one said a thing, nor would they do it out of fear, but they got close to it, soon and always, like a spiral that never wanted to stop from its endless turns that resulted into nothing.

Just like that, it so happened that Charles had been at Copenhagen eight months before showing up in front of the hill. It showed up on his face at first when it happened, like the biting tongue of a mad psychosis that refused to let go of him, until it had been too late for him to survive. Accidents happened.

On the streets, Dutchmen happened to be there, signing as the Frenchmen followed. Some Germans were there as well, with their flags, but no one noticed the passing birds who only appeared every once in a while, then left like the bitter things they were. Since they only made their wildlife chanting, and in the making, past the lighting, through the small globular spots, their nests were made out of pure emotions. Some had faded, some had passed, but none made it too far, nor would they be outlived. Not too far in the making, they listened to nor words and saw no anchors dragging them past the worth.

He had a word with one of the generals, who had been stationed near the soldiers in a blue December light. It was night, in other places but there, it felt like they overlapped from time to time, from a world where night’s eternal. And he refused to show emotion, fading.

Pale moons spoke at last, and each of them headed during the night. Whilst speaking, a hare began prodding through. It wanted to see something as it made way to the last one.

But there was something in the distance, past the coast.

A small lab located somewhere unknown, flown beyond the Di’Dorko mansion, past their lives, past Italy and far into the land.

It was planned on for some time now, all those failed attempts lead to a single modified bee, spawned from the insides of hundreds of them, all inside of his head. Flying by now, kept after he pushed all those microinjected larvae in his head. They began growing nicely and it seemed as if the location drew farther from the south and closer to the eastern side, where clarity was benign, where he could not help himself but push it even deeper in. His head grew in just about every direction, just like a parasite worm inside the head of a snail, wreathing even harder upon being met by the presence of wings, in flight. The room of his laboratory was endless in height, depth, and even length, no less in wonder. So it appeared. And so had he concluded most if not all of his experiments, while no longer in need of stairs, he could reach the various platforms at any time without wearing himself off, without giving off the slightest hint of a doubt to himself or to others. His larvae were in need to eat.

‘Luckily for me, I planned on this.’

He said as it seemed, his eyes were a pair of needle pricks against a toe, slits that would not be seen, as they drew all the space and all the mass of skin from his face, until nothing was left there, let alone a way for him to look in whichever direction. He was satisfied knowing that he had become what he wanted. And for that, he would reward everyone in the room. Even the people who shook and were tied to their chairs, they would be rewarded just as well. Some struggled but this was for the greater good, it wasn't in need of understanding. The essence which spoke to him, the genes which he had injected himself appeared to develop in some kind of rockier outsider, a crust which was made out of their buzzing eyes. Laced and rounded, and even hairs, he's inflicted something upon himself, a special breed of the fruit fly, the arachnid spectre, the mosquito addition and other strands which were similar in look. Yet they could never grow nor develop. Instead, they appeared to be permanently stuck in that wild form, their prototype in some way, from which they would never grow out of.

Regardless of their state, it seemed like he had developed long legs out of his face, pushing out of his nostrils, mouth and the back of his head. And they were not normal, they were rather, a combination of both his arms and the wild things that they could grow into, yet they were denied. And they had mouths at each end, leading to the digestive organs they all shared, all of the larvae which were bouncing and wriggling out of him. By now the doctor had lost any kind of human mentality, or, known it be, it somehow mutated inside their heads. Which even more confused him so as he lost the lower half of his trunk which left him flat in there; although no blood came out of him, which made it even stranger, as he had a drawn pattern which would not belong in there, otherwise caught, with all the marks and all the drawings, all the lights which were illustrated there. He appeared to bear a moving sight. A tiny sun-like termite-carapace thrower came out, strung upon a thinner leg, followed by a small hive he bore inside himself, and the entire lower-part of a man, which was held by sticks.

At first he seemed to have been inhibited by a desire to entertain the people, right before he could possibly feast on them. Yet that desire could not be satiated, nor could it be taken by him as anything else but a gluttony's fool, he did not understand what went through his head, nor why they considered him a fool. Which meant he thought after all; leading to the act of mercy, he used his longer human arms, by now, being segmented in what appeared to be eight, or ten feet longer than usual, bringing them to an even sharper end. It was not meant to be, he pulled all of them, ripped them to shreds and threw them out of its way.

Feeding began, he ate them with the long straws that came with him. With the lack of a lower addition, it seemed like he finally dropped the innards-sack, which held the remains of every man he ate and could no longer digest. Like a living spider devouring a suitor, he kept some of them, through the transparent bag of his, alive. Though that may not have been their normal kind of behaviour, it appeared like that didn't matter in a bit. This was nothing else but a trap of insects, many of which returned home to pay respects to their new founder, one whom could not even fathom their existence for too long. Instead, he was caught in it, and he would feel what ought to be. Pain, and pity, as they received the leftovers after he had been done eating, none the matter, the shelf-life was about to run short. He was limited, he knew he'd expire. Which left himself exposed, through which wonder, he ate the bodies, rotten carcasses from the cut he made in his own sack, then he threw the regurgitated matter on top of the smaller ones so they might get a chance to feed and push through their feed without losing themselves in the confusing corners that were in his house.

His house being rather a three piece, which was below the laboratory, which in itself was kind of like an attic standing on top of all of them; that left the other rooms of the house exposed. They looked like three houses of their own, if seen from the side, if cut from around the bloc, if pushed through and gotten a better look, and the sight could not have shaken no man. For he alone would feel disgust as he would tell of something, life was wreathing, it needed some kind of disease. It needed peace during a time where they were manifold, and erected themselves when they had no worth.

But there was nothing in the building working on its own. There were other people trying themselves around. It was cruel. Seeing him in a place he looked into. All the while but no meaning to their heads, they pushed themselves out of it and could only see them go past the clouds, as the earth seemed to curve against each iris until they were no longer able to get out of the way. Outside the building, they were drawn, slowly taken through the wind of the sun. But there were no first, second or third degree burns, one could draw as much from them, as each of them could not be gotten.

Elegance

There was no distinction in their high society, at least not any longer. Elegant stepped forward, making sure that both the Proto-being and Last were made aware they were not to interfere with him and what he had to carry through.

It was an ugly thing, trying to push through them, but he had come to no conclusion yet.

It went through his head then. Like a swollen pass of wind which titillated his turpentine beard off. He was shaved while sleeping but the sufferer could only know of insomnia during his pass through the first hallish moor that stood encrusted on a pane. He was widely open and spindly, almost to an uncanny view, which suggested a giant aqueduct-heavy plunge that came from the ceiling and left a hole through him. Its marks could be seen on the floor, still lying a few feet more than it should've. A small heaving substance only molded itself around his gashed, preventing any kind of mess from being made below him. He was still breathing, but it didn't matter. Something happened to him, a change in the face, which made it look split. But the split was perfectly done. He had been cut and in the pus, about the eight quarter' of any inch, there was a patch of Negro skin deeply embedded inside of him, despite the fairness his skin provided. Hardly breathing now, he only came to push out a single whisper that could not have been anything but short lived.

'What did he say?'

'Don't listen to him, he can't be approached any longer.'

'You've been here before.'

'I have.'

Filler was unsure on himself but that could wait. Something postulated from the Negro-patch. It was ruddy, too much so, that it started eating on itself and on the surroundings, like a plague trying to spread from mice and rabbits, all of whom were present there, in each corner, having taken the one and only task the presence appeared to have been completely set on over so many years. It was manifold, that it would try, ringing true to every kind of sleigh-weighted pore that started breeding and growing inside of him.

Then the man opened even farther, revealing the softness of the walls which kept him in place. They were not meant to be held that way, nor would they keep for long. He only wanted what was best for his wife. And she was there, in the softness, in part, not entirely put together but she would not leave his side. Despite part of his body being completely tied to the wall in which the parts of her swam in, he still managed to conjoin with her in a unity which was undeniably sickeningly disturbing. It created the voice, which only faded after saying a word.

Both Keyringer and Filler heard it. And that was not spoken about no longer.

Twa's how it seems to have happened.

Distant corner of the world, which, in through and pouting in honesty, the delegation of peculiar sparrows was restored, though they were unable to gather everyone off their ranks and into their morbid on-looking act, they fashioned themselves in a most surprised manner as they were presented the strangers.

Of which one, of all had disappeared, one had shied away and could not fathom surviving to long on his own while the other appeared to have shared a similar yet benign look to that of their own. But alas, it was not exactly mood by mood, they haven't been met, nor could they have understood what was going on or what had happened in the short span of only a few seconds, through which, he, of all started killing four of their sparrow kin, unable to contain himself within.

Their heads crunched under that wooden figure, as the bottom jaw and the upper jaw pushed in opposite directions, detracting one another as they munched on skin and bone like hammers on an anvil. But it couldn't it, it couldn't devour. Its actions were mostly pointless and it had only admonished itself into the killing, let alone the prying in seeping hatred it bore for all. Neither of them could even be met for the glance, as they went away, leaving the open targe as one would leave a stage, if all, he could look onto his dead-kin, in that moment where quietness brought peace, he would see its glimmering fake eyes. Through which no sparrow soul inhabited that creation, but more so, it seemed like there was something else pushing in its mad direction.

'It's as soulless as a wooden tool, an otter made of clay, pottery of their kind.'

'And who's the culprit who brought him here to begin with? May he not be punished for what he had unleashed upon us?'

To which Elegant could not fathom appearing, nor could he help disappearing at the most inopportune moments. When needed, yet called, he couldn't handle it, nor could he push it all out of his soul. For that one second he was lost in thought, no wonder. He wandered around and looked for an escape. When time came to be, he would simply take a leap out of the window and get as far out of it as he could possibly get. Otherwise, he would be dead. Swollen and forgotten, left alone to them, as rotten as they would be. Hanged and punished, gluttony, which inhabited the halls, it made everything push in as even the ball chamber they stood in appeared to be repelled by this act of sin. A most dangerous approach, uncannily morose, moronic, degenerate in act; an almost devilish pact, if they had known of faith in that degenerate world of theirs, which reflected even though it could only happen to push on and forth on both sides.

When in reality, the Proto-being was only munching on their heads off the ground. But luckily he wouldn't be seen, by stragglers who were lost, like Rot Jonathan, of which Rot had been a split of hair, a mind which had seemed to have taken a life of its own, as well as theirs, the dead wool merchant, but most importantly Muck. All of them were too blind of a kind to be disturbed and kindly pushed out of it, in a degenerate star, which seeped in but it was no star. It was the crow-moon, which seemed to set itself as it would barge. And set itself into a mighty trance, upon coming to the realization that it was looked upon and made of fool. Least of all, foolishly would it known of the swoon his standard bearers have come to make.

During such a time, though it was enacted, though he may me solemnly distracted, Elegant thought of the Duke. He was someone he wanted to prove he knew, somewhere in the past, during a time of which they couldn't have seen him last. And least of all, would they have known fear, as what happened there could not have happened anywhere; it just so be, that the sparrows took me. Thought Last during the last moments of his life, when he could not even face it himself. He was defenseless and unable to stand aside. He could not deny himself the prowess of mind, nor could he face them yet.

His muscle mass was thin, his bones were shaking and he was but a tiny strand of what he had been once, unable to contain himself to no land, nor could he contain the many scrapes and the scratches that came onto him. Proto-being saw him yet. Unable to act, instead, it only took the time it needed, to eat as many of them, long-so heeded by the fact. That it had not dared stray upon no act of wonder, least of all would it be stronger, the need to scalp them still, of feathers and of blood within and spill it, push it, least of trance. Fill it with the most uncannily degenerate acts.

It watched how they ripped Last apart, despite his protests, which were countered back, only with more blows, throng of many beaks that told of a man that did not put on a fight. It was pitiful after that.

A few flying saw-disks appeared which bore slanted-eyes on top of them, but unlike their predecessors which had eyes upon both opposite sides, these ones were much more evolved than them, stacking their eyes upon one another, which forced the sharpness of the strange locomotion to bear more fingers instead of every trimmed curve of the circle-head it bore and threw itself over. And they loomed around, with the song of looming, through which eighty dead men appeared to have fallen out of the sky, but they weren't seen as if they fell by Elegant and by Proto who could only tell this. They appeared out of nowhere, like ghastly sparks which bore themselves uncounted days before coming here, otherwise it could not be explained how they managed to look so worn out, while having mark of the fields upon which they themselves had once been through before the mildness of peril came onto them.

And the corpses had been alienated by the saws as they began molding one another, forming large plants, of which the bodies formed the base of the plant after scrapping themselves together, then the likes of peril pushing through as they had destined each other to a most disturbing nature. They were bashing, trashing and making wild sounds as the canopy of sounds curved below the rims, leaving the fruits to be made, which looked like Proto-beings.

‘More of them? What have we done?’

Of the council of sparrows which was present there, one and only one sparrow started saying.

‘We have harmed one of their own and there’s nothing we might do any longer but push ourselves as we make our home the ashes of the grave. An uncannily morose cave in which our bodies may lie. Not to die off in the sea of matter, the dark surroundings and the graves in which our father grew.’

But they could not see what was happening outside, where the sparrow heads, though still long-dead, tried leaping away, now unable to launch themselves out of the stark fear which pushed them out of it. No matter what they tried, this addiction of the cry forced them into the benign.

But the saw-towers which bred the beings were very much reach, of which no appeal could deal with an entire race, all of them being just as deranged as the material their creature had been taken from.

They had enacted an act of evil their kind wasn’t known for.

From the plant opened a finely curved straight but concave, with a spherical depth in the back which forced it to retract into the small plane it appeared to dwell in as the little beings came out. They were not the Proto-beings as the plants could only give birth to copies which were still-born since the Proto-being was never meant to be alive. Instead, they were the new-afters, bearing the bodies of locomotive, backs, through which open cracks inside their steel-long grimed bodies, which came from an underground tunnel which had become the breeding chambers of the saw-trees, there lay the many bodies of the Proto-being look-a-likes which were carried in the air. As the locomotive-bodies started pushing out, unable to see what had remained of the darted breedance, the abhorrent looks they bore. Instead of pushing through, unable to seethe as well as they could not face the cue of the aching, in the pain of pushing through the white feathers of stone, dropped by the moon-crow, they had finally enter their malignant heaven through which they delivered their young.

And though they had never bore any soul themselves, only those of infant which were trapped in the bodies resembling one fashioned out of a piece of furniture which had lain around, they could not wait any longer, no more prying, pitying themselves for what they’ve done wrong.

Strong bonds of evil lords, they looked upon them and mocked them forth. But unlike the knights of ivory, unlike the ones of gas, they knew better not to press on and annoy the white kings in the sky. Of which light shone so brightly that they could completely destroy everything and rinse it through the ground with nothing but an uncanny verdure made out of pure burning edifying delights. A plan of evil, it was set. Delighted in the dead-star shared foreheads of the mean serpentine poachers who had taken the bodies of their kin instead, the sparrows being bent underneath their arms, leaving Elegant to go ahead and leave without a smile or trance.

Why, this was delightful to see. It was dreadful at the same time, though no one could foresee what was about to come. Forward he went, along with all the sparrow shrimps which formed, with their smallish bodies pushing through as well as they could see the hue. And in the making they had sired, many sons of their own in the little time they’ve been given without daring to look and admire what went on. Through one of their heads, the many which bled and saw each other mistakenly in debt, none had decided the better and their leader could not wait any longer as to give them ever-so slight a chance for them to be killed again without the slightest chance being revealed.

‘Leave, oh bird’ oer’, or whatever you might be. Stop eating our kin, for we are not your foe and wish to bear no grudge upon you there and throe’.

Elegant could not believe his ears, after the making, after seeing this court of theirs adjourn. He could not fathom straying forth, he could not wait and wait no more. He had mistaken himself for someone with no cowardice and appeared, as their brethren, the corpse of Last, to which he shed no tear, as he neared Last. Past him, there was the door. It waited and wasted no second for his heart wished for something which might bear his soul farther in and least of all away. He wanted to be out there, safely returned to the higher-heavens, knowing that he would be rewarded for this act of terror he had carefully orchestrated, or at least, the one he would take claim over. Whether or not that happened because he willed it so didn’t matter, nor would he show any compassion for them.

The Proto-being was on his side as well. It would do as I please and I shall only go with it when needed.

‘And with that, I think I shall be a stranger no longer and wish to bid you well, fare thee well, I take my leave.’

‘But you cannot simply go, while knowing that you’re the one who brought this monster into our court, which had become a laceration. I’ll be damned if you’ll be allowed such ingratitude at it.’

‘So be it, then, what will it be? I have nothing else to offer but my absence in a better time. For both of our sakes, just so I will not thrust my companion and aim for your throat, I bid you. Leave us be and we shall provoke no anger and inflict no pain upon your people any longer.’

‘You’ve done too much for us to let you go.’

‘And what of my friend then? Will he be apprehended as well as I?’

They took their time as if not to risk angering him. It was all too obvious that striking the wrong nerve would do just as much harm as it could do, without leaving them the time to respond and see themselves past the mark. And they had lighted no evil and saw to it to work as well. There was no reason to fight the claims and to see eye to eye, as he could see past them. I think you’re all still afraid of him; Elegant thought. If it were right for anyone to make such a claim, so be it, they would be delighted by him and ask no more.

He knew what the shores of time meant for so many of them who might be dead meant. And he would only perish for a second if needed, only to weed out those who would not question the disaster which would wreathe and push past the pain. He did not want to remain there as well as he could come to say.

‘I’ll make you a deal in that case. Allow me to stay and face the punishment for both of our acts, as. After thinking of a while, after measuring myself and everything which went to mind, I can think of nothing more. I feel some remorse for my acts of woe. To which I say, claim me instead of him and inflict as much agony as you can, whether or not it comes from me or within your ranks.

My heart pales at what's going on and I wish nothing and no longer more. I will remain here for an eternity, if I ought and shall leave as soon as every single body of your making is gone.'

To which they lost whatever anger, whether born out of fruit of spite, or whether it was lost on them, and out of sight. And it was needed, least of all, would they admit, that their pride got in the course of their judgement, be it blind or of whichever other mint. And they had come forwards, the council long reunited.

'I see, I see and you're telling us that you shall stay here and face punishment for both of your acts and his alone? And there's no trickery involved in it, nor might you make any kind of excuse to push us through and least of all, drag us around?'

'That is indeed what my claim shall be. And there might as well be no calamity between our people, that I might see eye to eye and lot around for the time I'm here, for I will have fully taken upon your judgement and wished for nothing more.'

But they could not remember where he went, or how he came. In all that which had emerged, all of their doings were missing under the light of the stranger who killed their people in a fit of rage. As strange as it were, they decided this was the best course of action.

'And therefore, you, vile creature, known as the Proto-being ought to be banished and thrown forth. Leave and never return, don't make eye to eye and do not show your worth to us no longer, as the lives you've stolen from us have taken us the stronger days, our strongest men lost, our days past gone.

Alas, we seek no more than it is needed.'

Thence they stopped breathing and lost their countenance for wretch.

And the Proto-being turned and looked, for longer than needed, back at Elegant whom, long-since heeded had dismissed his friend. He dared not claim him as otherwise to his face. Not when there was the chance of a wretch, not when he could simply go ahead past the head. Quiet down, he almost told him, I will be out there before long. And they were both upon each other's tails. Though one was only a piece-like plank and the other was only but the curved rims of a cape Elegant wore when the fellow was not around. Then they parted ways. It could not be conveyed by any emotion, nor could he have taken advantage over them.

Wrongfully told, he scolded no one and found no worth for what was going through them. Minded or not, blinded by what they wrought.

He faced their scolding, and all the bickering the sparrows said, and at one moment in the hour, he simply disappeared, like the showering of a rain, a storm which went as soon as daylight pushed through clouds of summer. He was there one moment, then he wasn't. Out of the hour, with the Proto-being, running on the streets.

'We need to make haste, haste I say, before they catch us. Make sure no one will look back on us.'

And they shall see something even lesser, more than needed, watch for more. Sparrows started chanting out as they themselves could not fathom waiting for their blinds to be taken off. Least of all, needed, they wouldn't hide, just ride on feet, and never die as long as both of them were together. Always asking for a way through which they might satisfy each other by their long-talks and periods of silence.

'We finally made it through.'

But the gates were not where and their roads seemed to lead here and there, past and thrown, lost, without a chance to show more than the compassion of the rolling moons, out of the swoon, as they've been taken, they've been approached by nothing else but the Crow Moon-fiend, of which looks were like, as one could tell it. Without a shame, the servant only told of what seemed to be the replica of its master's alcove. Taken by the breed, he spake:

'I wish both of you could remain much longer and set aside whatever happens to reveal the stronger.'

'I don't wish to prove myself to none. Frankly, I think I've done enough and shall strive for more than it is needed. If you don't mind looking in whichever direction, I wish you would leave us.

We've done our share, the sparrows are out there, bickering of the bodies and the live we've taken from them.'

We've taken from them? The Proto-Being stared, but it couldn't think for long until the thoughts of killing went back in. He still dreamed of killing birds, he wanted to find more and take some of them into the wrong spots, where he could butcher them eternally. He wanted to paint the streets and spread the fire. And bring back news to the other Proto-beings who had been carved out for long enough that they, in turn formed their own mad empire. All of which looked wrongly cut. And their beaks would spread out as some would bear hundreds of nail-like teeth, like beds, instead of laying, crushing meat like a cleaver that's disguised into the many looking butcher's pads. Many of which were hammers, hard, bumpers and other unnecessary destroyers who promised to bring an end to pain.

And of whom remained, none asked; less than that.

He called on it.

Elegant stood back.

Then he thought, he might as well return and bring back what he thought of him. Of wonder and of wont and what was missing was this. His peace of mind was only shooting through. He wanted to make it seem like they were out-going and still hunting them through.

'What he wants to say is simple. If you don't believe me, simply look into his eyes and you should see it for yourself.'

'But what of them?'

He wondered for a moment. There was something wild, and better yet benign about this place. In this pure image which had been wrought, the sparrows weren't the natives of this place, yet they brought ruin to it as they had simply wiped out the others. As they would suffer and be done for in return, this being only left and revealed by the fact that in the distance, there were still signs, yet to be found, of a world that was not theirs alone.

‘I see a palace in the stars, past the moons and past the crow. I may not be able to reach it on my own, yet my hopes still fashion my hands and they still find themselves pushing as well.’

Though no shame would do him harm. He had a point, he wanted that. He wished for something, he was shown none. He would decide it when time was gone.

‘You will be rewarded once the task is over.’

‘But may I not return there for at least a retreat?’

To which the moon, as it shook with feathers, took him there, for a while, only him, while leaving the other one there, as blindly as he might, forcing him to stay back.

‘Are you pleased not with what you seek?’

He looked around, being reminded of what he missed. Then, he realized that he didn’t want to be there. He had no deal and could not be aware of the thought, of living a life surrounded by them after the dark came and after he grew old enough to be useless and unaware.

‘I could do without it, but my choices are limited. Perhaps this is not the place I have been searching for all this while. There’s something more worth it all, if only I could reach it, I would know.’

‘And you would make, out of it, not a case and you won’t wonder, if I send you back, you won’t come stronger. You’ll only be charmed by their place, by their palace and the buildings which had been placed.’

Though the Crow-moon had revealed just as much, he wouldn’t munch on his head, but there was still no question in doubt. He wanted nothing more to deal and even less than he would appeal. He looked for something else, wishing a mind that might perish, he was sent back for wont.

Engineer

‘No one will agree on it.’

‘Why is that?’

‘There’s no certainty we might return after the shift is done.’

‘Take a hike then.’

One of the engineers started. He checked his ID again and then he almost winced at it. He wasn’t ready to be dropped another level but that’s how it was. He could feel the elevator coming back into its place. It was something he had never gotten a confirmation over and he wasn’t going to start prodding in again. Especially since the higher-ups were all over the place on the issue. Some of them were not in the mood to be approached. Not yet and not by another admirer of the sorts, for the sole reason that they themselves were off it.

Off it for good, the building was sinking now and it could only push into one direction as plates made of silicon and germanium started electrifying the conductors. Some of them were remotely accessed and could only draw enough power to sustain the main board as the high-machines started at it. Again, through one of them, there came another lapse, another straddling of the outer-bodies being pulled in when most vulgar of metals.

‘I need to ask something of you.’

One of the men smoking a blunt fat-finger said on the street. He was Leeway, single, forty-twelve, served in the company but it couldn’t be told on top of his face for some reason. It was all too obscured by some peculiar window in which his brow acted and started swallowing the sockets. He turned around and started walking. Large buildings stood around him, large in the sense that their bases looked like giant forts which surrounded the main core which formed their bodies. Wide around each corner, high-altitude types that never seemed to let go of what appeared to be the only peculiar stretch of a single eye-strain, which would bob a head if one were to look at it for too long. As they were mostly made out of weird grates, making them seem like peculiar steel, seething barb-wired cages, all of whom were struck so.

Churning in for too long, they started backing down.

In the ante-chamber, the insides of a giant brain, turned to metal as if to block any kind of access and any kind of escape that might possibly happen, that not even accounting for the all of them. Eight-lookers, who were tied around their arms and legs together, like the most peculiar, most strident, wildest creatures, by reedy looking racks, chains or rope-like formations that were beaded and held them together as all of their sharp switchblades managed to pick on their shine. Never bothered, never approaching one another, all of which suffered of some supreme kind of Insomnia, unable to attain something. All of them were plotting, insoluble parts of their brain not working, isolated for this reason, as mankind should not suffer them.

‘They’ve done that to themselves, I say.

Driven into hiding because of their own intentions and because they could not help themselves at all. I say we should let them duke it out somehow, let them have a taste of their own poison and see how it turns out.’

‘So far, they seem to have lost their minds. They never sleep, they degenerated as well as they had fed themselves nothing but their lies, the same ones they’ve fed the world with.’

And up to it, some were there, outside, still, just about everywhere. Though most of them, by now harmless could not fathom living in a world with him. Worst of all, other than them and the human beings, there were the other advents.

Whom started creeping in through veils. Appeared in the world as many, would’ve called them deities, behind the reins of whom they didn’t hide. And they were perfect in spirit and in might.

Though they may have looked uncannily lost, as their bodies were not made for simians to look upon, wreathed as the chest, the chaps, enabled them to grow their proto-thoraxes in the most uncanny manner. Until they finally made out the arches from behind, curved above bodies that were held by the same hard-lines that would carry a cabin in the high-elks of man-dominated snow-mountains, beneath of which there were plenty of hard-holding other cables, most of which threw them off guard, as it could not be helped any longer, their minds were gone, left behind in the world from which they came from. Unattended, yet defended by their salves. Forlorn and abandoned as they would keep placing on their frames and adapt to the harsh environments this world seemed to bear through them. It could not be token and told, and held to them, as many of their own could not live enough to see it. Most of their kind who suffered loss appeared only as manifestations of wild contaminated ape-syndrome buffoons. Poor imitations which swooned over their brothers only to fall in the water and drown, for the sole reason that the wild forms started stretching their simian's worth until internally they bled to death. But they still lived for long enough to drown instead of pushing forth.

Leaving only the strongest and the wildest alive, while the brains which were left behind would only strike to make it harder to create their new indestructible or nigh-invincible bodies out of what they had around, of no sound and no immaterial catcher.

His eye was plume. It was not there for some reason, then it was gone, then it went on again, then he came out the door, down the floor, on the street and Leeway started looking out. He didn't see what went there, but he could see as well as everyone else that there were some distant forms which shouldn't be buzzing around for no one's worth and no more quiet would there be. Everyone had to keep an act, they had to make it past that, with no other reason than the one they needed, to strike at the heart of strike and hear them go.

'It's well past over.'

'Then don't go outside any longer, stay inside your apartment until this world starts drawing in.'

But they were there for a reason, these others, who seemed to be made out of the very fat the planet provided, which could not be taken for granted any longer. As long as it was needed, there would no reason to denounce the skin, which dragged them through the patterns forming, in the sky and deep within. Soon, they could not help their own, as children would be born wrong. Later, after years of travel, after the creatures had come, appeared, disappeared and did as much as it was called upon them to conquer, none of them would appear in the least surprised. Suffice to say, at least, the calling, was answered by none. It couldn't be, they might not appear, nor would they fear anything less than what was granted. Enacted upon them, the punishment acted as a way for them to see what went on. Many children had been born deformed, without an arm and seemingly in the shape of the invader and how they once came into the row.

And into the mold, the buildings became caverns. Underneath the street, where no one might look and see what went on, the gluttony of thought, the makers, they could not be bothered as they were punished for no other reason than the pain they had attained over the years they spent. Better than dead, in the making of no other pain.

'Paint the walls and pant no longer, I see a light that's getting strong.'

'Whose light?'

‘Mine, for I am the one who designed this street-lamp for the betterment of our men. Because if you knew what I meant you’d just as soon have realized what went on through my head when I made it.’

‘What did?’

‘The future had, I predicted that this might happen during our lifetime and I wasn’t wrong to begin with. Look around and be affected, don’t touch the smoke-dust plaster-like mice puffs that filled the air.’

For that substance had completely taken over the air and the sky, without an explanation as to why. Nor could it be forgotten for what was happening and whom might they attend, no one to see or to understand the advent of a much farther making, the breaking of the spine in the quiet eerie night that made blood flow. They disappeared after a while, the deformed children being very much unable to look after each other. Nor could they live for long, they weren’t strong enough; it would not suffice for them to be attended by a mad supervisor, who might interpret everything as being wrong.

Hour after hour, the pain writhed in. The sky was dirt, or particles of it which only revealed the roots much later, when they weren’t needed, a presence like their unheeded, nor sought for. What was clear for some reason was the fact that many families intended or dwelled on infanticide.

‘Infanticide is supreme.’

It was a cult at this point, the maddening syrup and the sign of insolence promoted by a species which shared sub-human qualities with that of apes.

‘We have to perform it in order to slay the wicket ones from on our ranks, those who were touched by the ones that were anything but human yet joined our world in the dance of subjugation.’

Many citizens, of which fates were very much lost in their tongues died off, leaving nothing behind.

A few more lines were being fed, into the large organ which started producing them. Line by line, and the song had already been concluded during its inception, nonchalantly endowed by words that did not matter and had no way of passing through the shroud that went missing, fingers got loose. Only a degenerate and those who were alike would understand, without prying in where they didn’t belong. Some could not fathom listening to the songs, ears went bleeding. A conquest which only lasted over the span of a few days before starting up again; thence the receding blows that were listened to, one wrong anchored being, a despot came int. Through the broke door he came, desperate to remain there for as long as he could get a single word in, a word in the making happened. Desperation drove the force. A hand appeared, malignantly enveloped by a curved handle, which only covered the cut-out glove. No shallow despot spared, no one could hear after the songs concluded, and only one remained sane. Enough to write, not to hear about, nor to listen to the many woes that were being created by the madness which was the cancer of the high octaves.

Long had they listened and more so, could they not spare themselves of all that happened in the room. Another level below through their swollen ranks, they appeared, out of the very fear that they might stop existing unless they were seen, a few swollen rods which looked like the remnants from within the Sea Coroner who was buddying himself with the sea animals during a time they could not listen to sense. He was also busy cutting one during the sea annals, the scrolls which were taken revealing the fall. Of a far more wide-spread colony than that of Carthage during a time where the land below it had been completely drowned and the creatures that inhabited them drowned away.

Into the pile with many other scrolls they ended, not to unnerve anyone who was paying his respects, nor would one be able to tell what the worth in weight would somehow be, for everyone who wasn't absent appeared to be way too thin to be expelled, and no one wanted to remain as well in a town where all the spikes erupted from the catci-plants, the better ones which sharpened themselves as pure one got wiped out. They were out-bred. Not a single one dead as it would happen. Time after aloft, through the making of a single betterment of lost species, most of whom would otherwise be set alight. And some of them would feel the shouting and the echo bleeding them out. Through and through as time-sinew, the Coroner would have his hands gone through way too many sea creatures to even be able to make out what had happened during the time of the red-space advent, when the sun died and men changed their pupils and lost their glimmer of white from inside their sight.

Without it they would be no men. And not a single soul could defend such a change if it meant what it meant instead of trying their hands through them with little to no pain, while spreading ahead.

'I want to go on with cutting undisturbed. May I be allowed to do so, if you don't mind me intruding in my own chamber?'

'But who am I really and what have I done to disturb you now?'

You've been going through so many animals that I've come to doubt that you're even doing something to begin with.'

'I don't care, leave.'

'Very well, go on with your work.'

I shall return though and bid my words.

I shall bring in enough noise that my obnoxious nature shall never be sealed off your halls and I shall carry on with whatever task I had come to initially come up with.'

He said, before heading out. Before trying his hands as well in the nearest cow's trap, where neither of them dared approach or wanted to be near when it drew out. And bit his finger off. He couldn't, for the likes of him know what happened on.

'Did I kill it so?'

'Whom? '

Asked the voice of the intercom pole, that which had already curved its insides as it remodelled its body in a machine of its own. Never wondering and never knowing, watching as they threw the shade, out of the organs of outer space, where food was sparse and no one shared. Where the sky was dark and it pushed ahead, out of heading which were lesser, out with it when it wasn't needed. His table shook, inside the room.

There was a lamp and a brown carpet which had wild diagrams on it, all of which seemed to extend against the walls, looming around as they only dictated everything inside. Lest of all should they care as there was nothing that remained still. A factory within the intercom appeared to reconstruct it in the back, until they shouted in the battery acid which drowned the sound. Many other echoes started bouncing against each wall. Traitorous in sound, the push only throwing itself around, then the stoppers, some of whom only stopped the window from melting. Momentarily as well, until it went on again. Nothing could stop that either, as the sound became metallic, not in the same way it was before. It didn't give off the impression of there being a machine but there being something inside the skin, beating and wreathing, in need to choke the host out.

Like a parasitical plague which refused to give it the needed time to recover.

He looked past the chamber, into the wall, where the bricks had been perfectly aligned for him to realize that something went on. And something had to happen, otherwise he couldn't say it.

The Coroner did not convey it. Not the fear but the must. He mustn't look around for long. Not since the parts of the sea creatures he had been cutting for years were there, floating in the air. Slowly, from inside of them, the daisy chains of metal revealed the spot from which the sounds came out of. No longer was he in need to ask, no longer in doubt, he watched.

'I want to pass you, I really to but I can't. There's too many attendees inside the room and I can only eat so many of them.'

'But I need to take a break.'

Closer to him, he got as close as he could before his face was twenty meters from him. Then he broke his fingers off his knuckles. Afterwards, he pushed it through his head and split his nails with a single movement of his fingers. The distance was just large enough that any movement would leave a ripple of air behind it.

'There's something under it.'

'My fingernail? What's under it? '

'Why don't I pull it out and see for myself?'

He ripped his hand off, he did. It went right off and pulled down the back, he tried seeing where it went but it disappeared in the same way a magic trick would.

'Couldn't make a difference whether you tried it or not. That's not how it works.'

He said it, but he never explained why. How come no one came to ask what happened there?

Small note directed to the Coroner:

'In regards to the machine you were working on, leftover schematics appear to dictate that something seems to have happened to them, though I managed to preserve just about enough of your grand reconstructions that I may be able to rebuild everything when the time comes.'

To that, I can say that I have witnessed the machine at work firsthand.

And let us say that it was a complete and utter success by every definition and definable variation of the word itself.'

He went on over to give the machine a leg to stand upon, as he recalled the entire thing. Large amplifiers which were outwardly stretched and seemingly long-pushed out of their directional open inwardly curved rounded bumpers, from which eight other circles pushed out, holding onto one, on each side, long body as fat as eight stacked barrels which were bloated on top to the point where they blew out of their pieces.

Those two amplifiers were completely opposite to one another, yet they both levitated as they were kept close to one another by a semi-magnetic force which forced the electrons to reveal themselves as giant bacterium made out of the same flesh and blood the creatures that were gravitating around them seemed to be made out of. And those belts only pushed themselves around the circles and the peculiar barrel-trunks which ended up completely projecting themselves as some kind of sharply elongated nails.

Despite the back of the amplifiers being dark, there were the eight fully grown adults which pushed out as they started battling and strangling one another on a semi-constant phase. With each blow or each stretch only releasing more of an irradiated wave that poured out and crept along the base of the two electron colliders which had been caught by the gravitational wave itself. From the reactors, waves of pus pushed out. And what poured through them were small fungi-like bacteria bobbling reeding smaller plants which had somehow gotten themselves further in and closer within their faceless asked, those, of whom breaths would work the machine, which only enabled the ground to become thinner, yet at the same time rise up.

As the ground rose a few feet, through the air, they would slowly become transparent until it could not be gotten past them, through their feet and into the steppe, where the filthier ones had been completely misshapen. Eighteen days, out of the preparation of which eight of these machines appeared out of nowhere, placed in various locations where the obelisks, the teeth of earth formed, there came the gluttons of gore. And they were fatly formed, almost medieval-like demonical figures, of which cleavers could behead the tops of castles.

It made sense, for everyone included, and the tubes were there, bearing the ninety-five degrees rotated figures of walking stranger. Whom might ask of them, and why they had been swallowed entirely by the tubes in the same way a snake would swallow its pray, nobody may tell.

Mostly it was the ground which sold it in their bodies, that in themselves could not be due to the fact that eighteen splatters lay everywhere around. And not a single man could enact dread upon the other, for each shaken hand changed. Upon a chance, they started pushing some of the large tendons out of the way. It looked like they would speak of the large machine made out of dirt for long. Longer than expected; as the first battalion of engineers began greeting everyone else in their path, unable to make what the small ones said, they repaired them, rightly so this time around. For many human beings, born wrong had either to be killed or make to show that they lacked some sympathy for those beneath them as well as the strong. Arms got replaced by prosthetics, though that could only be limited by the amount they had laying around the, which in doubt, they cut.

And cut deeper, and chopped some of the healthier ones, seeing their limbs be drawn by the gravitational waves. In turn, they would be compressed to smaller portions of their bodies, through which they were relentlessly trying to get through. Out of with them out of the way, strength was wearisome as it would happen for them to be headless as soon as they would push themselves in and out. Better in doubt, a longer-headed, silencer. He wore his face backwardly, his wings replaced the arms, and legs were pale and thin, belt-like in appearance, each line of leather bearing the feature of the last aggravator who attempted something against him. In agony and in pain, the ones who saw him refrained from doing something before being asked for long. Times told of him, but he could not mind being observed.

It was the narcissism that made him Lord Freyool, born into one of the many unfathomable pools torn out of eyes. And dyed in the colors of outer battery acids, that made his entirety dignity and formed the outer rims of his body. Here he wondered, he came at last, presenting himself to the uncanny folly the people against him seemed to pass. No judgment would do, as one of their, the better heirs and lords of cut chapels remained. They came as well from their home, the pits beneath tar. Oil was their blood and they appeared to be burning in the back, where their tools of conquest shot like spear. Fear was bedraggled and forgotten of their kin as no destination could end up as harrowing as theirs, lost within the pray. Whom they had hunted, now they, failed, it could not be.

Looking upon the wonder which was what had remained of their horn opponents, they could think of nothing else. It was pitiful, trying to get themselves through, a lack of sinew and of better days. A piety would not convey the amount of guts they shared, as the sacred remains appeared to be abandoned.

Together, those evil beings, upon splitting their wrists and joining themselves in blood, out of the pool they made, one sick bastard jumped. And he coated himself in their sinew. After which he suffered of nothing else but the bone-marrow disease that got carried through. Pain could be of nothing better, only a mallet would tell what happened next. They could not confess to anything having happened, as they would only be belittled for what they've done instead.

Yet the man coated in their blood, he found a maiden of crystal stars, of which eyes, the prisms were lighted by the sight of diamonds and perfection, not a single scratch on the divine sight. In their union they have made, a single son, of which future could not be conveyed. He had been one of the mighty engineers, who happened to come and work for the Company in a time of wager. Endangered by the artificially malignant spirits that were sent after him, he chose not to defy them.

Thence he worked, his servant forth, who looked like nothing else, the disaster, which had been his mind. It was only to be chipped and tossed aside. He walked forward, three feet, made of planks barely put together yet actioned by a metal device, stretching upon a metal wire that crossed each join in lesser doubts. Its feel were way too sharp, he had no impulse and no emotion, like the castrated side of a single man's mind that went through a lobotomy.

A part of him stretched in the back, pulling out a single leg, a real one which was kept in place by four large half-claws that kept him there. And there was only one thin body, that of a boxy upon which it stood. Sharper needle bottle-shooters pushing out of him, and a thing long man with no legs but the lower body of a much serpentine creature like that of a gorgon striding out of him. Twice as well as the symbiosis of a conjoined twin. They spoke of evil and they eyes had wild fake-eyes in them, all of whom were pushed inwardly and deeper into their sockets and changed places upon a wild rotation, making it seem like the colors were being shared, unable to look after, his mind could not tell. Not that he was human, yet he wasted not a second more. Nor would he search for some way, to communicate to those who listened. Most of them were out of it and could not convey the slightest emotion.

Other machines, larger than him were made by this engineer. Though he resided into a great power amphitheatre, he could not fathom himself, the sheer size of the vehicles of war which were being created. He hadn't even considered this. As a rule of thumb, they could not float forever on nothing and with nothing powering them around. Instead, they seemed to be working on weird, yet peculiar parameters that guaranteed their turns. For every single one forced the other to push onward until they closed on the lower statues, most of whom being largely supplanted. Humans dusted and in-grown, some of them being shunned and forced to be coated before being placed inside the machines and the various devices that threatened the very thinness of the planet.

A heavy lash, a torrent of lightning, an arc of power stroke at their building during an inopportune time, which could not be, they could not fathom simply twisting and turning each rounded curve. Or why would they listen and need be reminded for every single time they mourned. Some of the losses were compensated, most engineers survived. Underlings never made and the universe was fine. For the glutton of space, he only wanted to eat the creation, not out of hunger, but out of the very disgrace that belonged to them. He pitied himself, and lost track.

Time was benign and a waste of itself lead him to try.

He begged and came forth.

'Engineer, son of Irot and of Eear, fashion me a body that's immortal, so I may stop this hunger of destruction from consuming me.'

'Will you stop eating our junk?

The one that's outside, the one that might be reused to fashion even more tools when the time comes?'

'The same one and I bid you that. I made my choice and made peace with what I am and what I shall become after.'

Such power only brought vestige, he wanted something more. Flowering puddles that would not work, he wanted to strive forward and see the decay with his own eyes before his children would be made to know. They were there, on his right, featureless but full of the glutton's might. All of whom had been fed the iron, and would continue to live off junk for the rest of their limited lives. Since there were no more breeds for him to undertake, since there was no descendant yet to tackle, he made his peace as well, the line would end. And properly so, there would be no tear shed between them, at least not one he would care to share about.

'Listen, is that the core from one of the rockers?'

'None other, which may work on vibrations and wild other trances.'

They simply refused to acknowledge that what they were doing was wrong. The planet could not take this continuous level of abuse for too long. A last cause, it was nothing but a lost cause and they only drove the dying beast through one of the lost wall. And fealty was pushed in, pushed on.

He was the one watching from one of the wild rims of highly pushed pieces of planetary scum-dirt that was his lair from now on. His eyes were largely adapted and retracted into the scum that would be a slum with two heads and eight ears. So many weirdly placed textures on the wild surroundings forced him to constantly rub his cheeks against them until they bled. And he could only do it again and again. Pushing through after, like a disease calling for reprise.

It was how the law of nature went in that place, where the wreck of sub-reality could only drag the world into a mad abyss.

‘Science is vile, advancement is evil and in the end we shall all be brought down and serve better beings than we are.’

He could only give in for this long until it would suffice his pride. For it sang and it hit the gong, at the sign, where his spineless servants came and made the masses listen. And they would bring even the cowering pieces of all the falling and miss-tokens, of all the bloody poked. They had to be completely dried off, and made for the graves beneath the chamber where he ate his guests.

‘We picked upon a few of them on our way back, what are we to do with them?’

‘Just the same as we had.’

And they commuted, least of all would they face it, they killed one of their young. Retribution would come upon a shout. Shrouds could not fall on their backs, and they could listen for what was to be, their better days, during a time. And during woe, they listened but could not obey the song he tried pushing onto them. Orders came as followed.

‘Do as it pleases me to ask of you. I need you to take forth, one of my deathless gazed and string it forth against the rack of many dead, bring them into my dirt-lair and make them beg for mercy, as I shall give them none instead of prying through.’

And he had not a shame and would not shy away from what went on. Though he might’ve spared no one of his mindless haze, he would remain in time, again and again, behind them. Fallen back, like the headless wonder that gazed between the cracks of defiance. His servants waited in quiet, like little mongrels would, with their kind.

‘Am I going to have to cut another you down in order to have myself listened to?’

‘Nay, we don’t need you do so. Listen to us, we’ve faced them and we can only all it so, as it is. We’ve faced their parasitical machines and failed to take down one.’

But we may have stumbled upon corpses on the way, that would not matter, as we know better than to waste your time.’

‘Pity then, I suppose this war of ours will be lost.’

‘They’re not even aware we exist. Our skirmishes are pointless, can’t you see that we have done nothing to slow them down or even faced a chance against them?’

‘I can see no reason to listen to you gabber. I am far stronger than all of you combined, I have the strength of mind and I shall pull us from hiding during the ascension I recall.

I dreamed of it, during one of the night falls, when I was still young.’

Gordusz

It bore itself forth out of the ground, like a towering access wreathing tail, of which remained only the flimsy flailing body of the great lake of tronches, body-watches, all of which formed the great body of work inside the living archive of the world of Gordusz. As long as they lived, though none might get to see through it, they looked upon the mighty lyre, and upon its grimly set-attire, there stood only a pair of eyes. Mightily dyed in the blood-pores of the bottom cry, of which the songs, of which the sounds could only be drowned by the crudeness of teeth, the jittery beast coming forth with little to no peace of its own, as it would only admire that of its master. Bred out of the cast inside the bowels of one of the most disastrous jottings, the plight of his head, open, did it stay, presented.

For most men who gathered there, enacted only their inner-most, deceitful loss, of every kind of semblance, that they once bore, of being civilized, again, they showed little pain as they started eating. From each of its many pouches, they could suffer no less than it could be admired, least of all, would they be dire, in the countenance, the lack of manners. It showed itself, drew back. Each finger wriggled like a worm, their toes were bitten after that. Contorted since their least of wrath, they could not fathom looking back. Nor would they look and after, not in their disastrous woes, they stopped unable to look at wrong, seething images of the rising fumes, and each tent-like formation started pushing through, unable to contain, fewer ways of dancing, glancing through the puddles, racks, and emptying each other’s backs. Into the writhing thongs of many, a head, conjoined out of the bottom of a dead man, turn with each strike of the spine, from which there sprouted his children, the blinds.

And each eye would be lost in a world that grew, made out of the sinew of starts which crept inside his nightmares during the times of death when many ancient men had prayed. Beguiled by the empty, hanged after a while, they would not suffer trying themselves, nor would they listen to the vileness, the broth of the making. Taken by their necks, the breaking opened the gash.

Inside of them, they hid the eyes, blindingly unable to find them, desperately trying to bind them into bitter, other ways through which, they might serve their master through the leeching blood, the bitter loathsome bitter trot that kept them going.

Never knowing of what days might swell. In them had remained the blood of the wreckage, their lives as well being doomed.

From each body, and each morsel they ate, despite their guts being empty as well, their meals, the meat, the feet of the cannibalization and the grit would shove their likings and what they had, through the portal inside their gut and into the world at last. Where their eyes would grow, the planets would row and there, the makers would continue laughing.

‘We shall bear nothing forth, we shall slay their bodies and watch them.’

It took a second for them to notice. But he was there, god of gods, smiling after a while, watching from the blinds.

Nor could they have sunk their teeth deeper in fear than then, as they could not fathom prying in as well. Fright had swollen their needlessness and what drove them forth, would only be the likeness of the beastly face which popped forth.

A degenerate unlike no other, who shamed from naught; nor would there be anything he could look away from, nor tail the bloody filthy sea of lard which pushed through and froze, forming his vile chargers, the horses of space, in the image of the face, all of which would bear the images of children in the racks.

But he who had come from one of the endless worlds had no shame nor had he any compassion as compared to others.

‘Know that I am not Agamemnon but the pus of his mind, the worst one at that, for I have killed my own children after that and I have chewed their bodies, never to have known them as I ought to.’

They were a given and least of all could they not know it.

But they looked the other way. Something close to a glimmer appeared to have perturbed them. Thoughtful, though Agamemnon was, he couldn’t help it either.

There was no bleakness there to change him, no forms, no shapes, no uncanny surroundings, not even his own pale thing which seemed to revert him back to his thought. It wasn’t likely that he would feel it now, after so much time.

After not being a human for so long, he thought he might’ve forgotten it. And there would be no lurid pause, no path for him to take, nothing of no worth and no way to escape from the state he was in.

It was for the first time when, for no apparent reason he felt something, not a out-right feeling of degeneracy but some slither of emotion that had never been apparent into him before. Prior to this, there was the desperation he thought he had. There was so much in him that one could almost brush aside all those lamentation of his kin.

From the distance he was seen as well, even by the ones who only spoke and never intervened, not to come forth from their quietness, the Agamemnons watched.

It corroded his entire being, seeing what he had done to his children. They were his, even after all this time and even after everything he’s gone through, they were his. And it was his hands, those which butchered them, down to the last one.

He could not even face as lowly mated beings as the makers any longer, knowing what he’d done. For the same reason he had no doubt on it any longer, he had butchered his sons.

There was no heart-beat to be found.

And no hands that he had, but they were his own. He could feel them choke.

A reminiscence of the past, to be more precise about it, eight million, five-hundred, forty ten Terracotta soldiers stood upon each other caught, hand in hand and never watching as their hearts pumped out, morass. They would blunder each other after each beat, from the bottom of stone, from their insides they could not have shined farther in, as they relied upon one another in this wild escapade. Lesser beings, all caught on, they could only wander, as they landed far, through the making of disease, prized upon each other, never to have reached the land on Chlyn, resting inside the ceiling, in at least eighty miles off the land, underneath the bed of dirt, in which the dirt people hanged on.

‘Dirt man, can you hear me?’

You bore me no longer, I want you to come.’

And he drew near to the voice and walked through the shaped halls of dirt. And he looked like the top cast of a man which had been placed on top of him and stood out a with a few centimeters pushing forth until it reached the point when the man looked as if he was wearing an armor, not the cast itself. Despite the cracks in his dirt-body, there were various worms and beetles which appeared to hold him all together instead of stitched, going as far as to create short ties that only pushed on throughout him, forming a small belt of living insects through which a single short finger of a man appeared to have been carried forth.

He had been taken from a strange building, in which a cleaning man hoped to have dealt his way with it, ignorant of the fact that the beetles and the other insects travelled through the small holes which lead to one of the largest tunnels that lead to the new world. Wide-stretched to hundreds of miles, if no billions of steps which had been placed in whichever direction one could look into, there were various other-worldly tiny portals which were surrounded by cartilages made out of their fallen insect-kin which failed to undergo the journey out of cowardice, or out of the very fact that they could not handle having devoured so many human-beings at all. Those who had been eaten appear to have been completely carried over, brought into a world of dirt, then only made it so they could somehow be reconstructed when the time came.

But they could not fathom being alive. If there was anything, as the process went on, touched by the dirt tools, and dirt-syringes pushing some unfathomable scum-mud through them, they could not wreathe far enough. IT could not be thought of accept that they died.

‘Dirt man, you owe me something.

You got something which doesn’t belong to you.’

‘And what would that be?’

‘A finger that’s not yours, you must make it so we have it back. Return it from the spot you’ve taken it out of, or we shall have your back and crack your spine. Never watch it after that.’

And it was pitiful, trying to escape, or to satiate the wonder. No man could pass on his strongest genes, and those women who somehow made it in were too changed and deformed to bear children of their own. Impossibly set, morosely as a morsel would, in death, they sang and were heard after that.

‘What does the dirt-man wish to get out of us?’

‘Nothing, I want nothing from you and I won’t have it any longer. I won’t hide no more and If I can help it.’

‘Silence your tongue and let’s hear it.’

Least of all, would they see and started sawing his dirt-legs off, as he appeared, a dominator of diamond pearls, which were pushed aside and followed forth. In the making of the quiet, in the unmaking of the dire, they snatched their own, replaced, and worn out. Pores would be engulfed through making, taking from the watches, blocked.

And as each tongue passed through the one device painted on the wall, a Coo-Coo bird made out of a gut sprang out and started saying.

‘The court of gibberish might be attended at noon, there is word of the liver-kettle and whoever might find it, let he be alone in a swoon and never ask for more.’

And they could not fathom wasting more time, as they wanted to push on. Never asking, yet demanding, this Diamond Dominator called on the Dirt Man that he may follow.

‘Come, Dirt Man, entertain my thought, join me after a while and do as I say, or we shall remain with nothing else but people of our own making.’

‘But what of the finger you have asked for?’

‘That shall be given forth to you when the time comes. Otherwise, I shall see fit, for it to be taken and never gushed in the blood, nor all, would they fathom prying through, nor could they fathom staying and praying for the crime that is sinew.’

Demanding to be heard, they sold themselves, unheard off. No control and no emotion, folded through, their body motions being known.

The soldiers fell from above, those who were dragged below could not help it any longer, but keep pushing through, swimming as they faced the tide of dirt. Through the unmaking, least of all could they face themselves, as they sailed forth. In quiet respiratory devices they had lain, most of which had been risen as high as flags would, being fed by a constant surplus of unfitting parts that could not be reconstructed by human beings at last.

Lack of compassion met the woe, and they knew what entered them, through the throng of tears, a spineless battle, the fear of the making.

Though the respiratory devices had peculiar long tubes that were eighteen inches in diameter at least and pushed through a transparent part of the large protecting widow-shield, of which spouse there be naught but the small body which had been attached and twisted upon a hardened umbilical cord, but those main tubes appeared to be slightly artificial. In the sense of them splitting like many hairs, many versions of themselves pushing forth and enacting some kind of wild and constant fluctuation of a sea-worth of blood.

A crony of yellow-pus clothes, who walked upon himself tainted by his robe, and within the tie, the disgusting dyes could only get outside during his showers. But he had not a chance in sight to live. Through too many bars he'd seen, limericks which were flat. And gluttons which were not fat, as they had holes inside their pestering wounds, which signaled him that it was time to bathe soon. Though the water was red and blue, with a drop of a cue, the morbid inside of a fish-a-gutted flew, he could not fathom anywhere. Not to walk and not to see out there. There was no one who would understand. What a strange being he was and why he showered in nothing but sweat. Of the highest kind, it was still sweat, disgusting, it disfigured him until he had been close to blindness, caught by one, and thrice as many. Plenty of others followed, no one stopped as they showered together in the blackest of clock towers.

There in dark, they hid, during the day. When night came, they were taken away by the watch, questioned for hours after that.

'What have you stolen?'

'Acts of theft and scoundrelry?'

Of murders and other acts they asked as well. Pushing over themselves as they were unable to distinguish the well from which they all sprouted, enacted upon one another to do harm upon each other while they were confined inside the clock of dye. That's what it's been called during those days, upon an ardent look, the doors were shook and in there again, they're locked. No cell was that, but they could not flee, and they were getting rations.

'Not for me, I don't think that life is for me in any certain way. If I could flee from this place I would.'

'You're stuck here just like the rest of us and for that there's no sweet thought which might enable you to do so.'

'Rest assured that I have stumbled upon a way, I'm certain that I'm not to stay as I'll make it back to mankind.'

'Which shall not accept you in any case, not in front of your or some blind, of folk-said or otherwise.'

'To that I rise a drink, I'm sure to toast if I get caught morose but I shall not do it.'

As he spoke they ducked, never again after that, not to bent too far and no to cross their backs when they didn't have to, especially since they had snatched one of the children from outside.

'We shall cut the little, shall we?'

'Perhaps you're the first one to conceive, and you're the first one to believe, that I'm the forger of one of the greatest knives we've ever used. It is no scalpel, but some weird, yet peculiar diamond-cutter, witch's blade, of blood and pain; I shall use it again and again until it's blunt and dull.'

'I see that you're half-way there, it shall remain, unless you repair something of your mind.'

He had begun and missed the mark, the spot in time when the laceration would've soon began, with or without his warning at play, he couldn't say, nor would he approach him any other way.

'And I shall wager but a war, I see there's something wrong with the child. He's way too squeamish.'

'You've done enough cutting, may I join today?'

'Of course you will but know that you'll only share the blame with I, for I have known only of this by the time his throat was sly, and I will get another rock. I will smash what remains of him, until we've brought nothing else upon our name.'

And thence the glory faded, nothing ended and they had only continued to cut. Until the child had been nothing more but some inverted porcupine-looking boar, split in halves, squared of jaw, black of hair, but never the dye, it wasn't there. It was not anywhere to be seen. But they turned his insides into a mush like the kinds of which they had never seen before. A strike of many ink drowning, and frowning pools, they seethed back. A track of less inflated worth gushed after that.

'I see now. We ought to use this artery for one of our famed events. We shall make a play out of it and we shall drown the lamb itself.'

Little had they spoken of this with anyone else, as if it were of the gravest danger, they could not risk bringing down the wrath they bore and never could they face the bore, least the counted, better shouted, could they wait for a vile-touch. A swivel and a raunchy spot, they took him forth and hid him in the corner so he may be used ten times worth when he would be called to answer. Never to dart around and fill the yonder, less the hope, his parents might notice he's missing and might come looking for him forth.

'Will they know we've committed this act?'

'They will, they will.'

'Which reason would they charge us with? For no evidence should be found by the time they come in.'

'Treason of the highest kind, we've been driven into hiding for our acts done in the blind.'

As they were horned and had raunchy backs and the bodies of children they stole pushed against their backs, reanimated, defects who would finally be morbidly obese and filled with the missing gluttony robbed of fat. They ought to have known better, ought to have done a thing, taken under the wing of fewer, pushed within delightful sin.

Lesser beings spoke as well. Least of wool and bitter swollen heads, they showed. Legs which were long and ganglion-like, deformed and in the back, twisted as their backs, which forced them all to move into the crawl. But that had been the final night, when their lights would be extinguished after a while. Only in their heads, would the dead remain talking.

There was something he did not forget.

Once he started pushing himself after Charles, there was another who was yet to appear, or drag him in before he would finally erect himself forth.

It was getting hard trying to distinguish iron from skin, but he was there, ever-present, as if he had never left his kingdom's fall. He was both in that state of mind and his, where he inhabited a tiny portion of the world, inside his dominion, whereas he.

He couldn't make out the time. No matter how many times he looked at the plants that were planted around, there was that indistinguishableness between their decay and the time they bloomed.

Though he could wait.

'I got so close to it Mongol. I could almost see them approach. I could almost touch the stars I created, I could almost fashion their moons with the palms of my hands.

They would all worship what I told them to and scalp their own in disgust if I willed it so.'

'What stops you from doing it then?'

Mongol dragged himself away. He was set in awe by the various constructions left on this side of reality which was changed by the elliptically deformed around his straw of many men-tied together in the most peculiar manner, rotten and grabbed from inside the bowels of their kin-like descendants which had once threatened to overthrow this relic of humanity into the depths of a black abyss which would not draw out. And from the pus there would be a black cotton, the plague that would not burn any longer because of the smoke pouches which drew in. Never would they come to terms and they could not fathom threading on, in the making of the dead, in the plague of skin, they shed. Not the skin but their insides. For in there they hid the delight of the other kind, those of kin who shared the blood. With Mongol they had caught themselves on. And threading they had and never could they force the spasms out. Forcing themselves on, trying their hands as they pushed out. Like a tendril's worth and the harmony of the limbs.

A plague uncanny, made of thin, other straw, the serpents which came out carried all the bodies out. Some of them were long of worth, elongated into the headless scum that pushed out and could not skim through the skimmer made by the tendons, beasts of no heads, largely erected, those were theirs.

'I cannot look upon it no longer, this is not the beauty which had been promised to us.'

As Mongol lost another train of thoughts, the figure faded, never to have entertained no worth. It could not fathom, after all, trying to push on. Past the rivers, where they swam, a swarm of fingers touched the gate, which lead towards the kingdom's gaze. There, in the sewage, the hicks devolved. Not a single one of them could fathom being forgotten for more than it was needed, for them to hear a single word.

'Needed, you are needed to build again, come back, come back, oh, force in the making. Come back if you may, come back if you can and don't give up your hands for naught.'

There were a bunch of other reasons so many of the bodies were fair-skinned as well. It was because a new-stroke of sun-cancer waves had once hit the earth and it killed all dark skinned people in one fell swoop. Of course, it could not have stopped the waves of filth which kept their recessive genes that found themselves still lounging even after so many generations through which so many of them survived. But those were kept far and few between, if not completely incarcerated and kept away from the general population which had to be spared of their malignant sight.

And no one could bother checking their filth blood for any type of disease they might carry on with them. As in their den there would only be one sort of disquiet, that which filled the walls with the girth of the making, the blood walls of the sanguine skin of hyenas-tendons, and tendites which have interbred with the mongrels after this site of humanity fell.

Though there was that shock which even reflected unkindly upon the faced one who seemed not to comprehend what was going on. A sole reason seemed to lay there, he could not fathom it anyway. Nor could he had looked in any other direction, for the preservation was something his kind has never been able to achieve, not touched nor kindly, nor blindly, in no possible way.

It was the constant damage which kept him walking, all those who whispered in his heart. It worked, not shabby, how they spared no wheel, no sapper-tool to stop the planet from going into circles, no more snake-forms and formations made out of the uncanny worth.

Only he cared for the strange creature, which became nothing but a building in town.

‘Enter it Mongol, I need to see what’s inside of it. I may look through your eyes if needed.’

‘Will you at least hold me along the way.’ He paused only for a moment as the presentation of filth could not be attained. ‘And make me understand what’s going on without me risking losing a hand?’

That could not be fathomed either, the fear which ingratiated him in the worst possible manner. It was something he did not expect, nor could he attain the least of his mind. A fragment which was yet benign. He wondered less and did as he was told. Asked for something, then he was given what he asked for.

‘Another head, on top of the other, but let it sprout from the insides of my tongue if you can.’

‘I shall develop if in my image if you need to, just so I could create the illusion that I’m there with you. But know that I will still be looking through your only eyes and do what I can to keep the other one alive.

I may not be making a lot, through the putting off, the spare and everywhere they might look upon, but this is what I want you do to.

While I’m there, try not to damage your body. This is unknown terrain. I might not know what’s going on in there because of the amount of wax-like pus which fell from the blinds. They did not care, nor would they ask more. They pushed ahead and filled the time with time’s worth of doings.

Two hundred million miles away.

‘I want something from you if you don’t mind, if you would be inclined to look on your right side.

You’ll see him exactly in twenty minutes if you’re still in doubt.’

But he could not be seen by no real reason whatsoever, pouring in through the marks, the wind blowing chimes which reflected upon the scoundrelry of the wind in the midst of light.

‘Short break in thought means flaw of character, wouldn’t you say?’

‘I was only being distracted for one moment before you decided that you need to start again.’

There was a break in the speech pattern. He spoke backwardly before it started coming back into the spine, contorting into spindly bits, they spared no one of the sight.

‘We need to advance further onto the last rack, only that way might we find it.’

‘Where would that be?’

‘Walk the stairs like everyone else does and you’ll find out.’

Then a single man seemed to care. About whichever patron god would happen to be out in the realm of color, which deepened itself through the ground until it started pouring out. After a while, then had the dye came to be, within the spectrum of malignant colors which boiled down the skin, darting through and around, some listened to the sounds and the shouts in shapes.

Some took and dragged their bodies in the wreckage as they pushed ahead.

‘Ho and alloy, there’s something in the horizon signaling us there’s a way back home.’

‘Watch the smoke, I don’t want any more signals being released during day.’

‘Maybe you’d have known better if you paid me some gratitude for what I said.’

‘And what was that again?’

He pointed at the constellation, which was visible during the equinox of the sun. During a time there would be no eclipse coming, from the depths of the river Hyhne, was that which remained. Abhorrently in doubt, they started calling out for a reason to draw on. As there was no ship they went on. They rode on a quiet desperation, a giant tooth coming from a greater giant who had come to die after materializing himself with his head inside a rock. It faded, while the emotions could not taint anything that would press. Onto forward, would they be impressed if anyone tried a thing. Every crew member of the carved tooth smiled. They didn’t reveal much. The weather was mainly fine. Though there was a simple desperation making everyone unaware.

Disturbed or not by what was going on, they groped for the air as they started taking everything, placing the oxidized material into place. Soon they had a strange transparent veil on top their tooth, marbled in sight of the light, the days passed on with them wondering who might show up.

First a boat, it was empty. Then a raft, then Rod showed up, and he was destined to be released, as he looked like a man which was chained in the form of an x, then in a y, then he had become an I, which only showed how far the chains went and how strongly they pushed him, into whichever direction they went. And the man in the form was too glassy for any feature to be allowed to come forth in the quietness of no day. In a desire to appease him, they prayed but at the same time no sound was made as they could not disturb him from whichever mission he was in, never staying long, never in doubt, the first man jumped into the sea.

Taking a single long, torn-out part of the veil with him, rightly so before he drowned, about two parts in May, which was the last time they saw him. And most likely the only time the sailor would grace him in this part of the world. He fell and he had hit the wall, like any man of his age, he would not survive it, not at all. Part of his asked of them and never before could they have conveyed. What went through one man's anchor, there was another one revealed. Some would revel, other obscured. By no coming and by no end could they face their turn.

In the making, there came the check board pattern, from which the sea revealed the oil, and in it, one of them stopped.

He approached the edge of the tooth as their ivory raft stopped as well.

'I can finally hear you, through all the mist, through all the making, I finally understand.'

He held an ear in his hand, a part of his face, the skull and even half of his body, all of which were largely suspended and never sought after by none that might cowl. Under no magister, under no one that might look for them, in the plight through which they hanged themselves, no one but him survived.

'But you had done great to please me now.'

He said as he looked upon the makings of the sailor. And indeed he had managed to put all of his crewmen to great use as they were all too well down, burnt even on the sides, aligned more so than the words which spoke of the horizon as he pulled out of no water side but from the blunt sight of the school of fish that gave the impression of there being water beneath the tooth.

Without them constantly moving, they would soon sink underneath the bowels, and never know of any worth. What lay forth and all the quiet, the dreadful attire they shared between them.

'I shall eat you now, if you do not mind.'

One of the great fish-headed stones that emerged said. It was joined by another one which in turn came to bring in the invitation of another one who had no shame and found no trouble into floating above the curved sea-level. And thence they joined in flight, like many others that appeared as well. The world was theirs after the making and they could not be stopped no more, to tell. Of no man's land, yet they wept. In the sun, they basked as well.

No more into hiding, nor would they cower to him. Who had taken all their eyes from their sockets; which brought only the first step. A sphere made out of their eyes, which had been worshipped by the school of fish in their basin as they could not find a way to die in its presence, nor could they stamp the crowds and the stones that shrouded the coming and the bringing forth.

'Think we'll be able to color it somehow?'

One of the many crewmen woke up from his eternal slumber.

Big brawns leaped out of the sea. Breathing heavily, not in the same way a swimmer would but a marathon runner. An artist on the long run, that type, without any self-wont, he sits there for a while, as his courage is mustered through a strange index finger split he keeps rubbing at. There's more to him than either of them could see and by now, the tooth looked like it had become the top of a hand-egg ball, with all the wires leading in around the edges, holding like the strongly mustered crossed cages they were. Worn out by each minute as well, they seemed not to count on it for too long. And too long in the making, his shoes had been too long in the making. Worn-out despite the amount of time the shoe-maker took in order to properly craft them. It was thoroughly horrible.

His two brows almost became the tip of an arrow, which was his expression. An expression seemed to be the only thing distinguishing him from his simian cousin that drowned along the way. He was caught off guard by the first man, the one that almost looked properly made, like the prototype or the conduit that made this work.

But to the boat, in curved from the front, leaving a single opening that lead a few steps inside, which might've been a single bloating hole taken by a shot against the ball. That's where the air would come out as it would deflate and that's also the spot on which the brawn stood. Wondering, up to this point what he was to say.

He was quickly enamored by the weird movement of the body parts which at times remade the crew in their original, or close to it, appearance. Most of them would switch their body-parts for the sake of it, leaving no other impression than the fact, that they would take no hints from the rocking, cradling makings of their guts. Made of wood, that blasted element which burned quite lovely but it would not burn here, where humidity was king. But he would not be spoken of, with so many of them being wide-spread, it was pointless to catalogue all of them.

'I see now, am I to take part in this weird ritual as well? I don't feel like it, as this would bring me so much shame, but I'd like to tend to the weird sea-floral garden.'

'Would you like to know what dreams are made of?'

'Certainly, I would, but is there pain involved in the process?'

'Rightly so there is. I would have to go through way too much to force you to get rid of it, especially since there's so much of it to impart over everyone.'

Those who were watching were mainly lured in by the eyes, and since the stone-sockets of the living mountain meat appeared to be their only crippling tool, the fish only floated away, reveling in the fact that in this world, stone did not exist. Instead, it would only be fish-meat. That would be enough for now, as they would have to cower from time to time, not to have their minds and brains, completely drained and smashed until naught would have remained. Dreadfully, they set to walk. On bad fingers that were being brought, not from themselves, hanged. Through the death-watch through which they wanted nothing to take part in, hence he asked.

'Where might you go?'

'Into which direction, if you don't mind me asking so, where do you want me to go?'

'As far away as you can, from this place where they might ask of you this instead. Take the nearest knife and hammer, I want you to feel soft.'

I want to feel the chicken-skin fading as I rip half of your scalp. Only that way will you be allowed to cross through the school of fish, so they might see the mark and spare you if they have to.'

‘And if they don’t?’

‘Join them in hell.’

‘But if I think I’m already there?’

‘Then you should change your opinion. It gets much worse down there.’

As there were many punishments and hell was none the matter. As it was no burning hole but the crystallizing of hard matter into scales, ending up on top of everyone, including the molecules of air. Through which, they would solemnly undergo such an attrition as they had never seen, blasting an end to the quietness and the unspoken silence giving them life.

‘Another fish is born.’

Right in front of their eyes, air was their eggs. And some would pop into the air, perhaps too fast for any of them to be counted off yet. It was a deranged man’s act, trying to sniff about the place and ask for the roundness. Everything was incomplete. It was hard to look in and out and bend over their feet. So much to do and so much more, they could not handle all the gore which was being spread between the days.

And then he spoke, the brawn met the striker. He had a lighter on him, and then the threat came. Finally, not a single rightful word could remain for long. Neither of them were strong enough to make a difference in this fight. He was an eight pounder after all.

Back into the building.

‘Mongol, there’s something you forgot along the way, you should look back.’

‘Where to? The door closed before I could lay eyes on it. I can’t distinguish the walls from those who follow.’

A few of them did, remnants of man, it’s what they were called. There was a leap, a threshold between what was right and what ought to in a case like it. Desperate or not, they would be brought to justice.

But first there was another matter at hand. They had to kill another animal, or something which resembled a distant ancestor of one. Where had the cats all gone? Here lay one. And no outsider was there to show him the right from wrong or what one of them was supposed to look like. Mongol started tickling one of them with a razor he had been shown to grow out of the split palm of his hand. They grew from the crack which formed inside of it.

Late, late, later, later, Mongol, stop. The voice erected itself when he could no longer focus on what was going on in his head.

That’s a dead cat Mongol, look away from it as fast as you can, something might happen on that panel. Wrapped in the mileage of remains, in a pile of bile and other composites normally found in some lost distant carcass that would not be otherwise found in that place unattended by a body holder, the screen began flashing with various lights. No colors could be distinguished by any means which made everything that much worse, in terms of all the ones that moved and could not control themselves any longer. Some hand wreathed there, but it could not control itself, not by normal means, it could not go on by itself without making too much of a mess everywhere around. And then it faded, only for a moment, the realization came. He wasn't the one working on the elongated piano-like key holders that constantly seemed to be piercing his fingers. Instead he had not dared feel the pain out of the misery and the solid chance that he might lose consciousness and faint.

A loss of control was just as apparent as everything else would be and as soon as he would do it, there would be no turning back. Mongol's body released an untouchable amount of poisoned morphine-like substance which seemed to be the only thing preventing him from fainting when the clock hit his gut. He had been not chosen for this task but seemed to bear each scan that went on the screen. His eyes were not his for a reason, which forced his patience to thin out like nothing of this world. It could not be fathomed any longer, nor would it remain for long. Not in one place, nor could it work on its own spine.

'I am worked upon, that much is certain.'

But that was a thought. Mongol never opened his mouth. Instead, he appeared to be thinking of only one creature which inhabited his mind. Leopold, he was gone.

His other head served as a reminder since so many of them appeared to share a common appearance which only managed to thrust in one filthy grit.

There was a single flight of fish stairs, on which they started making through the basin a single holding fish-hand, which lead and leaked below the fish-eyes, which brought to them the sight of a sea-paradise. Such fog could not be seen, by no man that could witness him. One of the fish, dressed in silky-ribs, with all the scales off, fallen in the pitiful cacti-bruised skin-like abyss, towards where all life dwelled towards upon witnessing their own demise. No long strung, no longer to be lynched about twenty seconds it, finally the songs caught through the words that lingered, the brawn asked again.

'Where shall I go then if I'm out of chance? I cannot live and that's nothing but the cruelest fact of life I may know.'

'Leap through the sea and meet what an uncanny man calls agony as you'll fall. Do not bother us any longer while we're at it, as we won't be able to forget it, we landed past those sea-urchins, past the sea into the land within and it is there that we'll start a new life. I shall lead the crew, for I have so many things in mind that no normal man would be able to suffer otherwise.'

'May I join any of us in that case? I can definitely make the journey if I were to push myself instead of standing here, waiting to be brought this to mind. I want to help.'

'Then stay on the tooth, and soon enough we'll have landed at the point where once, during ancient times, the world shook, never to have been taken away. Never to remain in one piece in the same manner of going and thrusting, into the masses of false rivers which threatened to end their lives, for that alone, I'd willingly give you a chance to make it past the morbid clouds and join us in the hunt of land.'

'But you know where it is, do you not?'

'Somewhere in a place where the river meets the land mass, where the trenches cannot be held in contempt, where one may look but never know of dead.'

This was as much as he could say on spot, without trying too hard to compensate for what was going on outside his reach. Just as a preacher would hold his sermon, he began reciting to all the crewmen as they were blasted again, by a wave of unrest which pushed everyone out of their most peculiar spots, into a den of rocks, brought to their battered skin about two more seconds on. Some laughed, while others rotted, as they made a tiny crossing out of their bodies, until they reached the other side out of the desperation coming out of no mouth but the shaking hands that appeared to force them back into it.

Slowly they dug and dug until nails became red, until their heads had been erected backwardly into their newly contorted body which formed out of a decayed piece of the tooth they claimed as they made way towards Nirvana. It was swollen, this desperation. Humidity dictated as much. Sooner than now, later than before, they set a semi-camp which was made out of some nickel-rocks they found around. And with no difficulty, they pulled at it, unable to feel the jeopardy of pain, as they melted and created alloy with the pin-holes that pushed out of their palms. Unable to collect their thoughts, they started babbling, as the camp was anything but empty in that one moment when they started talking about sanguine-desperation.

‘Sooner or later we’ll be in need of some protrusion coming out of our veins. We’ll be in desperate need of water, food and a transfusion.’

As blood carried rocks in it, though that could not have been known either by them nor by the land. Nor would those rocks last for long in a world that did not have them around, thence this paradox would end as soon as they made contact with the outside world, as tiny bits of stone would suddenly implode and draw inwardly until permanently looking glowing dots remained caught in the air. In that precise space, which somehow made contact with the other, all of which delivered weird pointers on the map, leading one another farther into the unknown body which hid in air, like a knife chopping body, nothing of its transparent body would remain there for long if they could say otherwise while inflicting as much pain on the stranger.

Danger rang into their heads. Brawn was anything but filled with blood in those days, instead he carried but a muck, one which could not be held in light unless one wanted to see it burning and somewhat exposed in the waxy fox that come. Through which another one like him would appear, only for a moment, there, near them. Only for one second in which he’d perform an act. One of such substance that it could be confounded as being nothing, nothing but the fluke of the mind which would just as soon be forgotten by everyone else.

Though in that one moment he could not stammer, nor would he become foam, instead he broke down the ground, and split its largely spread head until he could draw the worm-vapors in his nostrils. No span of the defiler, the mechanism would survive. It was hidden in the ground for a while now but it would ring, nonetheless true.

About eight thirds into the night, they only seemed to rest for shorter than it was needed. Everyone looking for a way out, despite the obvious fact that they were caught in there, sacked like animals, unable to face themselves in any other way, out of which a piety would remain. Desperate for a reason to be there as well, some would have to call it in, through the tumor-shells of Elephantine, which drew them as they were, in need of a chance.

‘If you stumbled on this message by chance, make sure you bring me a bottle-full of fish, if you can.’

‘One last time, it shouldn’t make much of a difference in any case.’

‘What? First towers are formed inside of it, then there’s also the head-pieces that stalk the peril, like bonding agents that grow through the heat.’

It wasn’t bonding. Some of the bodies coming out of the sea, those particular ones that shared a peculiar similarity with Leopold appeared to be in no measure to make it through the journey, yet they attached two main cordial tensors that stretched in what seemed to be a peculiar inverted ark with two long-heads. Through their liquefying nature, there was nothing to be drawn from. It was all for nothing, a piece in the undertaking those gorilla-brained mutt-mongrels did outside.

All the while Mongol kept pressing, turning around until finally he was allowed to do something.

‘Walk now, I need you to do something for me. There’s something inside, something which kept everything so well preserved.’

It was the metal, the special barbs which seemed to be hollow on the inside, almost microscopically so. They were employing acts of long sea-faring long best they managed to curb-stomp the rafts below the ground, making it through before they had been caught off guard. There, in the making, then the quiet. It was pointless, trying to make a case of something, since he would not listen; that stubborn face being anything but faceless. Both of them were caught, wrapped around each other’s necks, unable to hold down whatever remained of them in one part. Walked slowly to the right, a forty degree angle only drawing on a slightly curved lane that pushed in deeper through the sea. Despite what the place looked like from outside, there was no possible way of knowing what went through it, what lay there, on the first hole they saw leading underground, towards the tension point, the place of stress, disjointed from the top-mast. Leopard skin painter every wall, with the key different being that the yellow pus could only have been one type of twelve decays, most of which could not convey the information which was being sent. A wreathing angle would show as much, twenty long necked robe-like strange veins carrying the oil from one direction to the other, even further than that. It crept inside and lessened the fall of the centipede-forms, the headless wonders, the dead was on. Turned on, flipped like a switch, it crawled out and revealed the top head-crafted, less-ambiguous strange teeth-crafts. Some were battered by the constant bites which shot and spewed. Out of their bodies, pouring out like glues. But these strange contortions were mainly sealed by the dusk, which spread about, then leaped.

Out with another head, twenty more erupted, then the dead followed, bodies which could not have been theirs, somehow they made it through, four times instead. Lack of a single cast, they shoved each other with pain.

‘Don’t dwell too close to the hole and don’t fall through it.’

Mongol had been commanded, least of all he would’ve enacted some spite. An angle of twenty others joined as fast as they might, not being there for any other reason but to drag the others back into the abyss. The wind hissed. All around them, most of the walls shook. Unable to reveal anything but the crooked mass through which the songs, none of them would be heard. It was uncanny. Trying to wait for peace, quiet would be pushed through.

Then they felt the smell of piss, blood which followed, not a scent. Instead of it, came the delicately sculpted, eight-rounded, many faced elongated head which turned everything which was even remotely similar to one another change in form as the first perilous metals fell and melted through the horns. Which were blown. Out with the disaster, they had to signal that it was time to act, but not too fast unless they wanted to be followed around and made to suffer even more.

‘On top, as well, is that not a hole I see there?’

But this sight was different, for it was no possible reveal someone might be joined to, not to join the fray, not to call upon it either. They were made of turpentine, they would not deny the wickedness of the venom that entered their eyes. All four awakened at once. And what could they have seen if not the weird transparency which formed a doomed roof, in turn, holding the only shell against the empire of space which might turn against them and pour over them dust left-overs from the farther depths of Pluto-wars. Neither of them could help the woe, nor would they be able to face the unknown quiet that few would suffer to bring in.

Then there came a single smash, but no crack in the glass-like holding shell which crept inside. And they were only trying to push in, and breed with many, lesser beings. Some were holding past the bile, inside the dust trying to pile up broken limbs. Some weird lances, blades of lesser breeds, others that broke upon moon-contact, contracted by a disease of ocean-steel, clams wallowed in but could not be reminded of nothing that may last.

‘Is that not a single pin they’re trying to break in with? Should you not be weary of it as well?’

‘What can I do to stop them? It’s too far.’

And the room was groomed and touched upon by no being Mongol might see. He was unable to make it through, in the same way a glutton would, messing through their own destined glances. Few of them but in-between, no connection between hem but there was a glutton which seemed to drag everything down with him as he leaped and fell, leaped and fell, right in that room below them, where one might not be able to tell.

‘How come so many of them want to shimmer in and fall between the lanes?’

‘Shut your mouth and make sure everything placed along the way and into the cutter, chop their bodies and hid the latter.’

‘Whom might I find if there’s a chance for me to leap in?’

‘Only the survivors of your kin, those of whom I haven’t brought in, but the least of your concerns should be, don’t look through it, but see it. Actually see it.’

‘What might I see?’

He would ask for something else instead. But he couldn’t impress no one there since neither of them could paint the seals, and cut through the veil of a single man, of Ion-wont.

There came the fall, as he leaped about, chopping its own neck only to be certain that nothing might happen to the original body he would lose if that were the change. It had to happen at least once, when one. That much should be known.

But elsewhere, in the same world, it wasn't likely that there would be any kind of chance, not one that would happen out of nowhere, nor immediately tried for.

Off the coast, on a tiny ruin, through the main structure, which was as tall as one would happen to put up with, never pushing through the craning operation that would restructure everything until nothing were in their place. Closer than on a patch of land, there was a race that developed after that, known as the Lesser-Mongrols, formed in the name of the face, as a prideful possession, a symbol that he owned him in the maze of disquiet and in the making he would spare. And he was anything but allowed to see it as seeing it would bring no certain emotion than that of a single dead beat of the heart. Stroke might follow. After them, there would be no peace, as no mind would force itself to wallow in their misery. Quiet-desperation, the advent of disease; in which pride forced them down, upon poorly made and turned for shrouds, couldn't be helped.

Many of them bore other shades of lightly and fair, shades of blue, no lesser hues and certainly nothing which might push them to leap off the balcony, off the shores and drown for more. Then they desired advancement, a change, despite being sealed off into what appeared to be a primitive creation of theirs. As such they were given the means of building something in the desolation they were presented with. Despite the fact that naught may work, they did as they pleased and nothing more.

'A mess, a mess, this is a mess.'

For the fortification of their makings was nothing more but some kind of ill-shaped island which wouldn't, for the likes of it do anything but appease his wrath. He had been, after all, largely calculated in his approach. He poached all the animals and had made the most peculiar inventions of worth. Taken from a time when many were created by the fair-beauty that inhabited the plains and the wealth of earth. From a place of conquest and domination, which only brought nothing but the thought of castration if one were to compare it with what it looked today; jeopardy of what it were, a pity that would not remain. Lesser fiends would ravel in it if they could, not that they should by any means, by disposition and by the uncanny hatred they shared, paid for in ravels of dreadful-malignity, and a dreadful peace shared.

'We should at least find a way to cut it if we could.'

The first lesser Mongols said, as they might be called just as well. It was just the sight and the might, nothing in his head was right. Lesser heads were pointed this and that way, but some of the brave came forth. It was a given that they could not fathom calling it in, they were only doing it for some kind of ill-intent, defending themselves like lepers during an outbreak.

But the morsel was embed in fat, so much of it was worth the chance. If it weren't so, they would've made the cross, pas the few meters where the strange morsel stood, all of it children stopped as they waited for it to return. A piece like that had been taken from a greater leviathanic-knot, which nodded itself through as they could show no quiet and no wont. Nor could they show less, nor could they impress each other by the duress they started showing through.

Spare the sight, uncanny.

Then he questioned this thoroughly, without daring to point it out. He had entered a no man's land and it could be seen as it loomed around, twice the canther. Mongol hadn't wondered why was he listening to orders when he was still in control of his body. Though it may have been left behind, he could still feel it wriggling from the other head to toe. Though he fell with his long neck, he still managed to crawl as far as his ruddy body let him. It was just too much. He was exhausted; he had enacted nothing of the sort out loud. Near him, there was a single pointer, which seemed to guide him in the right direction, if anything could be called in that way. In order to prevent madness he had to say and guide himself there.

But the world was uncannily benign.

One could not deal with those whom stalked not on foot but with their eyes, unable to fare too well in the leper's guise, as most of them only appeared to have basked in the appearance of. It was disgusting, less disturbing, never ending peace attained. They could not wonder and wont for yonder, but there was one on the island who did not want to be stalked.

And he did not join the feast of morsels, nor could he have cared about its children and how they wasted. Instead, he hid. He did so. Without paying too much attention to what was going on around him, not to yell and not to tell too much of what was going on, not to give himself away while the others started prying through. He wouldn't have given them that much. So much so could be made in such a short period of time and there was no complaining there. Not while they were looking, eyes and various ocular living devices being hidden inside broken pots and wild antiques which might've been hidden there for a reason no one else knew about. Thence they started wondering, who pulled the strings on the island?

Some whispered but no one came up front and asked this question while risking their lives two twice fold. It couldn't be called on them, feeling their reedy beads pushed out from them while giving it all out. There was paint in the sky, a llama in the spitting image the most deliciously ill-inclined had known of, desperate of what they might achieve, no one said a thing no longer, choosing only to accost the wing and the restlessness the morsel appeared to endow them all with. Since they looked upon the ruddy-red, through the circular holes they made, instead of wondering what went wrong, they stood with all the masses, long. Had there been a reason for them acting that way? There was no way of telling, no wry smile giving it away, yet many of them didn't even dare question what the reason was for it looking so alive, with everything taken into account to that point.

He made a skin-rose out of the palm of his hand. It had a single eye at one of its many ends. Truly a beauty of the Isles. A sermon would not be enough to make any difference, as they were an off-shot of the main religion of the main-land.

Life was simple nonetheless, since they were imitations of the ones that were already out there, with only slight but shimmering complimenting personality traits making them appear more human, despite this not being the main intention. A hole in every cavernoid plate, in which they rested, more than twenty of them at a time, clearly structuring if not restricting any kind of free movement they might be able to attain if they wanted to. Wont wasn't a problem any longer since resourced were not only anything but sparse but they seemed to be endlessly spread around. Some things were just as incontestable as there being a sun drawn inside every iteration of the cavern, which prevented any intrusion that was not called for, no one making a noise unless it was absolutely necessary. No one to wake whichever patron seemed to be.

Some took turns while others simply took what was rightfully theirs. There was no one to contest the supreme right, whomever might catch it at the time. And it was caught, and it was given, spoiled then traded, taken, killed for until some of the halls had no sun drawn on their walls. Instead, there was only one thing which remained plain and simple, as much as the sweat ran and blood remained in the holes that loomed around. There was no single lesser Mongol that was unsatisfied with how things were going there and that happened for a good reason as well. Though it may not be told at first.

‘If there’s something shaking on top one of the long brushes?’

‘Make sure you’ve beaten it into submission and left it battered in a pulp.’

There was no reason to stray, no reason not to play along with him. Since he was imagining voices that were squared in the first and the last, the ginger would be felt in the air. Broken at last, around their newly formed back legs, although only a few of them managed to creep for this long and stray. And even to this very part of day, past the evening, when they started driving into crowds of many headed-wrongs. In terms of look, some of them managed to shake the world as they were largely misunderstood in the evil fumes they inhaled and exhaled. Some would butcher even the very clouds if they knew someone was hiding in them. And they were, out of the plain fear that neared their kin. Close to it as they were coming, drawing into crowds. Lost in thought and never asking, being somewhat remorseful as to know what went on.

‘I seem to have slain him, the son of the morsel!’

‘Why did you do it?’

‘I can’t think of any reason.’

‘Then it’s settled and we shall eat it fast.’

Then they started burning the carcass of the infant, disregarding everything which prevented their false cognition from making them feel empathy towards a lower being. Lesser ones settled with the bits that fell upon flaking upon sparks of fire. Most of which couldn’t be contained for long. Seeing how they would seize something as well as they could, no one asked for more than they should and meat consumption was prolonged. As a result of this, they didn’t ask about their past, nor would they inquire after that.

Twenty days were in the making and after a while, time could be felt on their skin, even though it was uncannily forlorn, they would not settle with seething through the beat of the making. And beat the crowded females in a corner, as they should, in the access of disorder.

Some of the mentally ill ones which lost complete function appeared only to be completely killed off and abandoned in one distant corner, without praying to no kin. No release could do either and no one wondered why the seething and the beats. Some rocks belonged to people who cried, and in their distant shouts, no one listened, unless they wanted to die as well before being caught.

‘Seethe longer, It won’t make a difference.’

While looking down on a morose face, one should not settle with this kind of disgrace he had shown to his enemy. This was no real foe and neither were fighters. It was a sick game of torturing a close member of their people who only happened to be worse for wear, inside his head as well as everywhere, whence it had become a bother trying to keep them alive. Dead weight wasn’t cannibalised upon. Instead they threw it for the ungodly morsels that they may feed upon them so they may be drawn towards the isles.

It was unclear whether or not there was the presence of a free spirit around the Lesser land. For starters, it was hard to tell where it started and where it ended and this was no mere error in judgment taken by one of the inhabitants who had undertaken the role of a cartographer, though it may have been unwillingly done so.

Seeing how things turned and how they yearned for some guts, they were not going to comply to the sight of the large bones and the other buildings built around the deathless throngs that loomed around. No sight inclined.

The ascension was still incomplete, it was pitiful, trying to delude oneself that it was going either or way. Twice as many plates came on top their bodies, which twisted like the wild representation of a surreal heart. And from the round ends which shot in both directions, they sprouted from there and came to be covered in timber-oil and metal boils, until they could look no further than their own. And many of them were set in flights, out of long, skin-covered trunks which prevented them from spilling all over, boisterous and obscure. Never throwing themselves against the tides as the swoon could only fathom less. Some had sung, the rock-beetles that were gone, all of whom were painting racks, have penetrated through the boiled ceilings at the very last throwing hue, through which they came to the sinew.

Forming lines from which the shots had only taken back to the kingdom lighted. Out of the pocket from which they enacted nothing but the harmless waves, those who could not fathom breathing stood away. Yet most of them, in benign purple, covered in veins, had only thrown themselves back and forth, in the space of a few notes. Jotted down, uncannily thwarted, they appeared near the structure, on the Isle. There they stood and watched for long, from the cavity which opened from the sky, placed against thin air, the making of unfair gluttony brought despair to all the lookers. All of fealty would be gone.

Lesser Mongrols came at last, they saw the ones that had arrived and bowed to them, as covered in their metallic plasters as they were gone from sight only to reappear hours later with demands.

‘Pity your kind be, but we need to ask of thee whatever you may have, the morsels shall be gone and join us.’

They spoke to them, they spoke at last and they were not wretched enough to say it all. Not during a single gulp, not while they were not ready or hadn’t understood what went through them or why it happened. Yet the lesser brought them parts of the morsels, from which they had formed the devouring mouth, the incest nest which had been formed inside a barrel-deep hole in the ground. Just like their caverns, yet somehow it looked cleaner than it had looked before.

Instead of crying for mercy to these new ones who arrived, instead of inquiring of their worth or why they were there to begin with when the light was fading from a destroyed sky, they did as they were told. And brought some of their own, pitted against each other as to see who might breed the next generation even faster than the last ones. Otherwise, they might fall behind and that was something not even they could account for during the time they pushed against time. Itself had made a difference, no hues of the making, the eggs would shatter and the shapely creatures would be just as useless as every other insignificant bacterium.

And from their ride, one would not abide to look further than he should've seen him past the highs and past the lows, many having already mated in the worst possible forms and marks of symbiosis, some of which wouldn't even see the longer than needed, as they could no longer be forced to breed. It was helpless, he could see it. Past the primes, one could not abide trying his hand longer at the hand of the benign.

As with their mad crotean tenches, which were plainly formed out of large pieces that resembled sea cucumbers in large shells that were growing out of one another as well as one could push in in. A side erupted and twenty other necks curved, all around each other knotted, most desperately thrown into each other's laps as well as their filthy bat-like bubbles forming lone lines after suffocating in the main canine unit that formed the outer reaches, that plunged the shades inside their pouches.

It was hard to see and even harder to make it out from outside the hole. As all those forms appeared to be pushing in and out, at a strange rate, of a single unity that ruined the hearty wonder and the desire to breed them when time needed or called for in during a time worth.

'I see that we failed.'

'We could try again when the sky clears or when we'll get the chance to join in ourselves and leave our imprint in.'

There were only four of them as well, as it could be told by the appearance and by the desire to break their splits and cut the bits off when the coming. And when the end faded, there was no horizon and mostly they averted this disaster by completely torching the hole. It could only go that way. Without decided to allow to misshape the rest of the lesser on their own Isle. Despite having intruded for a single reason and that being, the curbing of their own boredom, of course they would want something less. But lesser meant naught and naught could be told at last.

'We shall start again tomorrow during the time of their wake, otherwise, I say we end this travesty and return from whence we came.'

As it was done so and not a single voice appeared to be pushing farther, no lesser wonders, least of all should one call on them. It was far easier, to align, with all of them, rather to push and try. Of other mongrellic races and other creatures that stood between the gates and through the tunnels, accosting the doors which broke or curbed the veil. Out of this reality, from whence one might know what could last and what might soon prevail. There was this.

A strange giant humane object, which looked like a deformed, broken, then restored ancient Greek-sculpture, which had a single foot that didn't match. On which the base of its body pushed out. And from its head, the Lamia and a leper snake, both of whom appeared to be eating from the back instead. He lay in an old nest-home he carved for himself, and it looked like all that marble had somewhat become very much alive, unlike anything that had been seen. An eye was within his nose, and one rose from the tail-bone which was present outside his body, yet still floating as the horn erupted and the ballad came to be.

He was pinned to holding all of them, like a different Atlas who had lost his head. Though it was there, somewhere, laughing like a colossal thing, at such a magnitude that it had completely if not nigh-completely overgrown the stature of its last body and that of everything which came with it. His hand outstretched and from it, many others came.

Some had hold the Beliaballknott, whom had been at wide and wildly deformed, yet not restored to the days of his prime, when he had shaped the solid light into the prism which was the universe, whom they had looked upon and saw no reason for beauty to exist. As he only prided himself with the torsion-like construction sights, which were not only in his mind but everywhere, spread. In his universe and everywhere he'd like going instead of being as petty as he were. He alone appeared to have four limbs which completely drew inwardly into large reversed curved yet open scissors, which blocked the outstretch of their legs as well. Though that did not matter since all the limbs were frail and weak and appeared to bear no fingers nor toes, nor anything within them. Instead they carried on the sight, of dropping soldiers from which the scum of better planets came out of, universes that fell and rotten out of the insides of their own falling matter, through the seething tubular-like substances that floated in through the batter.

And from each of those, there came the airs, which did nothing else but completely and eternally, or at least until the time when it was done torturing itself faded, shape its face into the mongrellic gem that would put the other's worth's to shameful quiet. As they only cowered and shied away. They could not look at the peculiar orifice which sprouted from the eyes they gave. And each of them donated an eye. From every eye another face emerged, stretching not only the bones until the cheek-bones began pushing around, at first, forming large satellites that rounded about right to the point where they formed the belts. Many of which kept everything in place. Large long wiry-skins carried all the blood and all the needed material from within, right to the mark, the spot where it was needed being everywhere about the main face he bore.

Beliaballknott's main head was soft. By now it was a substance, as a jelly would be. Which explained why it pushed out of itself into every direction, spreading and trying to achieve the need it bore for solid, least of all he would do as he pleased.

Most of the head forms, out of all of which he could simply pick what he wanted from, were plain and simply sparse and never gotten.

As the deformed statue would not allow it.

Next to him there he waited.

He wasn't as important as the other ones but he was there nonetheless. As opposed to everyone else, he wasn't fighting it, struggling, only standing there, saddened. No limbs, just many heads, barely put on together, rounded, but not human, more like plastic, all depressed. They pretended to run in circles, since there wasn't much to look after.

No one to talk to, no one to visit, or share what went through all of their heads; with everyone holding on so the tunnel-veil wouldn't fall, everyone was busy with their own antics.

Not with themselves, they weren't even talking to themselves for some reason.

It stopped counting.

A few more of them down the line. Twenty runners, not a cripple, since everyone hated cripples. Rows full, for this and there, there was a better and one head-strong runner who killed himself two nights ago, revolver in his mouth, pulling down the trigger before he drop the thump.

'Wait, now I get it, thank you for reminding me that. I needed that, I couldn't get it otherwise.'

Leopold lifted his tail, out of the making, pushed his long tail which stretched eighteen centimetres above the ceilings, then stopped at an abrupt point, from where it pushed on directly in front of a fifteen meters carpet-lounge, twenty degrees to the right, eighteen feet to the left after entering one of the long-rooms, going below the floor into the other apartment which belonged to one of the neighbours, farther below than that, into the earth, twisted around, as if the whole planet had been turned upside down, then appeared to have entered the patterns of written shouting noises which were represented by tri-dimensional forms, forming peculiarly intertwined mazes made out of the guts of the long ancestral children which appeared to be lost here and there.

He prodded even father until the tail had taken, only but only at its tip, right at the point where it stopped, a few millimetres away from the spot where the bodies started pushing one another against the tail and the point where it shot again.

It pushed even father until the point where the children, the babies, the infants, the new-borns, the toddlers and the other formed hybrids started becoming celestial glowths that had no bodies of their own any longer. And no longer had he felt pain, despite having lost his arm as well.

He dug deeper beyond them and found a small chamber towards which he dragged himself and lived into. His life was never meant to be decent, whilst living along other folk. Now he wanted to live alone.

Hyde

What had come of his mind? He could not help himself any longer, as he spoke now to only one and saw the visions of disgust which were improperly formed as well as they could inhabit no other place and no other kingdom than that of his own hideout, the bunker, instead.

The Duke had only guided Malt, in this peculiar place, twisted at that. And he could see the pillars rising, but they were not part of his kingdom throe. Instead they were of a swamp in making, the solid flood which had been formed. And many if not every face, belong to him, of which disgrace, he laughed, languidly from each direction, deflecting what may have become. He rang and didn't listen eight, his heart was dire, rottenly gone. But he was there, present like a magister who lost his touch. It was no wonder, that he'd done it, even lesser, than his life's a musk.

Twass the Trunk

'Can I pull a single tooth out? I shall only make it less painful if you ask me to go back to where we started.'

'And where would that be?'

'One hundred, five-hundred, eighteen paces and all the while cornered just about the place. You needn't know of it no longer, don't question what's going on in that room.'

They complimented each of the pearl-eaters, as they stopped cannibalizing on each other's feet retrievers, servants who were yet machines, half eaten and placed inside their bodies, thinned of hunger, archaic-human prototypes. Who walked with their backs, on top of one another, making a stair as they reached the ceiling during a time others could not. They drove in rows, and some of those should not belong to anyone. Caught during the act they could not behave, nor would they try pushing out of the cords that pulled them down. Strung and lynched, their tongues emerged. So many of them had eaten the larvae which appeared to have formed the various tree-lines, on which they climbed upstairs. But no one was talking, unable to take the lead, they formed the separation upstairs.

'I wish we could try to fight the Grand Chosen Opposing Peoples, and free them so they might join us in time.'

'But what of our own, is there no time to look forward when they come for us?'

'What are you talking about? They're here.'

And he pointed like a dumbstruck servant who chose to lay where his waste hardly became a thing. He pissed the others and pushed through. A champion of the free, the ones in shackles grinned as the chamber was completely, if not entirely filled with them. All glancing and aching for a stretch, yet neither of them was complicit with what was going on, they could only eat and eat, through the iron lead. A meat of crudely put together bark, from the tree where they walked through blinds, there came the headless Truncheot. Tall as a man but from his chest one could not differentiate the top of a trunk, from which his head looked like that of a giant put upon a lanky caster, a disaster waiting in the making, who'd only laugh faster if needed. Only he could tell what went on. He had refused to step in line and waited only for them to stop staring until he crushed one of the barely formed window shapes. He had been completely disgraced by this and refused to say a word. Beaten on the head, the man was almost dead, put into the spot.

'I wish I could have you and I wish you would be brought to justice.'

Outside your gates, I see nothing else but my dead kin waiting as they had been completely turned into the ashes.'

'I am not the culprit, nor have you any proof for what I've done.'

'But I don't need to bring any kind of evidence, since I may as well just crush your spine where you stand.'

'Before you do it, know now that you're being watched and it would not bid well for any of us if you decided to kill me before my time comes.'

As well as the other thing, which he hasn't told the giant-head trunk yet, he had explosive planted in his cranial bowl and it could go off at just about any moment in time. When that happened, if it were to happen, everyone there would die. Things weren't going to go well.

There was the other part of it he had refused to tell it. His ribs could only face that much pressure until activating the device. As they were directly connected and seemed to have gone through the nerve cells and the nerved which stretched across his body, not that he hadn't considered killing everyone just for the sake of it. He would have his fun after all. Joy came with no price and it could only prod for this long before pushing in. If anything he was prodding too far and asking too many questions now.

'I demand retribution.'

'And you shall have one after I'm done with the convoy of the Peoples. Before and not after, it would only make me strike harder at the times I were a man.'

'And what would happen to you then?'

'I would be forced to remember my youth.'

Cleon had no desire to do that, as there was too much he would put himself through until he could not take it any longer, to his desire being brought no wonder. He stroke at every word and wanted something in return. He was a pile of broken skulls after all, in his insides there was no organ, with the exception of his brains, of course. He was a mine-field.

And he wanted to explode. Every thought lead him there, through a time he'd want to put himself through the ballista, and be completely thrown against a wall, gagging. He could now be seen grinning. It was rude, doing it in front of everyone. But he wanted to become a red dwarf, a star ready to explode and release all that energy into the world. He'd do it as well, if they didn't take care around him.

No one knew about that detail either, as they kept taunting him.

Man of the peoples, Limp, came forth.

Limp met Cleon. Trunk waited. This had become nothing more but an one sided conversation which could only start from there.

'I wish there was a simpler way to resolve this solution, but unfortunately, I don't think there is. Our people cannot handle one another and I feel as if we'll miss it.'

‘I know what you’re talking about Cleon, I think the day of respite might have to wait for a while. Otherwise, we’ll only find ourselves begging for another dictator to come into control.

And that’s something that may not bode well with the future of our men.’

Of whom society was built upon. Despite the advent of the nature, as it only pushed through to regain control, there was no reason to set after it. Their future gloom, and life was worn out. Both of them had recognised it as they made the proper arrangements.

‘Trunk, would you mind waiting for a few minutes before breaking my ribs?’

‘I will, and after you’re done talking to him, I’ll make sure to do it slowly and take my time as well.’

It was dangerous after a while, just trying one’s hands at it. Fingers were benign and he looked as if he’d miss a few. Every time, every single time, it was the same with those people. Not a single one of them was worthy of his trust. He could see it in the puddles which were their eyes. No real emotion and no real socket like men wore. Their chains had only held their armour and it could only be drawn as well. Some had bled upon the stalk and rain hadn’t washed it. Below, in the courtyard there was a single bird waiting, with no beak but a single chain instead of it, which lead to one of the upper poles. Many of them seemed to be that way, in the making, melted and set there.

Cruelty was something which had never been disputed by any means. They took pride in what they did on both sides, to the point where it made one wonder. How long until the disaster came?

It was in the making, the rough devices which were hid in the walls were just as promptly set to explode at every turn or too strong a shake coming from anywhere. It was unsafe, but it was accepted.

‘As I was saying, there’s still a way for both of our people to strive for some peace. But you need to give me the benefit of the doubt for once Limp.’

‘Very well, go ahead then.’

‘Truly so? Are you actually going to listen to me?’

‘Of course I will and I shall not leave you be until you will have told me everything to minute detail.’

‘Well I haven’t thought it that far.’

‘And what exactly have you come up with now? Go ahead and surprise me if you can. I shall not leave this place until you’re done with it.’

‘All right, I’ll say.

I’ve thought about a fake-peace. Though it may not be recognized by the Organization or by the Peoples, I think there’s a strong chance we might be able to go on with it.’

‘Step in line now, I think I know what you’re up to, Cleon. You’re a clever old dog but I don’t have any hope for you in that case.’

‘I want both of our people to strive for an armistice, in the case of which we both need to ask of them to release hold of all our arsenal and weapons.’

‘Well, now I heard it all. You’re a buffoon, a butter-leper with a small brain. You don’t expect anyone to think highly of this armistice, do you? Unless you plan on an ambush as well.

Know that our people have long since thought and concluded of such a thing and may as well have planned against a plan that’s been conceived against us all along.’

‘Can’t you see how ridiculous that sounds? If you don’t, I think there’s something wrong with you, as well as them, and you and you and him and.’

The Trunk could only wait for so much longer, before pushing himself on the toes. Most of which were blunted enough not to matter, but he was set. Completely against them.

Somewhere in the sky, a giant floating device with the giant body of a rat-like bubble contorted itself past the roundness, the tail having become a giant scalpel like figure which drew on ahead. On top of it, wrapped into every side, there seemed to be sheets of iron which had been wrought into four different rotating machines that were kept at an equal distance from one another, both in the vertical direction and the horizontal plane. They never touched nor would they meet face to face, yet it seemed like they bore holes inside of them and looked like they were held in the same way a kit would be held. Though they were boxed-like tools which fed the bubble-like rat fed constantly with energy and it only seemed like it enjoyed that, all the attention being directed towards the brain cavity, which wasn’t working properly.

But for the sake of its survival, it was only a tool made by the Company, employed to spy upon them while using the variously hidden listening devices which were being closely pushed for and hidden inside every possible corner it held.

Ten minutes passed.

Some of the slaves inside the room missed a few quarters of their skulls which had been beaten in by a hand-club, leaving their scalps placed on both sides as mirrored faces, on each side, for every example that was there, a sad face and another one which seemed to look in disturbing disgust at the other. Both of them could not suffer being there at all. It was pure agony, waiting for a response. No reason would seem to swell, they couldn’t tell, nor would they push out and feel the wrath of scum they threw against themselves, the murder.

‘The murder shall continue as planned. We have to feed the walls so they don’t explode.’

The rest of the people there appeared to clap and acknowledge that. It was pitiful but understood. Shaking out of fear, or out of the gracious figures the dead-men bore.

‘I want to feel it, punch him again, great Trunk. But only destroy the body of one of the dead ones. I wouldn’t want to lose more of the good-willed men. That’s something I simply could not do with. Nor against.’

And the servant of the Peoples only nodded as well, at the intrusion and at the desire which had been provoked and propagated by Cleon. To say the least, Limp enjoyed watching this happen as well. It gave him the spirit of arousal. He'd watch the march in his mind and think of people killed inside. And in other buildings, killed as well, he could only keep saying that this was for the greater good. Unless they died, the world could be shaken and pushed through. And that was something not to be sought. It could start a war. And they could be gotten after that, punished.

'May I taste one of those bloody carcasses off the ground?'

'Of course you may, but you hadn't asked for it ten days ago when you joined us during our luncheon matter.'

'But that was already implied, I ought to have died for something like that. You know that I enjoy taking the great parts off a dying.'

Dying, dying, drying lip, he shook it, bit it, then walked on both feet. There was something in the making and he asked no more. He lost something on the way and pushed himself until he found it as well.

'I think there's nothing in here.'

He took one of the prisoner's arms. Though it may have been cut off, he wanted to use it. He wanted not to waste it, he wanted something, anything which may go through him. Unconnected information, though it may take a while to connect everything in one place, to put the main fuse which would destroy the entire structure, if not the whole city they were in, even the outer places, which bore the various art-houses which they famed themselves for if not they could not breed inside of them, they might as well look after the cottage in which the armistice would arrive in. But the fuse was nowhere to be seen, it could not be detected, despite the explosive being there.

At times the explosive even came out, sticking out its ugly skull-encased black head out, as if it was veering out of an ugly big blotched nose. And it would sometimes laugh and taunt the passers, knowing no one was idiotic enough to strike at it, making the entire thing go. But they were bloody as well.

No man could pass past one, speaking of the relative terms and distances which would put someone in a position where they would be way too close to one of them, without simply dying off. Being bred through yearning for, beaten at their filth-game. Readyng themselves to a pool of gore as they threatened to implode.

It was satisfying, thinking of that. That and the thought of arson appeared to be Cleon's poison, as he could not help himself. He wanted to do it and he wanted to fully go through it without the slightest inhibition going through his mind. After all they worked together, as they only pretended to act human-like.

He also pulled out a knife and came close to slit Limp's throat as well. Just by the looks of it, they were pushing too far in and could only do this much damage before crushing his wrist and one of the main arteries. Cleon was leaning too far in and it looked like he was done pressing.

'I'll ask you again, what do you think of my idea?'

'I don't know, I wish I did, but I don't think it'll work. You know that the Peoples will never accept that, do you?'

‘Of course I do, and that’s the point, but I want some confirmation nonetheless.’

But there was so much more about the people who lived in this world.

‘We could have made it, if we tried.’

‘I don’t understand.’

‘The way out of the cave is blocked.’

‘It can’t be. Have you checked everything?’

‘You don’t get it yet.’

We failed, he simply tried pushing out of his lungs. They were unable, all three of them, stuck, struck in the head by falling rocks, buried alive. Prisoners as they were not.

‘There, I can still pass on the bridge if I try it.’

But his heart knew nothing any longer, his voice was that of a small bat, whose little wings were trapped under a smaller one, who melted through them during a failed flight through one of the standing torched. Water began rising as they could feel themselves only barter, with anyone that might hear them after, not a single explanation came.

‘What have we done to deserve this?’

Came one of the voices before it pushed out, for no luck would there be for a man lost during the passing.

His eye glittered, upon broken teeth, a rock-crab emerged. Though he had been locked in its jaws, the shell could still be heart-felt. It writhed in the obscure, his nature was somewhat that of a quiet young man who understood. Bloodshot eyes say near him, and he would rise from the unfathomable depths. For a second more, as it had taken him, he missed his chance to escape. Worrisome of his nature, he tried making it through one of the smaller holes, his wrists being crushed, the punishment of being bled before drowning with her, as she passed one moment before.

And there was beauty there, the way he looked down at her, not like someone who might be infatuated with her, but the same way a father would look at his daughter. His child being taken away the farther they went the deeper end.

The sea had long forgotten them.

There were many tight spots like these spread across the world, and the amount of souls that came to pass in them would take too long to recount. It was only a matter of time until someone might make out what went on out there. And he was not one to know either. His heart pushed through, the man with a lighter knew. Upon seeing a pair of ripples caused by some fleeing rocks that started coming from the depths, he realised it, at heart. No more words were told.

It was a peculiar world out there, where no buildings would mask the men. Where no one could make it out, wherever they went. Who was left out there in the world to pain himself with a smile? Who knew what pain meant any longer, if sadness was tried for, and never achieved in a world that only allowed them to try. Sense had no means to get through to them. It was confusing, how fast sorrow would soon fade, only to leave everyone as empty as they came.

To that he drank. And sang out loud, in the reflection of the glass, a single rock, he threw it out and went away.

Strange children also appeared to be in the town. Chasing small moth-shaped butterflies, with each flap of the wind tasting nothing else but whoever had been there before them, long before they lived. And as they finally approached it with their nets, it broke, as did their nets, before they ran home.

No one to look after there, and no one to make it past the grime old age, as never to wreath and never to make it. They were of no worth.

In one of the houses.

‘Can’t make up the fine print on the bottom, would you mind helping me?’

‘Where do you need me to point at?’ No direction, the other store clerks was fine. Too focused on doing something else to come around, his footing drove him away. A few pigeons lay in their department, stuck in the shelves with the other things, mostly plastic objects, with some pins and other old stuff. Pushing through their beaks and in them.

‘I need some help here, I can’t read the fine print on his.’

No one heard him. They were even quieter when approached, turned with their backs to the counter and always trying to outdo each other. Someone was not meant to look that way. Customers took too longer. A clerk turned and he seemed worn out, tired by it. He spat one of his teeth down the counter and bled out of his mouth.

‘What do you need?’

‘I can’t make the fine print off this old article you’re shaving, the plastic wrap is way too thick.’

He didn’t respond, he looked around instead, making sure no one was looking at them. He gave the man a pair of nails, then stopped talking. Everyone went their direction and little was said after. Somehow, it was obvious.

Clark thought, he shouldn’t have come to this place, but it was late at that. He took the nails and started polishing their sharp points against the pigeons, most of whom only appeared to go on with their wretched noises after being unable to get away from the small ribbons holding them in place. It was something that was paid for by the hour. As long as he bought an article, he had that pleasure, the sympathy the others gave him. Everyone kind of had it, he knew, but the others refused to show it in public.

Many pigeons looked at him, but he refused to give them the satisfaction. First he started with the feathers, which annoyed them the most, if they could even be annoyed to begin with. He felt, somewhat dumbfounded by it, how they stuck for one another, despite being in a similar condition. That and the fact that they wore each other's young' underneath their necks, those that didn't survive in any case, medals used to block the pain. It was their symbiosis which gave them that high tolerance to pain, and it was only so obvious that there was no shame to what was going on there.

'Another nail goes into the wing, this one through your small toe.'

Human toes implanted into the special. Taken from the customers who refused to pay, it was something the clerks refused to talk about.

With the ceiling out of the way, one could finally see the inside of a castle's roof tower, pushing out as a single point that dragged along and moved with the wind. In there, the chains holding most of them in place. Since they were attached to their heads, there was no point in saying it. Bastard-touches, all of them guilty of doing so, bringing him to the next point he looked towards, the people who had to serve, who had a lot more to pay for and who were shackled against the ceiling, bitten constantly by the birds. Chewed upon by cornered beaks, they couldn't help it. Some screamed but they were plainly ignored. When it happened for the soothing shouts to stop, they couldn't handle the drowning no more.

They were getting desperate now, fighting the desire to be jealous of one another. Some of them took too much of a liking into this pleasure, taken as torture. Others threw their wing spans and tried getting some customers to pin their beaks down and beat them with hammers. Many of the tools were way too violent to be used there, as their out-wild axe appearance gave them an edge against those who didn't wish to die, instead. Taken upstairs, pushed around in crystal cages, hollow on the inside, almost invisible, yet when they appeared, a startling noise made it all the worse. They spared this sight by breaking them. And with the breaking of their cage, they soon after started cracking as well, until the blood and feather fragments pushed through the cracks. Some color of mustard poured out, gas came with it, but they were made if they thought they could freely allow its passage.

A mustard gas machine was kept in the roofed dome. Of orange sparks, from an open hidden door in the roof dome there came a single man with a head which looked like two long rifle-barrels caught in an attempt of eating themselves, while only growing fatter while it happened. Some pseudo features were not seen, but this creature all of the sudden pulled in it all of the pigeons, their cages and the prisoners, before it formed a ball they all stood in. What was left was what it went for.

It took a giant hammer from somewhere in the back and with a bunch of nails, all of the sudden, it started hammering them down through his own people. Or at least to what appeared to be his people, that being a bastard's attempt to do something like it.

That could never go well. As they all shared the pain that came from iron. It was no customer, hence it outstretched a hand only to crush both of the clerk's heads.

We were at its mercy and it bled orange. From all the pins and giant rail-weighty needles he pricked himself with. A door opened, Clark ran towards it before he could be caught. Though he had not shied away from taking what he could with him, stacking his vest with as many of the white pigeons as he could, unable to direct himself to anywhere else. He ate one of them, raw. He enjoyed the feeling, his mouth was dry because they didn't bleed either. And after entering the facility, he realized that all the ceilings in the place were castles, or at least their roofs. Shaken by it, he only chose to go further, thinking he was safe now for only one reason. These empty corridors were as high as mountain walls would allow them to be. Even better than what he thought.

One of the pigeons couldn't talk, yet it opened itself down the chest, from where a wider beak emerged. From it, there came a few long, plant-like feelers which shot through his ribs, connected to his mind through a channel of pain nerved, as it changed in color. No feathers could be seen, only the replacing shell that constituted a part of it. A bastard and a homeless man, it was what Clark was. He could not tell of any cherry blossom in the garden, yet they grew inside the walls and in the areas around them, where they grew and fed the pigeons on the ground. Many necks stretched jerkily around, their eyes missing, on the floor there were none, since they levitate ever so slightly with pus.

Infections were being spread between them, so they needed to get rid of their diseased blood before they could be taken by the noose. Lynched, he'd be, he saw no point in waiting for it.

He wanted to be done with it, warned about what might happen, if he chose to stay, elated during the entry, he'd almost forgotten. A keycard lay in his hand. One of the doors which required access asked him one of them. He entered one of the chambers where they took all the water away. It was disgusting how they bloated themselves as the pigeons became his organs, wildly attached, like a deep-sea fish upon the death-watch, waiting for something to happen.

He checked the files from one of the decks.

'Failed experiment, need to recover one of the twelve upper-bodies which are still connected to the brains. Their innards appear to have infected them with the need of recovery.

Torsos dream of resurrection. They wish they had their legs and heads. But that cannot happen any longer, despite them floating around, it's something we could not allow. Something we could not allow.

Unless we look into the solid colors with which we may rebuild the world. Wild suns which are painted around the sky, it's all flat but cannot rise, struck that way in some wild position, but we cannot eat part of it any longer, not without suffering like everyone else.

That was the reason for us being eaten in the first place as we became what they wanted us to.'

And there were other files and tubes which were attached. Various papers, of which back wore cords in the back, holding them and preventing any kind of further damage from happening, which would only be shared between them for as long as there was a need. Someone fluttered his wings, it was one of the scientists, but that was only a nice way of putting it.

Since his wings were merely his ribs, which had been pushed outwardly through his back, relentlessly unable to help him from this agony, nothing would suffice. They shot him there and he bled. Yet he survived for long enough to attach those files to his body and as blood soaked the files, so hard to life-giving cords given him the chance to move aside.

His eyes were deep chambers which held no light bulbs inside, or if they had, they were mostly broken or solidly encased. His mind was even closer, or had gotten so to being erased. He said as much, but greeted Clark.

‘I wish I could see what’s happening there. The cherries keep bleeding on the way. We definitely need someone to clean the place.

What a disgraceful thing this is.’

‘I think so as well, but we cannot be blinded by it anymore, can we?’ Clark counted how many fingers were still left on his hand. The numbers didn’t add up for some reason, yet he didn’t complain about it. That was all too natural to fade, not when the lights were still on and they still compensated for the weight which was thrown around. He saw a reason to live for now.

At least for what was worth, he wasn’t worthy of death and couldn’t ask for it any longer, not when the pigeons deformed themselves, grew like a protective outer spiked field and appeared to have grown long phantom-like stringed-roots that could not be touched, only to attach themselves to the cherry blossoms around the walls. They wanted to run deeper, to push through and ask for more.

All the singers of the quiet, they faced the leper’s grove. But the outer pickers came at last, and they searched for Clark, as he was one of the few human beings that escaped their grasp. That being something which could not be accounted, nor could it be done for. They were so desperate to get him that not a single one took a break. Long arms stretched even farther, and knocked on glass, and iron. Door was closed, the ID still in his hand.

‘As long as I am here, I think I should be safe.’

‘Unless it opens again, I’d rather be clear about this. Keep your distance from them and don’t touch anything. You wouldn’t want to end the same way all of my colleagues did.’

He pointed past his ears, where his wings would not stop pushing through. He wanted to make a point out of it, but he couldn’t do it. He shook, and looked around for a reason, for everything happening just as quickly as it did. But he bit his lower lip and spat it out, wanting, desperately to release a shout, flashes going past the taker.

‘Then I shall work on that control panel and look for a way out.’

‘If you don’t mind wasting hours, go ahead, be my guest.

But I’ve tried it several times and I failed. There’s no hope we could prevent this chaos from emerging.’

The pain inside the room appeared to have wild patterns of overlapped circles, line and various bigger squares, although there was a single batch of meat moving in a rotating device. Energy pushed out of it, and it could only eat with its metallic set of human teeth. Expanding from a corner to another, as it carried an old-decayed ancient man, whose spear were as ancient as his face. Kept alive by his will alone, his spear shone, his wife was gone. And he missed the love of his life. And had desire to take her past her prime, to do something with her when needed, breeding still undefeated.

Lack of joy

Its life was short. Leopold had been a filthy creature for far too long. In its malignant shake, he pulled out of its body a filthy rake-load of children which had grown in him, all across his lifespan until he had become a blooming tree. Though there was no oak, nor would there be wood, there was only his skin, muscle and tendons which made for the bark. A body like his could only be worn out by the weariness of time.

Some circumstances turned him into an uncanny creature. Despite its near-closeness to a sack-like tadpole creature with the top of a skull, it resembled nothing close to either branches from which it spawned itself from.

He appeared to have split. In halves, or had been taken apart from both the world he had become that malignant breeder, which in itself had rotten out of the reliance he had come to press on in order to eat from inside his fat-engulfed brain. But he had not taken any breaks around his body. It was depressing, staring after a while.

Somehow that filthy creature named Mongol survived. Disturbing creature, now struck down. Walking like a bipedal cripple with its two long intertwined bodies and two domed heads, which contracted the air disease. Lung-wings bruised, they were long gone and pushing deeper inside the bodies. It was only through their constant pulse that he managed to survive this long.

He couldn't wake up his other heads, which put a lot of strain on his bodies since he had to work twice as hard to make them function.

A track of termites appeared to lead to nowhere. Heavy breathing made man a culprit to what appears to have been his only way out. The first signs of stress started wreathing its ugly appendix in, as from an open wound, the words of skin, written with a chrysanthemum hook shook the paler people in disgust. They couldn't help seeing and looking at what seemed to be the humbleness of a disturbed nature. Nothing was working in the first on.

Written down on one of the pages, read by another man, lay the strangeness of worship, the filth which had been dragged in by the only men who decided it was worth it to write with them. Who watched in the quiet shapes, the peculiar heads pushing through thoroughly without a way of showing how their hearts were working. Wreathing or not, they could not help it any longer but be brought back.

'If I could leave this room I would.'

Said the man, unable to make out the walls for himself, as for every step, after each one, instead of going for the jugular.

The head of a single two headed dog was watching, laughing in the language of canine, never stretching from that spot, his heart wreathing as one could in the circumstances which pushed him away from the disturbing space he had been in. It looked like a small bowl, disgustingly distracting him from that fact that it could not see, for its own sake either when the walls became the man and when the man became them yonder. A stroke of the blindness rowing through his guttural motion. He woke up twenty steps ahead, having seen everything and being still unable to make out what the walls had been.

‘I’ve seen it all, my god, my two headed god, you mock me.’

He was simply done spitting in his face. But the bastion was still the hound, yet the question remained, who was to be the one who’d cradle the room and shake It without pushing through the swoon. The liking would not be, disciple, dismember the one dog with a lighter. Only one head would be enough, if I could somehow rip it off, I could simply make something out of it. My life here would be less disgusting.

‘Enter the other room.’

He could, he felt it, he was there. Though the room was in the open, it looked mightily like a garden.

‘Well done, you’ve finally found it. Are you prepared for the piece of happiness which shall be bestowed upon you?’

‘I suppose I am now, but what have I done to earn it?’

The canine was there, in the place of the sun. Neither one of its eyes appeared open, though the sockets themselves appeared to be somehow hollow on the inside. It was perilous, hoping for more than it would be allowed, but that beat the alternative, somehow. What crossed his mind then was the fact that he had failed to entertain the thought, seeing something he shouldn’t have.

It was one bleeding creature, from the dirt-ground, which hardened as he had hoped he would find more of them buried inside.

‘Will I at least be allowed to make a change in the general structure of the garden?’

‘But how do you know it’s a structure?’

‘Call I a hunch, but may I check it?’

He was allowed by two nods coming from each direction. After using his fat hands to draw as much dirt as he could, he simply started pushing through until he could not handle yammering the scent. It was directed through him, trying to scalp the surroundings. A layman may know better than to look into some place his hands didn’t belong to. But he concluded as much.

‘I found it, the structure that’s holding my house and everything about it.’

He had claimed as much and followed through, either way he would get what he wanted even if his shully-nails would be bloodied all the wait through.

‘I shall watch you closely now.’

Said the dog.

‘Please continue.’

The other one.

And they appeared to watch and listen to the sounds of joy which were coming from his digging. He was a well preserved man after all. Different than the lout-material which was in his place, which he would not be able handle if he pieced everything together after a while. Though, if there was one thing he had not been accustomed to, he would lack even in the manners when it came to it, was the constant pain that came with the digging.

‘You’re not made for this, remember? We’ve been through it before.’

‘It’s not him, and you weren’t the one who made the initial observation. Could you release your hold and watch him moan in pain for a little longer?’

It shouldn’t be that bad or worse. You ought to have known better than this, I pray that you might do.’

Though they could bicker no longer than needed before being caught by his discovery. It was pleasant, mightily so, watching him act upon his own morose will, without adding to the mass, without trying to push a single line of toes, the throng of his brittle bones showing.

‘Have you tired yourself yet? Might we begin anew in that case?’

‘Nay, I’ve yet to find something which might satisfy me. Why do you think I’m still here, at the bottom of the earth?’

He hadn’t gone too far though. It was a mere delusion he couldn’t have pushed out of his soul. He was pouting as well, never trying, never stopping, in the making, ever popping a finger as he poised himself to listen to something. Never had he met someone like him in any case, someone who might serve as some kind of guide around the place, which left him all the more exposed to the elements of nature, which started pushing through until he could not take the rain.

‘Then stop it, we don’t need to hear you complain all day long.’

‘Not since we got other subjects we could throw our prying fingers upon.’

A snarl made them seem that way, ever so pleasantly moronic. But they were who they claimed to be and there was no way he could make do with what he had. Only a few sticks were dry enough for him to make a proper tool out of. Plus that, he had been given a single gun, a revolver which had no bullets in, nothing loaded, only the gangrene infested led. Despite the outlandish shores of ash and brim fire, there stood the sentient watches, the towering many legged watchers of one yellow eye. From their gaze, anew, there would be no fear lying in sight, or the delight of waiting for them to trip and fall over their endless surroundings.

Their songs were eerie and would not be fathomed or searched for, either in blessings or countenance, when one might try.

They rose from beneath the ground, like molds uncannily crossed in path.

It was an indecent thing they were trying to achieve.

Youth had been wasted already before it even approached maturity. It was lost on them, the younglings having spent too much time trying to emulate their elders, as they drove themselves farther in, through a place where they could find no solace any longer but the reminiscence of old.

It was peculiar, a contradiction in itself, how the young ones listened to the youthful stories of the elders while being unable to comprehend what it was that they wanted. They saw it, even then, a way into the future. A single false beat, the same meeting happening all over again, with the only difference being in the stories they would tell their young in their turn.

And they would be baleful, as they wasted in their turn. Residing themselves to lie about their worth and claiming their stories as their own. So, as long as they kept the lie going, they doomed every new generation to one of gloom and never-ending prosperity. No boundaries in reality which might give them hope.

Fewer steps had been taken every single day, and for some reason they could not fit in place. Not in the same way as before. It was done, thorough, taken for granted, looked at, ever so close to being exposed. Some of the outsiders finally came and they brought nothing more than their weird ways. So many things had been spoken for, which had been taken for granted for no other purpose than them having been the way they were. Seclusion, personal aversion towards strangers combined with mere, petty, insignificant signs of aggression appeared to lend them under the control of the outsiders. They were bent under their will. Almost in a slave-like wager, in which they gutted their own minds with promises of trying to get through to them, without a way of trying to make it for the pest that was the sky.

Now that was a fact that was merely accepted by them, since they showed reluctance as well as fear to contradict these mere strangers, getting them in a more than likely to be had pain as they dwelled on it, wondering when they might leave.

But the answer was swift and thorough.

‘We shall never leave from this point on, now that we have finally come to take claim over your residence. I might say, as weak-minded and primitive as you seem, for some reason you managed to keep this place clean enough for our coming. And I wager we ought to have been greeted even sooner if this was the case at hand.’

He rubbed one of his whisker-straws. One of the young deformed looked at it as a sign that there were still cats out there, somewhere, hidden behind the lanes of pollution and bodies.’

As far as they expected this to happen, they couldn’t waste more time. Running in circles and doing errands would bring them no worth, not more than it was needed. It was merely accepted as a form of straying away from the intended mongrels that were outside. Those who had been invited in appeared to be less docile than before. Something along the way changed the way in which they sought themselves and went over through their parleys.

A dining table, a corpse in the grass, for the longest while it happened, the plants started growing through the bodies, being unable to contain themselves to their unnatural look. It could not be prevented any longer, the servitude through which they started paying one another when the time approached. It was pointed at it by one of them, in the passing by motion which started drawing the dead fireflies inside their large bodies.

Turpentine blood spewing machines had been brought from the far-east or at least what had remained of it. Most of the outsiders were bent on trying to resurrect the bodies of the old worn-out beasts that had once inhabited their plains, in the remains of a better way out, through which they might shout at the doming surface which expanded and extended from beneath the rolls that kept the burning tar in. Through its grim-twist chrome surroundings, inside the point where the skin underwent the process of turning itself into a mixture of alloys, there rested a few worked upon controlling vergers, the many hearts which kept the machine pumping and spewing as the walls were given life, as the platform inside the town had become something to be feared on. Many formations had become them, the ones made out of led, the beings that reflected those who had been dead and those who seemed to rise in search for the need of their repelling disgust.

‘What’s happening out there?’

Asked one of the deformed, though the outlander could not look without griming as he saw the resemblance being something he could look for in his search for dark touches, the disturbing knot in his brain, something which would remain. Instead of pushing himself forth, he looked for something and threw one of the pieces of his ear forth.

‘I hope your body might be encrusted, landed and enacted upon the belly of the rising ravine. Only then shall you know the filthy your kind suffers, as I have seen it before you thinned your yellow belly and became the cowardly hider you were.’

‘Who’s that then? Why are they calling to me? I can feel the presence of my kin, I am mightily desperate to be touched by their scruff of their many face leggage, which seeps in.’

‘But you will die if you join them.’

‘And how would you know that, outsider?’

‘Clever thing, aren’t you? We have a few stakes placed upon your town, we’ve had them for a while and it’s safe to say that there’s something we came to know.

This and that, bits we’ve taken from your hicks and those who never came back.’

‘How many?’

‘It’s fair to say that a great deal of the ones who never came back died. We haven’t taken their lives, at least not directly. We simply made sure they had no way to return.’

‘We crippled some of their tails, just so we could prevent them from squirming through and making it before you.’

‘Why have you done this? We haven’t meant any harm by it, our presence here shouldn’t have disturbed you. Our supplies as slim if any, and there was never a chance for us to put on a fight.’

‘Yet we couldn’t risk our chances now, especially since there would be some way we could get through to you while avoiding as many possible casualties as possible.

And there’s also that.’

The outlandish nature, as peculiar as it were hadn’t come from the outsiders, but from their own bodies and the filth which inhabited the sea. It rose from the depths and came to a level where it had filled itself past the grit, in the making of the dead towering malformation which joined everything.

A few open wound-like holes in their ranks revealed just as much as it could be expected. There was something to draw from there, so many lost souls which seemed to be creeping forth as they danced with one another. It was worth nothing that they were slightly different from the average bodies and from everything else which seemed to bear. No respite could be made well. They couldn’t fathom doing it then, in the making of their kin. Most have sinned and none had faced each other as their bodies thinned into rakes of many fluke-like boils.

‘We have to make sure that their bodies are fully cauterized before they started spreading whoever knows that they had been carrying and making inside their guts for so long.’

‘And after that?’

‘It’s simple, we’ll start pushing them away and expand even further. It’s part of the machine, you know?’

‘What is?’

‘The boiled food, it’s simple if you’d have learned how to see.’

He pointed at the great living, worn-out thing. It grew father. Through the constant stream of bile, long steamy long-tongues could be seen as they erupted from just about every possible spot, pushing in as they gnawed in and out into an uncanny soulless planting of its vile feet, all of which only served as anchor so it would not be drawn out.

‘This greedy glutton would throw itself into the pile and eat until it came for him to burst out. Unfortunately there’s no other way of preventing it other than grabbing a few of his hearts and crushed them with our hands.’

A few men were present there, constantly trying to mush whatever had been inside their metal gloves as they pushed on and dug deeper into their hard exterior. It could not be perceived by any means, of any way, of getting through as they conveyed little to nothing left to them in terms of emotions. They had been robbed of that.

‘Have you stilled their hearts of joy as well?’

‘I beg your pardon? I must excuse myself, I suppose I haven’t realized you were simple. Not as simple as I thought you might be.

‘For that I should wage I need to take a few steps out of the way and try looking for a grander presence.’

Someone had to be around, someone who'd understand just what was what supposed to mean. He looked for something who wouldn't disappoint him after each step along the way. For him, the creature which came after him seemed infantile. He was right in some way, they wasted too much time preparing, thinking they'd hide something. But it was all too different, less special than he had expected.

'It wasn't meant for your eyes to see.'

'But what was he as a man?'

They asked. And only one of the braver ones answered.

'Incomplete, the man is incomplete. He cannot act nor can he create anything that might dwell beneath his feet. Which they themselves, in turn are broken, fragmented like his entire being.

Spoken for by someone else, unable to fend for himself.'

He would need no excuse either, to see him up to his face, wallowing in the strange forms, as he yelled.

'Will I be allowed a reprise?'

Could it go either way?'

No peace and quiet and nothing which would be felt.

He couldn't be seen there or anywhere. In his wake there was no one around to greet him, no matter how hard they attempted getting at him. He was pierced, just as he said before, broken in the worst possible manner, with no regard to himself or to anyone else around him. Mocked in thought, thoroughly disfigured, the man was nothing else but a living blasphemy which couldn't live for much longer, not in the same way he had done until then. Vile thoughts and agony waking would sip in his ear, sickened by the fact that he could not see that light in the making, a man of no words came.

He had his mouth sealed and open, yet he could not sign his name.

'Write it down.'

Said the fractioned man, to another one like him, instead of trying to be daring, he walked thrice the feet he wanted, warning himself after dark.

'Is there even a reason for me to be here?'

'No, you may leave if you have to, we will not hold you accountable for anything unless you want to stay. And if you do, we shall do everything in your power to make sure that you'll be named a culprit and shall be severely punished for just about every possible crime in existence without any rhyme or reason, only for the very fact that you are still with us.'

'But what have I done to earn that kind of punishment?'

'Do you seriously have to ask?'

Is it no more than obvious, out of the very wide and endless list we have accosted upon you that we have never claimed, even, of the most restless wager, that your life is nothing but a twisted reflection of myself?

And for that reason, since you are I and I alone am one of the most horrid and abhorrent creatures that are present in this room, am I not to use you as a scapegoat and make it so you never breathe a single strand of air while I'm here?

It is in my power to do so and I find nothing but the warmest solace knowing that you will be punished in my stead.'

'I ask again, then, but this time, I wonder this. What do you want to do with me after I'm gone?'

'In what sense would that be?'

'There's no sense to be talked upon. I pray that you might as well understand this. I'm planning on taking care of your body once you are taken instead of I, to the butcher's world, to his home, in that abode where quiet dreams end and they cannot be revered as plain god's woes. I seem to have forgotten that, and for that I must ask you to forgive me, for what I've done cannot be forgiven for.

I seem to have found the plainness of my actions done for and will seek no refuge in our world. No longer can I see a reason to come onto you and seek the peace that I might find false, instead of going after that.

I'm only trying to seek for another mold, another I, another bold man that might take these fractions off me. I cannot suffer being broken, to be looked through and to have hands which pushed through you and I. As well as the very pitiful words they keep telling us behind our backs.'

'What would those be?'

'There are many of them, my good man, but you are simply not sharp enough to understand what's going on here. Otherwise, I think you would've been petty enough to take matters in your own hands.'

'And do what exactly? Take my life while you've promised, even though you haven't made it as clear, to turn my yearning body into the postulance of a hive?'

'If I were to do it, then, what would you do to me and how would you rise from that dire grave I set you in? If I recall correctly, you're nothing more than a twisted reflection. You may only go in one simple direction I may push you on.

And even that might be tainted enough for you to be gone before the beatings of the first morning.'

He lacked in question and bitter words defiled his watch. He could not handle passing by, nor would he deny the fact that they were tried for something not even themselves had been aware of. Both of the fractioned people turned. Now and, after all, they could not make out simple things. The wings had been pushed out of their brows.

What an entertaining thought, that he might be able to look around and find another pair just like them, in the same thought, the same countenance and in the same look, whichever the case might be. As perfectly rounded, sounding mightily obscure just like the two of them, they could not fathom listening to more of what they had to say, out of the mere courtesy coming from the fact. In a matter of prying through and filling one another with self-pity and indolence, there was nothing coming through to them. Only in a matter of seconds would they care to show what they owed to the world. And it had not only been anything but the opposite of a daring action, but, regardless of what was brought, they appeared to repulse one another in the ardor of pain they stores in their mad reminders, a voice for everyone pitying themselves. It was clear that they all shared only the most abhorrent, most treacherous of plain wounds. Open for all to see, no regards for whoever loomed around or the lack of satisfaction they had dared to enable upon themselves when the time was done with. Least of all, would they complain, it wasn't the time, nor would they dare.

'I seem to have spilled one of the canters, twenty years ago. And through all the broken sides of my body, my skull and my very skin there are boils still dwelling in.'

Plenty of the listening members of the unity started clapping, being impressed with the amount of effort they put into trying to outdo one another in terms of their worst possible short-livings. And neither of them could subdue the thought, nor would they rule out what had happened in the past.

'I seem to have dwelled on a strange world once. Not by my choice, but I could settle with naught else but the company of yours. You shall look and see what I have seen, only for a matter of seconds, though that might be. But you'll understand where I have come from and why I chose to do what I've chosen to tire.'

'What would that be?'

'Simpleton, you must shimmer down, you needn't talk about us in a matter of days, as we shall only make it safe and sound.'

It should not make any sense. As there was no one around, looming through the incest-looking duress, they shared only the worst, only the most peculiar and strangely, if all could see, for that one moment they had seen what he had claimed to have seen. Stranger than it had ever been, the side of a world which should never be counted for, nor could it be erected upon the high pillars upon which it turned the mighty tides, which spewed of the most atrocious singers, all of whom would rest aside, of one piece as if they were part of a much greater fiend which could not fathom surrounding them.

There were lays, and many days in which they waited, only for some kind of answers, days would pass, and even yonder, yet they could not hear in a day. Twenty nights and more of them on the way, yet neither of them could make out, what happened to be about the breaking of the sky, through which the blue sky started fading, like sparkling rubies of sapphire crystals, all of whom formed butterflies. Like many cherubs, many of whom mostly died. Dyed in their own making, surrounding themselves during the day of a light's eve, one could not distinguish them from fallen stars.

We wished them well on our way, never to have prayed upon the falling gaze of the giant stretches, the endlessness fashioning itself into a world which could not be clearly defined. And every moot and every plum, from about the garden which rose about the place, there stood the gazers again. Watching for the dance, that might bring them the water down.

Lay as you are and never be caught. One would not dare come about the expanse.

‘I see that you have done yourself a great ordeal and never chose to approach them. The sea is vile and it shall mildly penetrate and fill thine senses, never to make any more than you should live through the coming of the soreness which be brought.’

About the coming of an end, they would not speak again, yet they came near the shore in order to see some more, of the wild attack, the vile charges and the many never-calling, other stance they had took, the world shook, underneath their gazeful stride, it could not be thought. Betoken, at last. Though they dared not lock their souls and ask for more.

In the making, least of all, would they join the sea and the unity with the one sanctimonious being which spoke to them.

‘I see that you have come to join me.’

‘But are there not more of you in that one body? Would it truly be fair to say that you are one?’

‘We are none, in the making, as this stretch of a body is actually but a fake, made out of some elastic, even growing moss-plaster which feeds on the ripe corals below.’

‘Might I encounter none of them, and ask to be brought in front of them?’

‘Whom might you speak to, if the wildlife below the abyss is nonexistent any longer? Perhaps the wild iron-clams, or the strange gone wonders that had been brought from the other world and messed around.’

‘And where might this other world be?’

Asked the fractioned man, at least one of them, though there, in the memory, since they stood as close to one another as one could somehow help it, they seemed rather made out of one piece; ever so much that they could not be distinguished from one of the wild ones, during the times of the mad peace.

‘I seek quietness, they speak of soul. But where is the quiet to be found if my soul is young and it wants to sing?’

And what if it wants to join the dance and stay with me forever, in my grave?’

‘Let it do as it wills, for you shall only find yourselves, the both of you, going past the brim, taken by the heeding glance, trying to use the rancid numbness which is merely accompanied by death, where shall you find some solace in the resemblance of those who know yet how to do.

And they shall speak of mad sinew.’

Of many other dancers, came. Those of them who might remain, in the fading of each day, they might look and pray for many other times they’d spend. With one another in the time of plays.

‘We cannot become lazy, nor can we stand to be absorbed either.’

‘Will you show us of some better way?’

And the creature, of the sea, which had encumbered itself with the false gluttony of plaster, merely opened an entrance for them at last. They asked no more than they should be given a single pass so they might enter through one of the many holes, where they might drive each other half-worth, into the wrong, into the throng and the mad abyss, they had been gone.

It was empty, there, as there would be no surprise to be taken for granted, least of all could they help it. After a while, after a point, their joints could not enter properly, nor would they ask for anything more than what was owed to them. A time alone.

‘Is this the vision you have asked for?’

‘I see something here, I can feel myself breathing through the colors of the broken morsels which make these walls.

Though they may all be made of one peculiarly planted conundrum which keeps them stuck in the plaster, in an inefficient hold, I can see no reason to be told otherwise. I see no reason to be gone, nor struck by the many wonders, the passing being stronger than it ought to be’

‘Where’s the sea if I may ask?’

‘In the passing, through the birth of the uncanny shelters, in which the epitome of sea-life dwells, in it there is dread, as they craft the immaterial atoms which form their bodies, even though they might actually be dead.’

‘I see no reason to believe you.’

Another one of the men said. And even though the claps continued, many of the members chose to dwell in the back, farther away from the light, as they hid and cowered, in the halls, not to show any compassion or make it seem as if they would leave themselves exposed. But this was what it took from them, no remorse but the waiting. Prying through some conversions as they changed their faiths.

‘We’re stuck here, are we not?’

‘Would you mind no interrupting us?’

The voice of plaster overcame the members who did not protest any longer, out of the shame they felt after being met blow for blow and never to be called forth, as they waited in the wool of ages.

‘As I was saying, I have signs, and passes and I might just as well create the tunnel. And you shall meet these strange beings and do with them as you please. I do not ask for more, than what is needed, nor will I ask anything of you, but this.

Do as I say and keep at peace, do not try to anger them, nor should you make any sign or wrath, nor should you ask of them anything at that.’

‘But what shall we suffer of if we do?’

‘It’s plain and simple, the death of sinew, the atrophy through space and memory, as even your actual bodies shall be affected by that of which might not even come close to being deflected.

A blow which could make the sun cower and let alone, be it, no star. I see no reason to be gone. I see the wrath of ages, never gone.'

And they had taken the rancid smell, they couldn't tell of it, nor would they sing again, of so much spare time. Brought about a second more, shown at last, of dire bore, they asked for nothing more of the fading centurion, which had been enveloped by their reaching arms, nor could he be called to answer, what would be said of them as far.

They knew the better, least of all could they know. How dire and hard this time would matter, how they could not master the simplest of thoughts. How they could not understand the way of gibberish which entered their minds and evaporated before they would be allowed to stay their hands.

No matter in his body remained. The centurion had been completely broken in half. He could not understand, nor would he defend his actions after a while. In time he only came to accept what was going on with him and chose to spare them of what he faced forth and called in.

'A punishment for what I've done. Crushing the skull of a little creature they had dared surround themselves and take pity on.'

A mere assassin, though he was dull-headed and blunt, a failure after that, though he could not spare himself of better answers, he counted the days and ever after had he come to heed. And bleed upon the tiring eve.

'I see the days that lay ahead. I shall meet them before I'm dead.'

Said one of the many distant voices of the many sea creatures that had emerged from a dead point, fashioning themselves out of some dead markers made out of the wild sea-light, the delight from which one could not fathom being near as they feared touching something they should not.

'Will you ask something of us then?'

But without a question, they would not dare, nor would they be allowed this suffrage to continue. Unearned, unearned, it could not continue any more. Least the making, call in the vile, they could not defile the crushing blows, and come to it forth, as they had known naught else. It was the mild and the wild, the desperation of the space in which the colors of purple and red had become the open wounds and blood of the Centurion who lay exposed in front of them.

'He came here and dared annoy us.'

'With words of pity, and arrogance, which stung!'

'He dared call that murder done out of mercy.'

'But we have not dared say anything about it, not until it could not be done for.'

Let alone, and to and fro, had they paced and least of all, did they understand where it all came from. All the vileness, of fealty that could not be met; it was all erected to the ones who were dead. Joy was a blessing, one could not do after. Without it they would made the chimes and other bloody crimes encounter. But a blessed creature, he was no man. And his life would not be satisfied, just look at him, he's bloody beaten to a disgrace. Of many disasters, one could tell of this, and of his peace and quiet, the mental deterioration would only piss him off.

A sergeant would return to live, but he would be just as deformed, he couldn't help it, nor would he be gone for too long, this time around. He wanted to have something to look for, though there would be no after-life waiting for him, not in this condition, not when needed, bred in the making. Lesser quiet, thence emerged. He would listen to hours and push it past the deranged activities that pushed through him. Fewer times and bloody crimes, they kept popping in his head, a reason but to die for. Listen to it and never want to leave, or smell in ash, or roses blushing as they were made out of the lesser and the ones in doubt.

'We should do something about this place. I see a good reason here that I may try.'

Leign

They were not meant to live there, for such a long period of time. When the first wind crossed their path, twenty Carrions died, disintegrated like any other being, unable to keep themselves out of harm's way. It was the main factor that stood between them and the grimace of pain which could make a claim of the great Carrion towers that grew.

'How have we come so far? Why is it that we have almost come to reach him, in the sky?

Our dear Leviathan waits for us.'

The pagans said. Most of whom had come there during a time where the body had come to allow them to resign to their fate. As morbid as they looked then, so many changes having happened to their bodies; he himself could not believe they have. It seemed like to their collection, many faces appeared on twin beaks which pointed and pushed out. Something pouted out of them. Too many breathing holes appeared on each side, remotely trying to get out in time to push out the next layer of black dust which came out of their bones. It was a common habit now, their smoking had only turned their bodies in an unnatural thing which crept out after each sign of avarice.

'You didn't do this for yourself, you've sold your own people for it, haven't you?'

Said one of the lowest denominators, the tribal Carrion who appeared in front of the two Counts, whom did not look like their own kind any longer; it was one of the wearisome signs that they had chosen to leave their wings forever and take on the sea-mammal of their cumbersome worship. But what they could not deny was the fact that, for the first time in the longest pass, they had finally decide to allow themselves a single moment at which they might meet their pas and decide.

'What's to be done about you now? Since you know of our plans, of the walls we made out of your purest breeds, your wings, the skin, those lousy, slightly more healthier bones, your hearts dug out and even your young, since you've come to know of our plants, I seem to think there's no reason not to discard you as well.'

‘Do that and you shall forget who you were, until the very moment when you’ll have blinded yourselves in search of your god-creature, becoming your own twisted abominations no longer in search for it.’

‘My dear peasant, we were never in search of the leviathan to begin with. Whatever we did, whatever we’ve done was in our own interests and nothing more, nothing that should be called back. There’s no other reason for this twists and the yearnings we ought to have come in search of, other than the fact that we wanted it.’

‘You wanted to become this?’

‘Of course we have, just look at our grand tails, at our bloated bodies and how big and unwell we have come to be. Have you not realized it yet, boy?’

We have cured this disease, we have cured it now and forever. And you know what else we have found out?’

He dreaded to know, yet he couldn’t help it. He knew no reason, otherwise he wouldn’t have shown up in this primordial rock, this twisted chamber which was dug out of some wild nightmare which bore all the beaks and moving eyes of their ancestors. All of whom were very much alive as they were attached to the insides of the inner walls belonging to the Carrion building they were inside of. But that might be, the lack to see.

‘We never broke off, we never disintegrated, you foolish peon. We were called back to the other world, where we might rest.’

‘So this was a blessing after all.’

‘A blessing for us, for look at what I have become.’

He opened the robe, this Carrion-like beetle-infested bird only revealed the many body parts he had brought from the other wise, all of whom belonged to prayers, all of whom had worshipped the Leviathan in the past. And he was a mold, a blend of them and of the mammal, their object of worship, their ancestors and soon after, of everyone who might come into contact with him.

‘Now, of all times, I’m giving you this chance, that you may enter my body and live forever as a part of me, as the leader of your tribe, this is the fate you have to accept.’

Slowly pacing, as disgraced as he had been, he knelt then joined him, without daring to say a thing. His skin had crawled before, but he had done no thinking. If that’s what his faith had demanded of him, that’s what had to be. In the wild conjointure, he could not fathom living that way, as he had done before. Pushing out like a rod-like, slightly curved, two more bodies emerged from his back. Wings that were bloated with two smaller leviathans, grayed out in the most disgusting shade that had ever been seen.

And they sang in his hall. And they sang to their ancestors as the building itself shook, growing even larger than it should’ve been able to, only to reach and stretch farther towards that point in the sky where their bodies would finally be allowed some peace of the most benign kind. In there, they saw the sky as it should be. No longer clouded, no longer allowed to live, and in it, through each particle, a reflection of whom they all were, spread across, never to fall or to die. Not to change, through the disgrace which had been their lives as they watched themselves through the lenses which were the outer space.

In the making they found ends. In the bloated bodies they disgraced themselves with the most unfathomable floating pads, upon which their jelly-like body started bricking themselves, in a land of blue-moons that soon crept into each other's bodies, growing as they spread their filth.

To it they prayed now to, and could never feel the grith.

Exerpt to the old man

Voice, voice, voice, voice, voice, voice, voice, voice, voice, voice, voice, voice, there was a voice calling, a dog was muttering out of the heading plane-like wings that came out of its back as they started pushing out of its Corpus Maligni Parlor which started erupting out of its long necked robe-like antennae which started creeping out.

'They are needling the arches of tomorrow and shall see no end for the sea or iron bay.'

'What about it?'

'The sea of the Rio de Bay can only be made out of iron before it started dissolving into the patch of grass the land will become.'

'But what are you thou fool talking about?'

Is there anything else you may make sense out of?'

'I will make sense of the various stones that come from dirt, as it is a known fact that the mud is actually the cosmic force in solid form.

And in it we shall find rows of scum-worth in which our children might find some solace.'

'What's your obsession with?'

'Races, I have come to document various races in order for me to lay claim over their features and make with them as I please.

One day I shall make do with those shape shifting mongrel in our society and I shall take what I claim out from their teeth.'

He helped himself out of his bag, the man known as Cypriot knew that. Named after the great god came as Cypret, of which river now flows in the depths of the concave round way of a hole in outer space, where light becomes its murky transparent water. In it, Greek tadpoles enter and never come out, though many of them end up being completely strengthened by their muscle-masses. All of which appeared to have overlapped on top of one another as they ripped themselves off the sides of their tails as they formed smaller deep-sea like creatures which appeared to constantly attempt to bring in the light at various peculiar intervals, through which only tiny fragments of living light beings could be seen.

In one of those light fragments of the light beings, a part of the strange, yet distant, out of that world, out of that cosmic force, the pocket of evil seemed to diverge inside of.

A stop.

It almost came out like the voice of a young child.

‘We can’t stop now. We still have so much more to build here. There’s still a few trenches and trees and, and...’

He took a single deep breath.

‘We still have to build the people, one day. I don’t care how long it takes to make them feel something, but I can’t do it alone.’

His father came near the boy.

Gently he stroked the back of his head.

He would’ve intervened much sooner, but he didn’t feel like it. That was one of the many lays which had aggravated him long ago. Simply put, he could not trust himself any further, not to ruin everything. He would have much sooner given up everything and left to some other place, never to have tried again, never to be met by some kind of failure, only to have died knowing there was no peace in his heart any longer since it had been long since rotten. It did not beat then.

But he still felt he would disappoint the child if it had.

‘I can’t feel anything, boy. It’s pointless.

See that man over there?’

It was a long way off the path, like a stray. He couldn’t see that well in his old age but he had heard him well enough.

This was his once chance to make the kind make sense of everything, or to make sense of anything, if that made him feel better. It was confusing, trying to make sense out of what he felt.

The boy’s mother usually made sense out of things, but he couldn’t. It was long since he had been broken, since he had refused to make something out of himself. For that reason he chose to wait, until this moment when his boy mustered enough courage to wager a question.

‘Why? Why can’t you be like other men?’

Why can’t you feel the same as we do?’

‘I don’t know.’

Said the old man and looked in a different direction than that of the stray. He never asked for this, nor would he look for anything else. He only wanted to be left alone, even if that meant driving away the boy.

But the boy kept on and refused to get away from the man. Instead, he chose to push on and carry himself past the watch. He didn't let go. It was the only thing he knew, and no matter where his thoughts went, only that stood. Only that part of his brain was active, the part which made him stay his hands, to stay his legs and not let go no matter how violent his father would become.

Out of frustration.

Another stop and another reminded.

It couldn't be, least of all, ignored either.

The old man looked back at his past.

It was something which killed, in some way every kind of emotion he used to feel. He hadn't much left, but not in that sense. He had left the craft a long time ago and he never stopped regretting it ever since.

His paintings, his plans, his sketches and the architecture he'd done. They were all gone, buried somewhere. And instead of him, there was nothing. Only a soulless husk, the body of another failed artist who joined the rank, all of whom bowed to great men like Caravaggio, Allesandro di Mariano Fillipelli or Rembrandt. He had left beauty behind and that had, every since then painted his soul in a shade of black, like that of a nigger.

And he left the boy soon after, to not only fend for himself, abandoned, but also to understand that he will never make him feel any kind of regret, not since he left his heart behind. There was no pity left in his heart, there was no certainty and he had been trying to get around when needed, only so, for the short amount of time his life had gotten to, but it couldn't go away.

That guilt was something he could not grow accustomed to. It always mocked him, trying endlessly but never making it through. Trying to push through something which was pointless, and failing at it; he knew that feeling incredibly well, but never took a single break.

Failure after failure had disfigured his art, it had crippled it. With him in place, it had become nothing. He was nothing because of it. All of them somehow destroyed.

He burned every single possible account of them, every note and every reference he bore of them. And ever since then, the man was lifeless, just like the many husks of the town he was in, staring in the distance at a manor which never started back.

Two minutes passed without harming someone, and it showed. Bordodox was another one of the ingrates who were in need of striking at the floor, punching through them more and finding nothing else on that sole planet, other than the standing frozen bodies and the peculiar concubine of skin which drew them in.

It was a given they could not look away from it. C-H came near, as he started levitating through the sight of the swollen-enclosed encircled plane they attempted gravitating towards from on top the new central power facility. There would be no reason to have any uncertainty over life and death any longer, at least not here where it could not occur by normal means. Instead, one could only look around the mass of land which kept stretching in a mostly unfamiliar manner, just as a wild erupting reflection would in its mass of discs which somehow hovered around the grand surface beneath the earth, where none might see the other sight.

And thence he came, without heeding any of the present warnings. Deranged by no apparent holder, he had been entrapped and forced on his limbs by the sudden apparition of weight being carried through the tube attached to his body. Pointless though it may be, there was nothing pushing him out of it. As restless as the single agent was, there was nothing for him waiting outside.

Since the roads had already been cleared, the androids finally put to use, and the humans set in their own pines, things went slow.

It can only go so far without someone finally paying attention to what was going on around the place. And as it had they started drowning out of their lungs, being largely incapable of breathing out their own.

‘There, a shriek, I heard it call to all the astronomers who named the universe in yet benign.’

From one of their large telescopes there was dampness in the way, of the second world, the other copy, the planet in disguise, through which the body of Eliasophor started brooding in the pool of a single eye which started brooding forth. He had to look no further until he found them gone, only to appear again, much closer and darker than they ever were. The people were of a benign race, of which there would be no toe-to-toe, relentless disgrace. For each one dead-soldier in the ground, twenty more took their place as they erupted from the sound-barrier which prodded through them during a time when fertility faded and no man could touch one lass.

‘I say we started invading them and throw the bombs. I see something brooding forth, inside of him, there’s a mass of leaves, underneath which they hide. And I can see nothing else going on but the mindedness of a bitter lie that brooded from a time that predates ours.’

‘What shall you tell of it?’

‘Only darkness from the bowels that have opened, look and see for yourself, soon you shall be made to understand what went wrong during their made creation.’

They were not easily pushed on, nor could they be forced to act as if they were determined in some way to do it, yet they had all answered the call and the astronomers returned to it. A bitterness had called to hope and in the making they found the first lock of minds, the brains which took control over the other planet appeared to have properly manifested themselves to no other need but theirs and their alone. It could not be guessed upon, fathomed less.

‘Hey kid, want to see a cool trick?’

The man took a bite of his finger. It leaked a single drop of blood. From it, slowly, going by the frame of the finger, came out a large steel knife, cutting its way out slowly out of the finger with its large edge, until it made its way out through the outward stretch of the palm. Another hand-stretch worth of an arm came through the hole made by the knife.

His arms grew a life of its own as it partially extended, going beyond the point where bone should've been apparent but it could no longer be seen. Instead of it what came out appeared to be some strange-looking metallic rod, clean and pure, looking as if it had been barely forged in the most peculiar manner. For every angle was made to fit into a winder disc-device which would control the direction in turn, with long undergoing and changing extensors pushing it around like wild anchoring wranglers that made sure it would taint the halls and everywhere around without pushing too far in.

There were a few other schematics embed into the iron, leaving the impression that, what would from now on be referred to as a charred-iron pulp, was nothing more but an elaborate hidden man, in the same manner one would find it inside the inside of a man's skull, hidden by a wild malignant being of the stars.

It started pointing whence there'd be no direction. And those who stood around him could not ask for more.

'Leave the kid alone, will you?'

'I haven't done anything wrong now have I?'

And for a while they wondered, just why this happened or why they were keeping the child while there was still a murder investigation. Especially since down the street, not even a few meters away, a man still lay hanged on a rope that popped out of nowhere and could not be found, nor could it be caught off through. And they were not impressed and couldn't see through the hue of no blood, as what pulled out of his open palm was nothing but a transparent olive oil.

'You're Greek, aren't you?'

'I suppose I am, but what does that have to do with anything?'

'It hasn't. It was simply an observation I was making. Don't sweat it for too long, will you?'

'I won't.

But I know you don't take too kindly to Italians either and I've known a few.'

'You walk alike, don't you?'

I mean you look alike, like similar. Similar faces and the same races, isn't that what they say?

I forgot the saying, it's an Italian thing.'

'Couldn't tell you.'

'So, did you figure out that you should take time off your busy schedule to mess with some kid around this side of the building?'

'I don't live here.'

'Maybe you should.'

'This neighborhood is a lot lighter than where I'm from. I think I'd like to keep it that way, you know?'

‘We’re not barbarians you know? Despite what you may have heard. We won’t treat you any different than we treat our negroes.’

‘I know you won’t, but I’d rather not.’

He pulled the long extension back into his palm, with the knife and the pieces which had been scalped off, then he seemed to have left no trace of the original cut. Nothing sutured and nothing cauterized, since there would be no wound nor mark for him to take on. He would try his hands against him if he tried anything.

Now, of all times and all points, it seemed like it somehow still traveled through his body and seemed to bear no mark of the touch. It crept even deeper as it pushed through, unable to loom around for long. The knife was sharp but he knew how to handle it through his insides. For the same reason that he wasn’t hurt by it as well; it wasn’t necessarily in his body. It was out and in it at the same time. Both trying to get out and piss in where it didn’t belong, taking in breaks through which it would get out for air.

Otherwise, the knife would suffocate. And the arm which held it was diving. For it had not been attached to no other body than that of the Greek, but not on the inside, but on the outside.

Mionsopholus stood there, waiting for another quick remark coming from the man. He didn’t look that brave no longer for the same reason he hadn’t looked any sharer. He was spent, all day, spent from working on the site. And he had taken a place amongst the eight who were looking at him entertain the child. He was an orphan who was missing his two eyes, and the sockets were placed on his cheeks and the neck appeared to have been extended from the spine which grew wrong somehow. Incredibly wrong, to the point where it looked like the torch held by the hand belonging to the statue of Liberty, but tinier in comparison. And ever more so-darkening as it could not hold all the heat which was being released by the Asiatic vapors that were being omitted from the talk.

‘One of us present here should adopt the child. Otherwise, I think we won’t live to see the next generation thrive.’

‘And who will take the responsibility then? I truly don’t think any of us can facilitate everything the kid needs. I think we should call it a quits.

Not to mention that he’s deformed.’

There were also the lost Islands which were not on the map any longer. Too many of them disappeared. And there were no tracks nor any records which would tell of them in any other way. Therefore they ran out of things to talk about.

It was ever so clear, there spore which made the suns. And they filled the scents and could only fly away like the tiny petals being buried in after falling off the nursery tree, twenty feet away from where they stood. In which there was the cast of a long-fallen bomb which had failed to detonate. It was a dud, it pushed through and started growing, as plants made out of metal started rowing through the street. Making their way out of it as they walked on twenty other feet, most of which were largely attached to a greater body of eighteen torsos, tied together by an extra-chain, from which the statues carved would remained in the neck of the extortionist, the head of the vile fiend. Friend of none and defiler of art, whose face was fat with pus, whose mind was gone, and who seemed to sing as he would grow older by the second, much so and such a dog would, if he aged like a man, or in the same span-of years if it was forced on him.

And he was responsible for all the hanging, fiend of radiation who did sing. Of old times where men could not see the wings floating on top of mad clouds. Many of which seemed to be lost without the sound of dances. Blasted upon the carapace behind their eyelids, forming in this world, erected by no word they may look upon.

‘I see that there’s a reason you’re here. May I hear what you’re at?’

The Greek named Mionsopholus approached. There was a dire strength in his step which was unmet by any other who stood in front of him before the advent of this meeting threatened him to come. He asked himself prior, what might he feel, out of the fear of retaliation, who might force him to bend his knees and suffer of vice, as he could not fathom staying long. Longer than that would mean the day was wasted and he was gone. It couldn’t be done, not since there was some freedom of thought his ancestors brought there.

Upon their foundation, he was determined to make a case out of. Reason dictated he spoke as such.

‘I will take you by the throat and I shall kill you now. Just so I may spare this world of an abomination such as yours.

I see no reason to look in any other direction, nor should I reflect upon the magnifying glass.’

He pointed at it in the distance. In the sky, but on the level of a fifth story, where the creatures started pushing at last, cutting a single man, they had kidnapped him when he was ten. And he had suffered of it, as he became, only a glass creature like them. Yet he was different in the same way they had were. Beaten and hardened at the same time, largely disposed as well as he was disposable, thrown on the ground until he was broken, as he joined the singing wonder.

‘Will you take me on as well?’

‘Whatever it takes in order to cure this world of another problem.’

‘But what have I done to deserve it?’

I only came here out of my own time to claim my role as a citizen of this town and take care of one of the misfortunate children there seem to be.’

‘And in return you’ve awakened the most dreadful of them all, the singing voice of falsity.’

Which took a break and could not fathom waiting any longer to claim its line, as it wanted nothing more but to take a fair shot at him before he decided it was time to be gone and make an even direr case out of it now.

‘I will claim your hand and I shall claim is so.

You shall be the deliverer and the executioner, for I will it to be done as such.’

‘And what is the reason for it?’

‘Your lie, that’s all. You did not come here out of the bottom of your heart. Know that I can feel how darkened your heart has become.

Though you may have come here with a darker reason which had changed, it doesn’t change the fact that you have failed.

A man still walks alive.’

Then the other men followed and surrounded him, all seven, line in line. They asked of something and could not believe what was being said of him. He couldn’t be that culprit, the one who promised death. Yielding as he was surrounded, not dumbfounded but close to it, he simply wondered what was going on and why they were messing with him.

‘It is true, unfortunately, I was sent here to claim the life of a man. And I was to end it just as swiftly as I could before he noticed it and before he made it back to his family.

Circumstance pushed me so.’

‘Will you allow us to pass on a judgment on you?’

‘Nay, this is no court.’

‘But it’s an executioner’s worth.’

‘What might we claim it as?’

‘This is the crime scene, for a life has fled and instead of it, another one shall be taken.’

‘But whose life it is to be taken then?’

Mionsopholus looked around, at the other seven men whom, each took a step back as soon as they stopped shaking. Of course they couldn’t help it either. No longer caught upon themselves, no longer tripping on their legs, unable to understand what was going on. But he knew better than this and he would also not be at peace unless he got what he desired.

‘I want you to kill someone from this crowd.

I made sure, though I may not reveal my general purposes and my methods of acting that neither of them should be able to move a single want, or in the making do a single shake of their heads.

If one hair of their scalps, if a single finger of their hands, alas, does as much as pushes on, I shall thread on them and bring them forth to a death unlike any righteousness had ever been carried.

I will have killed them all, but you, dear Mionsopholus.’

A caricature of a deformed man was also eating from the cut head of a cat-pigeon on the nearest adjacent street. He took a bizarre interest in what was going on.

Different time, father away.

‘The doctor left after he killed my daughter, what is there left for me to do?’

No one wept and it seemed like pitty, a rotten horse had left no mark for her to have been gotten a foot off the hearse.

Two and thrice fold.

‘I want to beat women, I cannot help it. It’s in my blood, it’s nothing personal to them. But I can only feel right if the back of my hand meets with the side of her ribs.’

‘What a great person you are, why, I thought about the very same thing. Shall we proceed then into finding one of these women and then split her open?’

‘We should, ha-ha, I think I should dearly look forward to making sure she’ll never walk again.’

And they walked on a strange road, its curves suddenly lead into the air, to a point where all the clouds appeared to push and wrap themselves around it.

They walked alone and never asked too many questions, out of the fear that they might be listened to and made too many eyes starve and follow around. It couldn’t be helped, they were boys after all. And boys only did what their mothers told them. Most of whom were dreadfully start, they could not hide their contempt for those who left them, walking wrong, only in the same way no man’s due. They couldn’t figure out what pushed them to do it.

‘Somehow I think there’s a way we might catch that damned creature if we put up together a band.’

‘That’s pointless, is it not? I can see nothing that might make us do it. No reason to push it too far. Our minds were not made for it.’

‘For what now?’

‘Anything else, but this common way of ploughing, there’s nothing past the hills. Past the swamp there might not be a life worth chasing and I think it’s time to flee.’

‘To where, to where? Out there, we might only find him again and if he finds either of us abandoned and sinking through one of them filthy horses, of his doing, he might pull us back. He might have us if we can’t even defend ourselves. Who might make us?’

‘Whoever wills, now return to your place and marry a lass, have as many children as you can and never leave your house after.’

That was much said, it was a disaster but it could not be told, as soon as it was old. It lay ahead, in a form or another, no brother would touch him. Nor would they erect no fury that might be thrown against his house and will. He took his time, this Giughseppi, and took no worth and no wont. He could not illustrate what had been going on with the lass he had taken, Marlene. She was a piece of the taker’s flower, one that could not bloom in the soon. Everyone had wanted her at a point in life but she could, out of doubt, be taken by one.

But he returned. With grave news as well as she could breathe at least freely out of hand. No matter what way he looked around, he could tell nothing of what had happened in that house. Under lock-down, no emotion, his face said enough despite his best attempts.

‘What are you hiding, Giughseppi?’

‘Nothing, I’m hiding nothing.’

Sweat could be seen, like the clinking noise and dripping ink of an apparatus that wasn’t working rightly no longer, whilst he as a man could think of nothing else but the strange dagger he bore behind his back. Something that no one else wanted to show or piece together while they were around; no wont and no due, he was asked again. This time around no one said a thing, out of the peace of mind he was owed. Just a few more moments before one of them started again.

‘I won’t make this any easier on you just because I know you. And for that I want to slit what’s left of your fingers if I find out that even an evil finger has been lain on top my daughter’s prism a body. What have you done?’

‘Nothing, father, I’ve done nothing to her. I couldn’t have. She’s still pure, ever since the day of my redemption, when I have taken my vowels and took her as my wife. I worry not for nought and I’ve been brought to my knees wanting a woman that’s not to belong to me.’

‘So you’ve cheated on my poor daughter then? Red handed, caught, like a criminal brought to the court of my daughter’s soul. Your grave is but a pact of many, and the devil shall be the prison holder, bearing all the keys.

And all the locks mean naught and seem to melt upon your slum-redemption. You’ve cheated on your wife, you’ve done something to my daughter now. Have you not?

Admit it, bandit, woe, man of little mind, make yourself revealed or I shall bite your head off where you stand, whether or not my daughter is touched.’

And thence he had almost come close to doing it only to be stopped by nothing else other than the sight of the blade. The one thing which remained pure in the world, filled with stains. It made the man blush, as he knew what it meant for him and her. A heart in the making, nothing that would remain for long; as an ever-passing flower boomed upon her dead-bed where her father rested the head of his son.

‘To this, I need you to pay a dear reminder, despite you taking my flower away. I have seen and lain with no other woman and I can see her daughter inside as well. She’s been taken by a son unworthy, not wont for something, desiring for no more. And I have seen my brother taking, no more than what was needed that I may lose my heart to less than for.

Her desire was nothing else, I wish I could draw her away from the world in which she now remains. There’s nothing left to compensate, nothing of the undertaking, nothing close to yet desire.’

And thence the father decided to leave the house but stay with them. To lock and bar the windows as he burned them down before light could convey, the little bit or yet reminder. He who found this in the night, he minded her, and of the story of a man, who had betrayed his woman and his father in a duel that would not be conveyed in any other place, and in no other time.

Thence a day had come at last. It was filled with dread, as the men could not fathom looking at the burial ground that formed in the place. There was no race in all the taking and they would not even dare push on. For all they desired seemed to pass, as soon as the midnight lust faded and they would be called to answer for their crimes. Far journey, lest of all someone should care, it went through, in and out, lost to sounds.

It kept digging and digging until there was the glow, which came out after one of their own darted in. Pried, lost.

‘But there’s no return after this.’

Two meat carvers, which went over his head, one of them didn’t know what to do with it yet.

‘You know what? Enjoy it while it lasts.

It’s the only humane thing there is.’

It didn’t look dull. There was no metal in it. But it looked like the real thing, in bone, cartilage and everyone who had been compressed into that form. Strangely, as one would have to look past it, there was nothing keep it in place, despite it staying.

‘Come on, I think I found someone. We’ll round him up, right there.’

They climbed a bit to reach the spot.

Bringing something off the pot, boiled as they carried it around, they exchanged hands, one grabbed the lover, his wife and they brought them down the ceiling shaft, where they stored all the thermometer-shaped glass, and threw them in a puddle of clicks. Some sparked some pain as the echo began piercing everything around them. Smashing while crashing their world, pushing through, they lost sinew. By the minute bleeding through, some the latter, none the matter, they lost pins by the minute. Ceiling red.

‘I need to employ the use of this knife again, I feel as if the blade’s a sharpening as I cut through the marrow and the meat and the air.’

He realized it after, there was no skin on their bones and it was all a fantasy that they were human. Instead, they walked and stalked some more. Blown out of a fuse, they tried to take a lam down, but found themselves unable to even cut the first cords which appeared to leave to the tube. And a single shimmer, but a clock, and in the making, they brought not a single light bulb with them, only the headless quiet that was docile instead.

‘Call the Cruirax, I need it today. I need to take a shot of many and fill my lungs with hay.’

And they talked with lesser and with the many which approached. From each direction twice the head, they came together and lost their wont. Many appeared to be dressed like hicks and seemed to slum too long in places where not even kin alike would know what happens. No one reported the first crime.

As he walked forth, Michael Cruirax seemed to spread his reflections, all on top the many projections of the ground and on the buildings, clouds and sky. And all were animated as they only imitated what he did. What he had and what he proceeded with, as both of his arms prepared for a strike, he would kill the man if wanted that. He'd do it, outlaw, man of crime.

Do it, the voice came as an order, unable to push it out. He leaped forwards and all of them stroke at once. An ounce of hatred spilled in, he felt it going through himself and peeling out of his skin, there came the entrance to the bar. But it looked like the unnecessary deep dive into a well. Reflections cleared and many men appeared, at once they looked down the well, everyone trying to see who might die and who might live to tell the tale in the making.

Liorotha was pressed against the bar. Pushed down by no one else but Pox, who seemed to have gathered the wrong attention from the wrong men; it happened, ever so slightly that Joyburn and Scaffle were both pointing at the man. They both wanted him dead for no other reason than him being so aggressive despite having no plan and nothing in the mind to garner everything which went on between them.

Charlan had made it out the bar. He took the cowardly route and made it before everyone else.

Carpent was twenty feet away, the Satyr remained in his place, drinking. It looked like The Snake was there just as well, trying to pin his eyes on the two of them, which only left, the one erected as a glutton, a leviathan, not by choice, but of a mongering that made his worth, even lesser than it should've been before. This had been Siskelot who had no wager. He felt no danger and he had been completely changed. He could hear in his innards, talking, all the matter.

They were only trying to pierce through and come to live, without being too deranged, without being too push as to leave and loathe and get away.

It was cold and cold pale. And coal burned behind and the light from the door opened and the entire bar started catching on fire, spreading and caressing just about everything in the lap of the flames. Time was running short and none could even take it forth. Neither of them knew what this meant for them or just how quickly they could get away once they laid their arms down.

'Don't move too quickly now, we wouldn't want to take it down that way.'

'It has to go on that way, the streets won't be safe otherwise. Everyone here's, you're all.'

Pox stopped for a moment and thought. Who was her brother? Who was that woman's brother? They came here for that in the first place and it was only way too obvious that The Snake was looking at him with one of the greatest pairs of the most accusatory eyes he could've spared. It gave him shivers as he ran around. He didn't think of it just then but now.

Could it be the man that went out and left them without the slightest shimmer of a question? No one doubted that there was a chance. Neither of them, especially Pox, who had his eyes on him for a while but he also failed to take a good shot, out of reason and out of fact. He had to push it somewhere before he took it out on himself.

'You're not making it any easier on me either. I seem to have found common ground here and there but it's going to be lost as soon as I'm missing the shot.'

Scaffle said, while he placed himself on the top of a barrel. It didn't matter since most of the barrels had someone who was dead inside of them which left nothing to be drawn from it. Always and always, taken instead of heeded for, and played against. It only went in one direction and they could listen to no one else.

Everyone was being looked down upon from above. They were rooted for with wonder and at the same time, they could not say a thing and plant it yonder.

A darker end

He was the heart and he would rise from the bowels and would walk again, no matter what caught and brought misery to his feet. Or so it looked like when a company of twenty, eight of which were plenty, killed inside their cabins, most of whom deserved it, they could not fashion understanding what went on. A scene would not survive for long if it arrived there.

Finally, he could stretch his yielding reactors, which bothered him no longer in the back. For what was worth they could not call it as anything but a missing arm. It was right there, mocking them as they wouldn't dare. Not for the sly pelted poacher, who held their hands outside, the butcher's den. In which they met, everyone in the crew was dead. But they had been apprehended, before they could touch a thing. Destiny had called them on, and they could finally bow down to their feet. It was uncanny, it could not be anything but long-forlorn, as they retorted and could listen to no one, nothing pushed out of their bodies any more than they could see. Various lighted candle-like figures rose, not out of wax but the same substance made out of burned roses in a vacuum that held smaller guns, made out of the bodies of the crewmen. Bone united, jaw extracted, eyes enacted, they would see.

So many of them had been reanimated on the planet, that there was no wonder of the strange acids burning their skin, in the base where the disgrace which had been their utilitarian-guide had taken on the appearance of a curtained mummified bloody, bloody, bore.

He took his throat out and started stomping on top of it, yelling this:

'I want there to be something more than me taking care of you children and partaking in your plays. Can't you see I'm so bloody threw with it?

After being force to clean up time after time after all you sit and run around and only add more to this inconsistent pile you call a grave, you finally got me. I cannot deal with you no longer, I need a break from this, I need to see something clear, I need a vision.

I want to return home.'

'The ship had malfunctioned, and it is made out of the hives we stole. Our acts are known across the universe and if we're caught with this.'

'I don't care, I only want to be left alone, can't you understand it? I want to be there, back into my house.'

Somehow he knew that a good chunk of it had survived. It was how it was and he could not think of it no longer, it was only going through him this way, they looked around, it stopped making sense. There was a loss that came only at a loss, for them.

‘I wish there was something to strive for, at least when the period of peace will be done for, we can finally arrive there, to him.’

Another man pushed through what seemed to be the last tower of a silicone-milk grinder.

Old fate

The town was sick. As were the buildings; no living man could live in either of them and maintain the same head-strong composure as someone outside the madhouse pointer.

‘What is the meaning of this intrusion?’

He, as many others before him could not understand a thing of what was happening around them. For starters, they were too pinned in the head to realise what was going on. It was hard to image a world with them in it. Neither of them would be allowed to survive, they didn’t have not, they couldn’t. Unless something was to change, they were doomed to turn this town into a cemetery, their homes into coffins.

‘Would you like to dance now?’

One of the blotches approached. Its sack-like appearance almost burst out as it approached. There was no stopping to the amount of the stress they constantly forced their bodies to undergo.

Something had to happen. Too much time passed, yet not a single man moved. They had been locked inside for too long, broken goods, as someone could refer to them. In as much as twenty minutes it would at least be settled down, whether or not someone complained, there would be no use trying to keep the plugs going.

Part of the complex degenerated, most specifically the bunk beds, which were beasts of their own. Despite the fact that they were somehow struck inside the nearest other parts of furniture which was kept around the room the men were stored in, they had completely assimilated one another. More so, most of them allowed some kind of entry to happen from around the wall; large plugs coming out of the one burnt, almost completely melted serpent-roll, which crept around its dark surroundings, still watching out for some lonesome meat.

‘It got another one of us already.’

‘We’ll get him back in a few days, don’t worry about.’

The regiment would say. Or so we called him, he was out of it, just as much as everyone around him was. Heavy on sedatives and painkillers, the other thing still pushing out of his body as he squirmed around behind our backs. Our organs had been sold, and there were actual bidders present around the place who made great use of us. We were determined not to leave in any case.

‘Stay, at least a few days if you can. I think most of us will be able to make it through.’

‘How exactly will we make it? How are we supposed to live through this? This medical loony is falling apart as we speak. The curtains have already been eaten if not starved themselves and we can’t even move on our own.’

There was the other problem, but he hadn’t dared talk about it just yet. Not while he was still in the open, wondering who might hear him. Someone was intercepting their messages and was carrying them as far away as he could. From the looks of it, they were smoke-screens, plain and simply covered by some beatings of some finger drums. Most of them had been masked in a way or another. It didn’t make much of a difference in any case.

‘We should make it by noon at least, I hope so. You wouldn’t believe just how many people we have waiting on the other side.’

‘Like whom for example? Most of my acquaintances are long dead. I sometimes look around at my only family and often reach the realization that you’re not any better. There’s nothing inside of you, and I simply can’t shake this feeling that you’re wrong, somehow.’

‘Of course we are, anyone with a clear eye sight can see that, look around you. Some of us have god damn plugs shoved inside our face. Do you think it’s going to get any better than this on the other side of the pound?’

Because I seem to have reached the opposite conclusion.’

He was right about something for the very least. It didn’t look too bright amongst the halls. As a matter of fact, the most approachable thing out there was the very silence which was drowned by the heavy machinery which was being worked in the distance. That alone said something of the innards of this different species of container they had been pushed in. Somewhat strange, he had no intention of asking further questions, yet he looked. It was as much as he could do.

‘Take a hike for a while, you’ll come to realize that the life is sunnier within our very small medical facility than it is out there. You might very well be surprised by what you’ll find.’

‘If I die along the way, what then?’

‘Then you’ll have proven my point and I’ll have slept a lot better during the night.’

It was as much as he was going to give me. And I had little to no consideration to what was going on any longer. First stranger in a while, this was going to go well. He looked healthy enough, safe to approach, friendly, if that could be said of him. A bit mundane, like a person taken from life before entering this damned ‘pound, but he wasn’t going to complain about it either, or make too much of a case out of it. He was strange upon turning. He acted in the most peculiar manner. First his limbs were not attached properly, the man was put back together improperly, especially around the jaw and the lower side of his body, the parts that appeared to have been touched together and placed in rows. Most likely, this was a strange result of some unnatural choice he had made in life. His fingers were benign, in a most intrusive look-a-like flint-like object he bore in the back. As wide as it appeared to be, this was only pushing out at time because of its needs to shove itself deeper through his spine.

There was something there, I had to ask.

‘Why am I able to see through you?’

‘I’ve been made out of some transparent liquid, that’s why. It hurt during the process.’

‘What did?’

‘My livers, both of them started irradiating one another which the machine was working on my body and before I knew it, they simply became two sharpened rocks. And they forced their way out, through the ranks and through the bones, before I knew it, I was gone.’

‘May I feel them for myself? I think I have some medical knowledge I could put to great use.’

‘There’s no need for you to try any longer.’

I think I’m well enough to walk on my own feet. At least I think I am. After all, I made it so far.’

‘That’s good to hear.’

They broke the next set of silent walks with nothing but a quick workaround. Both of them had been just as quick on their feet to notice the structural damage which happened around. It was just as hard for him to accept this place as it was for everyone else. Nothing appeared to give in. Not the nautilus-membrane which spread nor the ones in hiding.

‘I’m Ihloh.’

‘Malcon, it’s a strange name you have there Ihloh.’

‘I suppose it is.’

Heads turned and they were already out of the picture as well. Without much in doubt, they shared nothing of the contingency which had been set in store for the soldiers that lost their heads when the time was on. And it kept clicking on with each passing minute, taking everything away before long. It was unfathomable, how they would spend minutes after the hour, trying to peer in.

They were trying to get a word through, but they failed. It was a matter of time and of fracture. It didn’t pay off to take too much of a risk and see everything break underneath your eyes.

Breaks on the walls as well, a few of them stalking the nearest living being that could walk. It felt almost moronic trying to wait for it to break. One would be just enough for everything to fall out of place.

‘I don’t think I want to listen to reason any longer.’

‘It’s way past that.’

Then they stopped talking. Both of them went into their separate ways, walked on over the span of a few days and afterwards, they've never been seen again. Not a single man appeared to remember who he was or what the span of time spoke of him. That was someone who appeared to have gone just as fast as he had lived, instead of waiting to die there and be used for plugs. Many survivors in the medical facility gave away their energy and their blood, pruning their bodies until they could breathe and live no longer.

It was clear enough that the colors of the stalking people showed themselves when it was late. During the early hours, they rubbed each other, then conceived to naught.

An uncanny world.

In the absence of the Duke some of the armies that came forth began a siege without needing to heed the return of their promised general.

As opposed to living through what appeared to have begun as the greatest revolution that was ever to be embraced on the plain of Couross, past the valley of dry rivers, where the bodies of the fallen rose. And whence they came to power inside the bodies of the giant plain-bluish rose-like shells they sapped themselves through, they sang the songs of the plain. Monotone, let alone, be it called as one may be able to look back at it and call for a reprise.

'Sir, I think there's something you need to be told.'

'What is it Myopehn.'

Gulgaheirn approached the strange champion he chose out of the stricken troops. They who were alone in the quarrelsome approach in the time where something fell upon their fingers and they began calling forth. Their gods, let alone their prayers had not been answered, nor would they be satisfied. Something was denied of them, as the time called upon the tide of war which carried on.

What stood against them was the hold, upon a single root, up-told. Held by it before it ran, out of the first grounded eight bridges which were surrounded by their seemingly uncanny army, their endless troops pouring out, the end of the world being shoved and abandoned into the shroud, during a time when the core was saved. It was important that they remained alive, until everything was set, so that none of them would die.

'I asked something of you before stretching the peaks and seeing the world through the looming, creeping stares we stole from them.'

As everyone on ground appeared to bear single eye-binoculars which had been stolen out of the very sockets of the loudly glancing, never rancid distressed attenders. A lack of clear voice was seen, they couldn't hear nor would they understand for what reason could they sack this city for.

'We need to prevent the country from rising up. That's about it, there's nothing you could tell me that will make any difference in the great wars to come.'

I think you've stretched yourself far too much for a single soldier.'

Since the rising, hence the fall; one of the generals pricked his head and smashed it between the deranged looking claws he held beneath the armor. 'We won't make it through two sun cycles unless you feed your men.'

'I suppose we won't.'

There was no need to make it through in any case, as long as a single man passed through. There was no reason to sniff around. Scents brought misery, since the field smelled of manure.

'If we have to, we'll deal with the provisions later. But it wasn't meant to be.'

For some reason, as if sworn around the head, there was a voice calling in the distance, it wanted to remain.

Farther inside the compound; it had to go that way. At least from the looks of it, they were only trying to spy on one another, without doing much to forget. Whichever came with an idea to tie an ankle to the looming rope was nothing more than an infant-head.

'If I find whoever's done this, he will be severely punished.'

'And what will you do to him exactly?'

Everything was a mess, even the way he spoke. Out with the courage, into the gutter; as they could only impress one another for so long with their little-to do mindless yabbering. Sharp as they were, neither one saw the tiny details around the sparkling shiny stairs. They went down some invisible road without even knowing it, without a waste of mind.

'We're here for a reason, right?'

'Suppose we are, what about it?'

'Could we at least?'

'I won't entertain a second more.'

Both of them stopped. They were nameless, but they bore what seemed to be a filling. Every orifice punctured, then pushed out, with strange finger-like animal sponged pushing out. They had been very much likely to find a way to die there. Or at least to stumble upon someone they might mess with. It was their only solace.

Now they came around, simply placed around one of the many edges of the diamond cutting, jotted marks. Both felt around with their new senses. It felt peaceful, in some way. It never came natural before, at least not this way. Calmly they put down their weird helms. Luckily no one was around to see it happen. Relaxing or not, this could not even be remotely put on their arms or heads. Banded together, they completely ruined their complete anatomy by pushing themselves over. And it was clear that they did not take a liking to it either, since they hardly wanted to release something from their backs. Suits became skin, as they emerged.

No wing buds in the back but something similar to the droning abdomen of the beings who would've had them. Henceforth, the coming of both tail-ends, in which smaller reproduced human-like specimens dwells; not long after they stopped talking, those things began taking the sides of their arguments. IT was the only solitary thing they had. A moment was shared.

'I keep hearing those damn notes.'

'They will stop, it's something we shouldn't bother ourselves with. You wouldn't happen to know the time now, would you?'

'What for? It's not like we're trapped inside of them.'

'Silence, both of you, I can feel the vibrations pushing out the walls. Someone's heading our way.'

But whom and what could it be? They only started pushing outwardly like headed-cyclons, monsoons of people-like fragments, all of which were held together by one of the spatial belts, the ones in control of asteroids and the time-cognition in the machines. A few batteries could be seen protruding out, right before they shone, while their shining light started merging with the clearest walls that came into their view. No one spared a second more, as they realize that they could not survive standing in its way.

'Quickly, down on your knees and beg for your lives.'

It was about everything he could come up with in a short period of time. Right before it began, it ended just as quickly, thence their arms were gone and that hurricane disappeared. Conflicted, they had no idea what might come yet. What to do or how to get away.

They turned. Got up, simply unscathed, with everything considered, as the call had already been made and they simply would be left to live the rest of their lives that way. It was a hard-earned punishment they didn't know the reason behind. No sacred man could care about what mattered after. Nothing was complete as long as they stood still.

Reason dictated no action, hence they bore no reaction to everything happening around them. After such a long time, they patched their hands and decided to go. Some empty words would change nothing.

Christine's brother, second appearance. It wouldn't count for a reason that was not needed to be stated. If he were to will it, they would both stop breathing as soon as he began pounding on them with all the strength he could muster. But that would not do and he wasn't in the right place for it. Everything went only in a quick direction. They would wait on him before moving on.

'He spared us.'

'Why do you think that is? He seemed more than capable of strangling both of us. It wasn't going to happen. There were other ways to kill a man which hadn't even been discussed yet.'

The drums were a payoff for the guilt he felt, after breaking both of his friend's arms. He was finally at peace, resting, knowing that he had nothing to fear, as long as he would remain near Christine, she would not stop breathing. At least, that's what he reassured himself with every passing gaze.

'I came here to do something, would mind if I were to?'

‘Of course, take all the time you need. I’ll be here if you need something.’

She had to believe that much. It was poignant, trying for something else. Could there be something worse than it? Who dwelled past the fingers and could not see it?’

‘But who signs when the stars are done and what might the bickering of their growths seek after they’re done?’

For those who had the chance to look at the new space only realized how pitiful it all looked in comparison to their memories. Whichever direction might they fade it, never matter, let alone, they couldn’t search, hearts erect, the grith and the catch. And never had they reached the place, where they might talk to him, without a face, one of the thirteen hundred who had only one tiny region of their jaws, floating constantly out of their open crevice, which had been their empty gaps. From there, they rose into the sky, only to be reproduced again and again, in the never ending cycle they created for themselves. It was hard to focus, let alone care, there was something to be looked for, out there.

‘Fealty to them, I see no reason to look after the ones ahead.’

Yet they spoke no less than needed, heeding no advice as one of the ships finally appeared inside the walls. It could not be controlled any longer. The way through which it pushed itself through, that and be away, anchored here, there, just about anywhere where one might touch the helm and hamper going through it again. First mate appeared there, out of the gust of his guts, he couldn’t steer it properly, hence he did not speak, leaking out of his bloody purse, an unfathomable piece of grith.

Again, the sign through which the brass emerged, though it was ruddy, liquid-like, almost unsanitary in the way it pushed out in the light.

‘I look towards the sea and I can only seek vengeance through my woe. I seem to have lost my eye, captain.’

‘Needless, be, needless be said of what I hear now, as I shall soon erect no word and I shall only look after what you might hear and what might come forth.’

Thence the coming of no satisfaction, as they only come to seek no peace. Out of the court and into the breaking, they were undertaking nothing more, for those people had never been allowed a second more or closure and respire.

Their ending faded, their guts contorted and from inside of them the servants of the court, the jesters with no filth of them, sent her lo’ and behold.

She was a woman now, in all her primes, Ecilla, now her name, to be. In wonder she had come just as bloated and deformed as she was before. Like a prude, uncannily wondering what this might be. Unable to protect herself from the mad and the uncanny, she jolted with her floating arms, as they threw forth the nets her fingers had become. Out of the sea of floor-water, into which the pulmonary barnacles appeared to push in, they could not satisfy no longer, waiting for the prick disease; thence they called on them.

‘Return to bowels of the ship and do not flood this place.’

It was hard to face it, let alone could they care. Harder by the minute, harder, to maintain some kind of mental prowess, something to make them still alive, now they couldn't handle thinking, let alone walking on the floor, benign.

'That's it.'

Said one of the soldiers who looked around a corner, he came right up front, with a railer, taken as he had shammed' it from another man who dared yank the tip of his hat from the looks of a cap. And he opened up with the fanfare.

'I know what it is, I know what it is and you cannot call it false.'

He pointed at the ship, then around the general floor and the area surrounding the compound and said.

'I think that's nothing else but the culprit and the source of all that wood which appeared inside the room.'

'What had given it away then?'

Of course there would be little said, no matter how they pointed, no matter where they darted to, they couldn't fathom looking through, nor asking for some mad arrival, surviving least of all to the fittest who called him forth.

A man like him had never been, but one in particular, whose name could almost be sinned.

'I have killed a man.'

The drunk awakened.

Aleksey said so, as soon as he woke up from the slumber. No sooner had he cared, nor did he dare contradict himself with what was going on. With everyone staring, those villagers who made two steps, they covered his mouth, with a sock instead a fist as he deserved to.

'Do you have any sense or are you a lout?'

'Of course I have no doubt that I have done what I claimed to have done.'

'No doubt, I said lout, you are a lout for shouting during a war.'

‘But what have I to fear now? With him on my side?’

‘Aleksey, that bottle is empty.’

‘Who said that?’

Almost missed it, again, he almost missed it. There was no way he could find it again, not ever through, not the same way he had found it, lost. He lost another wit, by the time he turned around and asked again.

‘Explain yourself, I asked you a question.’

‘Did you forget your old friend already? Have I been gone for that long now?’

He wanted to smile and look for him, but he realized he wasn’t there. Nor was there anyone around him as soon as he started talking to himself. The entire room full of old people and the children took a step back and never looked for him to soothe.

‘Aleksey, but what is happening to you?’

‘Have I been talking to myself again? It happens, it happens, I think.’

He bit his lip while almost doing it. Konstantin was here, without a doubt, that was his voice I heard. It was troubling, hearing him after a while would turn out to be much worse than he anticipated. If Konstantin was there, so would the other Dina. And if she were around to tell his wife.

‘I have to leave at once.’

‘Sit.’

‘You know I can’t do that. I need to make it to her in time.

Who knows on what my poor Dina had been living on during my absence.’

He took over one of the bear pelts with him and listened to no advice from the elders. He was all to set on it to give it a second round of thought, hence he started walking, never talking back to none. They tried, but in their attempts, thwarted by him, as he would not listen to them this time around.

‘I might’ve given you a chance to come with me. That way you might’ve been safe. But I’m afraid I cannot tell for certain.

I could or may as well die on my way out there, and give not a single one of my good will to my dear old wife, Dina.’

‘But Aleksey, for how long have you been gone from your home?’

‘At least a few months, from what I can tell, years at most.’

‘Wouldn’t that mean she’s been long dead In your absence? You’ve been gone for so long.’

‘I won’t hear of it no more. My dear wife is waiting for me and I shall do nothing of the sort to disappoint her.’

It wasn’t like him to turn back on a word. After being watched so intently by all of them, he almost had a shimmer of compassion, which was short lived. He walked away. A single stalk grew along the walls of dirt which surrounded the village. He had not remembered any of it growing there, nor the lions of stone which were bricked as they passed around, the hunting men with their hunting dogs in bed. Various men grouping around and pinning down the house themselves only to end up spraying the empty rooms.

They were largely disorganized, trying to pin down whatever they could despite not being asked or put in their formation. He wasn’t interested in joining the fight or driving them away. But this was desperate, it was too desperate of an attempt for there to be any chance of success.

On his way out, he saw a little goat he walked through. It died in an instant with a bloodbath instilled. The troops didn’t notice this happening nor did they hear what went on the other side of town, as he continued going through whichever need he had in mind. He was a mile off, already on his way past the wall, through which he simply pushed through, leaving a trail behind him of killed hen, chicken and various other poor farm animals he had taken with him, bearing a camp-like fire in his other hand, as he simply roasted them within his fist. The coal might’ve been jarring for his hand but there’d be no stump to be had. His hand was strong enough, his skin was iron, he wouldn’t be leave without a scar but it would heal in no time.

Which brought him back to what he was asking by the time he started going back; to the first signs of what had happened inside the forest, where all the leaves were either blue or black. From the copper shells and the bullet holes which still remained in a manner or another, he got out of his way walking backwardly in twin spots. He couldn’t listen nor would he want to look back. It was an achievement, going so far as to ask what went on through his head. He wasn’t going to allow them to move too quickly on him. There was not a single change he could do it, especially since they were trying to peep in one of the stumps, the ones which had holes in them. Creeping through the most unworthy and the most disgusting of them still; what was going on inside the soldier’s heads? Had they no shame whatsoever? Not even the house-critters could he as shameless as to do it in front of the small crowd which had been amassed around the trunk.

Some kind of joy was not meant for this world. Upon meeting them, they immediately put their hands upon the woolen-wood. If there was anything that could be drawn from it, that was the rejection that crossed his mind. He could not fathom staying for too long, yet too slow on the act. On the verge of being delirious, he trampled over them right before they landed their shots. Winds were on his side, at least so had it appeared.

No one could face him head on, but they could not get away in time either. Everyone who’s ever faced him appeared to have lost something. It was too much of a bother to think of it in any either way. Life without Aleksey had been hard.

Especially through the first years since he left home.

Outside it was cold, still snowing.

The life of Dina Ugryumov was one met by loneliness, that in the midst of bearing a child while her husband was out there, in the open, long since gone. There wasn't enough coal around the house to last her the entire winter and it was only getting worse as the winds started puffing against the still window frames and the wild broken hen that started running wild atop the highest point on top the roof. She would last a while, she thought. At least until her husband decided to come back for her.

No, her life wasn't anything but living in there, taking care of the house. Being a homemaker to a man who wasn't around. She wasn't breast-boned yet. That was for certain. And there was nothing she wanted more, despite being closed inside, the passing of the time taking everything she had on her, to be with her husband.

A white-furred cat lay outside. It was one of the snow felines, of the canine family, pouring out of its almost melted skull. With everything taken into consideration, if she were to cross ways with the critter, she would simply eat it, if the chance called for it. Without any hesitation whatsoever, she could simply take the nearest route and eat it like one of the small cold fleas that started leaping out if it.

'Where is he?'

It was the hundredth time she asked of him. There was no one, absolutely no one.

'Some of the cat herders ran away.'

'Why is that?'

'That's simple. They couldn't stand the cold any longer.'

Talk was cheap and winter would solve neither of their problems. It was time to stay their hands and look for wilder surroundings.

A dance that wouldn't stop, somewhere in the woods, trying to cut the throat of a single ice-dove which appeared out of one of the many trees; there was something uncanny about everything. In there, another one of the jitters started.

It was all in the intonation, all of her access to the civilized world was cut. She was a lone woman now, in waiting. But he never came back.

'I'll wait another day and he if doesn't come, I'll set out there for myself.'

But she knew that it wasn't true, at least not in the way she expected it to be. Later in the day she found herself inside the stall, seeing the haggardness of her age. Not getting any younger despite the claim. She tried getting herself ready but failed to pick up on the tools that were missing in the cabinet. It got sadder, the fact that her husband hadn't even trust as much.

Most of the razors had been dulled to an extreme. It got harder to breathe, but only because she was out of breathe, having run across the main room until she had come as close as to exhaust herself. If there was something else she feared, other than loneliness, it was angering him. Won't do that, then.

Dina left the stall and came back into the main room. Too peculiar, way too out there for her, it only seemed like she had no other choice but to bathe in the air.

The colossal mess remained.

No one listened to the distant moans of the empty groove in the lapse.

Far into the cold.

A species like theirs could not last for long, especially unattended in places where art flourished, since it was against their beings, the solace which only pushed through their skulls being one of inferiority which propagated their backs to turn. And inside of them there was nothing humane, as the representation of the Antevioire could only signal the previous makings of some inferior specimens which made their predecessors pale in comparison with what they had become now. Two first branches could be seen sprouting from the first and the foremost taken, whichever that be'.

There wasn't anything around, not a single stop they hadn't touched, ruined or somewhat managed to break into the arch. No more hard pressing any longer, no more than it was needed. Some desert flora grew here and there but it was still somewhat sparse from what could be seen.

'I say we advance now, there's no need to wait for something that's never going to arrive. I think the land's barren enough for no life to develop.'

'But what if we wait here for a while? We have only the three families of Orth, Ung and Vhein to look after. And they are hard folk with locks of steel and they shall stand the peeling of sun and the many winters that shall come after.'

It could only go the way they spoke, without a single way of knowing how they started pushing everyone away. No sight in the making and none may do for what happened to the weather after. It's been way too long since anyone drove the cattle into breeding, the hordes of shipyards broken near the coast. Where they may not approach for the likes of any and whence none may ask for a second chance at this new life which dragged them back to their ancestral land. It took them much longer than expected to get there, as the journey had not only been wearisome but taxing to bone and mind.

Blinded by nothing else but the memories of their kin, how they could still be seen around them, plowing through their large forts and looking forth for the next attrition war.

Olumonark came forth with nothing more but the heading ark he had made by his own hands out of the large wind-touched wooden plunges he had claimed his own. Chimes danced to him inclined, in a plane where he had reigned over everyone. He was mighty, they were low, the invaders should've known that there was no chance, over the makers. Neither of them would've known of the body of the large burning insurrection. Farther into the woods, the hunters gathered, all of whom wore pelts of gray. Some of them wore antlers, heading, towards the spear-heads that would not remain. Not in their caves where it was warm and well, not to be too touched by the bears.

But one famed Ivar, with teeth as rotten, made of petty ice. Who had elated himself with nothing else but the bear-biting and the milking of honey hives, had finally stepped forwards, in need to ask mighty Olumonark, who was not petty and bore no escort, nor would he face any quietness to the making in the need to entertain the question.

‘What have you stepped out your home for? Why have you come here in a land that will not welcome you no more?’

Long since you have lain here and no longer shall you be found welcome at all, as we are your descendents mighty, in the heart and in the betterment of our fists and our weapons of steel as well.’

And they had looked upon one another. Nought distinguished them, other than the clothes. Yet they had been driven apart by time as they could not fathom carrying on, not while their hearts were fading, not while they were dying of worth. They were unmatched in steel together, but long since they, driven forth.

‘We’ve taken lands and we made a name for ourselves. But what have you done here?’

‘Warmed the caves and took care of our young. Thought you need to know that we have no intention of disturbing you, as, are we not brothers after all?’

Should we not betoken of dreams and cold and warm ourselves near the camps when the wolves are out? You’re not different than us, other than your need of conquest and betterment be pale.

You stepped outside and faced the tides and felt the warmth of the outside.’

‘Yet we have returned where we began and as you can see, nothing changed us.’

‘Nay, you lie. For I can see something else that bothers me, once and thrice, I cannot fathom looking at it any longer, as I know of it and cannot bode. I cannot fathom you as one of my own.

Your heart is anything but humble, you turned on them and only came back when needed and in need or much retreat. Covered at your feet by many, lacking in destiny, and now.’

The mighty Olumonark knelt down to Ivar, whom he had long-forlorn the need to pay credence to any kind of respect, whichever may have passed through his heart. He was in need to be lesser, to push through and ask for more. There was something he desired, but he was in no need to realize it no more.

‘What then, what have you come for?’

‘I have returned in need of guidance, for our path may have strayed. But we cannot remain the same unless they could fathom less.’

There was a liking, of the snow, they could not have bode, the making, worth of less. Headless, makers, of the storm, once in the making, there was nothing to look after. Not to say, not to bathe into the sun’s making and into the pain they yearned for, once they paled.

But it could not be told of them either.

‘I don’t think there’s a way back.’

‘Try the door.’

One of the handles, one of eight of them which stood on top of one another only appeared to be connected, moving around the door. Shifting through the material until they stopped, in a single squared formation, twice at the frame, one at the keyhole, below a few of the ringed screws and a few bolts on top of them, all of which only shot from one another at they pulled out, in a melting formation which drew and neared its top. He couldn't see past it, and that's what dragged the entire room down with them for the next few hours that followed.

Both legs were lost at first through peculiarly patterned almost checked boarded floors which shot from both angles, as they saw their faces, twice their necks push through the two corded shafts which attempted sharing the swallowing of the room as they were being shot against them. Neither felt in danger any longer. It would be extremely hard to see it happen otherwise, with all that missattention being spread between them and the constant cracking of wood, they sharpened no boot and had nothing to do with anything in the surrounding holes. From them, there pushed the air and in the gulps they holes took even the metallic shafts started being eaten, piece by piece until the legless ones were drawn in, unable to contain no word or account for the extreme stress their bodies had been put through.

And once blood came out, through it the liquid bone strung itself in the most uncanny matter, trying to blow its fuse of cartilage until it had come back to its solid form, which spread their bodies like eagles until they needn't walk or crawl but merely try themselves to glide op top of a peculiarly entranced platform upon which they needn't say no more.

'I see that you survived as well.'

'You could tell just by looking at me? I seemed to have felt the opposite.'

But he shied away from saying it fully, as he would be mightily unruly as to what was happening there, the deeper they went, the harder had it become to breathe air and expel their lungs. A worthy puddle's strings, the wings were missing, eaten by the parasitical yielding grits that entered them. One of the men quickly noted of the fact that there was no possible way out, not out of this act and certainly not without breaking a bone. It would be jointed and somehow, it would attempt to repair itself as if there was no way to stop the wounds. All around them, in dirt and earth, the glory of something which was not theirs and would never try pushing them away. It came near as no disease would, it pushed through them as one man changed around his wild surroundings, never asking and never wondering what their future might just be. A gluttony of thoughts followed, one might follow this at least. There was no peace, just termination, they were determined to bash each other at their feet.

'First the man needs walk.'

'And whom might show us?'

'I shall.'

Said the voice of the Knight forlorn, that of Chivalry had come forth. He had a voice of ages, golden, and struck by the fact that he had reached other men in need of helping, he spent not a second more before he came forth, asking for no pay as he conveyed little to no emotion through in. Sparingly, he started counting, all the lances, knives were dancing. All the spears, some of the shields, his dead ostrich, which was abandoned somewhere but he was still on his feet. Even after all this time, without a squire to admire his work, he simply showed the two lurches how easily it was for him to walk forth. Though there was no saying of the pains, they would remain there for longer than it was needed, as would he in the case he prepared on conveying, all the arks, of the making.

In the dark, no one minded the light he had in the making, after rubbing two feathers taken from his dead rider, his general and admirer and finder of better worth, he held it yonder and saw to it that he would look towards the hole from which they appeared to have flown out of. And it was desperate, there was no mark, there was no way of saying just how deep that abyss' waste pushed through in the makings of his wasted graves. Little throng and many longs-necked creatures pushed on, only to have stopped themselves, yet revealed. Into the light they lost their humane appeal and had become lesser than thin, no more skin on them, only the making of the irrational bodies they shared. Though it may have been unfair to judge them on that, the solitude they endured compared to none and naught should say to them.

Chivalry could not have cared any less than what the fiends were praying.

'Don't disturb them now, I seem to have figured it out. They're only here for some reason, they want to rebuild what we've broke upon our treason.'

'But what have the two of you done?'

'We've only tried to escaped now, for no reason, for no worth, inside the makings of Kazakow, I think we said just enough.'

And brought to the disquiet, fading, they never wondered what he was saying, or mumbling between his large moustache-ends. He wanted to make a point out of them but he could not convey any rightful emotion, or any explanation that might do.

'I wish I could save you somehow. But I cannot, I'm simply struck, I have my armour in the making, I've got the means to least of all continue through the reeds. I know that if time's plain enough I could somehow still make it and escape this place before it draws me in just in the manner of taking. As you were taken yet as well; were you not like me once?'

'Nay, we were wicked, as though an apple would be rotten by a heart that sunk inside your woe's wrath. I see that you've decided to be as kind enough as to impart a blessing but know that wretched is what we are. More so, we would admire, if yonder you may come to us. And draw no blessing and no sympathy for the little numbers we have.'

'There are others like you?'

'Somewhere above, in hiding and waiting for us to return with news, unless we made it through and escaped, it was said in the waiting that one of us should at least attempt.

Just so we could know whether or not there's a way to be. Through the tunnels and into the outside world where life flourishes and there's no need to prolong this agony.'

'But you have not made the slightest amends just yet. For I know that the path ahead is filthy, rotten, desperate and shall yield to none. I know that out there, in the wild, there's none and naught that might look upon you with kind blessings or any kind of help or aid.

It's a world from which I have not come from, as I am merely in the passing. But I have seen just enough to say. There's no hope out there, to make a living and to fight against the woe of lands.'

'What awaits us past the gates?'

'There's no open stone door, of stone or root. Instead there's only a living thing that shakes when shook and never shook.'

'How have you come to be?'

'I was merely manifested here upon the flight, from the coming of a forest that came alive and decided it was their time's worth and worth had called for them to leave.'

'Will you bless us with more knowledge then? Seeing how you're fashioned for a war and knowledgeable?'

He only nodded but could not reveal. That out of all the lances, the blades, the spears and the knives, the shields and the other pads he had been wearing on top of him, none of them seemed to be real in the same way he and they were. More so, one of them noticed how easily his hand passed through one. As if they were mere illusions, crafted by the likes of a liar, to deceive a foe.

'But what is that you're wearing on top of you? Are they not supposed to be used? Even on a wearily forlorn day?'

'I see that you have noticed it as well. To that I can only show you the other side, the part of me which is still here but still died.'

And from his side, as if he had been his souls, another man who looked like him fell on the ground and shook before he came to death. Like a puddle that could not be touched, he melted, as if he could tell the better stories, as if it would matter to him if he had lived. Unfortunately it didn't matter any longer, as no difference could be made within the seconds they spent together and time being stringed apart. No one was a victor there and his life was being told with each of them who fell down. As for every man that fell before them, a younger and yonder came a lad. But he fell as well as every other, only to point out at how some of his blades were just as infantile as he had once been, like that.

He ended the show and saw every part of his soul dissipate, no longer straying. His path be damned but he kept paying. Some attention to them, determined to make something if he could do it as well as he said he would.

'Look, thee yonder, I see they had rebuilt the land. I see that they fixed just about everything and there's no other way around. You need to follow me before the living thing closes and you shall be struck by the staying forth. Just as I will as I see no way to return, I think I shall remain in here and ask for nothing more.'

And thence they had agreed. No longer in the need to flee from whichever fear might've driven them. Though they needn't look humane, there was something about them which made Chivalry feel ever-so threatened by their presences, that much could be said of fact. He didn't want, not had he intended on spending too much time surrounded by their or similar king. Hence he showed them around and how they might convey as much of the space as possible without losing their tongues. No servitude, nor anything in the making, nothing to push and wreathe. It was destiny, after a while, which showed them around to their misgivings.

‘So this is it, rightly so?’

They asked of him as they had glided, here in the entrance-part, the only thing that lead to the living, through the open mandible of which, rotated as it was and the likes of the despot it wore, through which they might finally escape and make it back out there, where needed. No more would they breathe through this filthy air and enjoy a life of uncannily destroyed hopes. He had to have been a liar. There had to be something out there.

And all this space wasted, painted in red, a living material, mostly organic that had no will of its own, nor had it been bothered by them at all. Instead, it seemed to have somewhat, though this seemed to be more likely a speculation of the strange touch of paranoia, that it knew that they were there, for some reason or another, it knew. Without a doubt, it would make no point, no worth that would be spread between them. Thence the quiet faded.

Opened the living through which the two of them went. Leaving their people behind, leaving Chivalry with them, with little to no doubt as to what was going on around.

It was all planned before they even. A few shots were being loaded in.

Right before Aleksey smashed the soldiers into the trunk he thought of her. Right before the first shot missed, he almost bit his lip thinking.

‘Can’t missed it now.’

It was strange, but she asked for it. During some days, there was no purple around her eyes. She was being docile. But the snow was white. And she was around the house, always. Never missed a day for as long as she was there, which said a lot about both of them.

‘I think it’s going to snow.’

‘But it always snows.’

He kept thinking about that bottle for some reason. How he shoved up her.

‘I think I should go.’

‘Leave then.’

‘I won’t be late, I should only be missing for a few days.’

He left without a word.

Some time after, in more than a few, fifty, more so than any wasted moment which passed through them asked. A rock was dropped from the top of the sky, it was the fragmented cluster which held all the atoms together from spilling out and releasing the ferocious vapour which would threaten to completely annihilate the leftover of the nuclear arsenal in the world.

It happened on a farm, past the revolution, when there was only a single man working in his laboratory as no layman could count his blessings past the Constitution, leaving him to be apprehended by the secrets. All of them were walking with silent steps which were also too vulgar for this world and it felt like with every step a child had died somewhere, unable to contain himself, as his weeping mother finally let go of the last doll. Why would they leave her behind? Like a poor starving dog and a stray, despite being well-behaved and afflicted by the cold?

No one would talk to poor Valinskya, she would be allowed to sit in a corner and do nothing 'else she would get slapped. It was in poor faith, time after time, they went for the rabid look and the beating shook her until she couldn't walk properly. This happened all the time and the chicken flocks were finally freed. Inside of them, the bomb, the rock had been split amongst hundreds if not millions of them until there was not a single one which could not fathom going along with everything going on. Every single time, not a hen would be found not to be missing them and when everything was realized, when they just happened to observe what was going on there, the kick-side burner started kicking back in until it could go no longer and they walked back in, concentrating on another ma'am.

Some of the ladies knew what was going on, even before the men had.

'Where have all the chicken went to?'

'Some have been lost here and there and I think just about anywhere where there might be some lost morning.'

'But they cannot feed themselves on coffee like we can.'

'They can, I've seen them during one morning just like that. They're always there, always looking for a way to break through the night.'

Night is their land. Night is their veil, their clothes and everything else that separates them from us. It is not merely the shade but the very thing which enfolds them and prevents them from completely destroying us during our sleep.

It was hard to say it, especially since none may know the better. But every single living human being was atomic. And only the women knew of the location of the annihilation which lay hidden inside the hen. That was their den and their den was the eternal night. During day, they watched out for the remnants of the secret police and the other branch with was Omeskunkhe, branch taken from one man who had arrived in this part of Kleikonova before the coming of the passport-grabbers and the knee-tasters. Which in turn left all the surrounding flora turned into the coat of a land which had less snow and more mountain steps than any other town in the adjacent area. Leaving them wondering how they even got there in the first place to begin with.

Cue to them, a cut in the fabric revealed much. Many of the old ladies appeared to have worn no pin but instead, they lost themselves, unable to think straight.

'Where are my finger?'

‘Shut up woman, I need to hear my own thoughts going. I can’t remember what’s happened three days ago.’

Checking the watch again, there was something definitely in there, an old thing, rubbed against the waist. Wasted around each roundness of the room, they were prepared for the pass. If a single man died, he could expect to completely disappear and enter the dimension without having his entire mass be missed as it went away. And he would take everyone on the planet and form replicas of them as well. It could only go so far, as to say or to at least admit that they didn’t even know what was going on. Unable to figure out whether or not they could be hinted at by the strange afterlife.

The fading, peace ended abruptly. It was the morning of September ten.

Many women dressed in red and white and striped which went to blue and orange, caught around their heads like a scarf but their locks clearly exposed. Many eyes were in hues of bright pale gray, and many others didn’t seem to be there. Instead there was nothing more but a strange desire to know why they were being rounded up there.

‘In the memory of Aleksey, I think he should be remembered well.’

They seemed to have erected him a statue, though many of them could not tell, for the likes of them, what was going on and why they were trying, so desperately to making him look even more alive. More than he should be. It was hardening, trying to listen to the laymen talk. And speak of doubt as they wouldn’t listen, nor would they allow others to find out what was going on there.

‘I wish to be the first one who makes a point. I want to talk in the honour of my friend if it’s possible or if I can.’

He took a break, before everyone there turned to them. Some of the hand-handlers who wore human-hands around their necklaces took breaks to wonder what was going on there. When would there be time to think? And when could one even see it? A pair of much-robust chicken were there, in the light of day, conveying nothing but something close to some ritual which shot between the two of them. And one just disappeared right in front of him, like many, lesser ones could not convey. They tried but couldn’t see eye to eye as they have. Stopped along the way, then turned, as if the land turned inwardly and appeared to have melted below. Afterwards, there was no point on trying to think of ways he might be able to dig the dirt out and the snow in order to get it, as the order would only push past the throng, into the new world and into the quiet. He had been desperate for a chance to prove himself and make the others listen to him. Despite all the attention which was given, no one would know what happened to him. Or what he’d seen.

‘There in the snow.’

I’ll tell them, I saw one of them head down there, making it to one of their wild snow-dens, there they might plot of destruction and the redistribution of all of our lost men. Those of us might know it know but I feel that others might fight me for my claim.

‘Leave him be, there’s not a single house that might take him in any longer, not after everything he’s done.’

‘Then what should we do about the others? Eighteen children, all of whom had been fathered by that Aleksey, eighteen of them are waiting with their mothers, hoping he’ll return.’

‘But he won’t come back, and there’s nothing we can do about that. That’s how Aleksey is.’

They spoke about this on several occasions, never straining themselves as if to ask too many questions or to throw too many accusatory glances. Yet everyone was hand in hand with no one being in the least surprised by what was going on. And this village had only been one of many he happened to show up in. Intrude and do whatever he pleased. It was what he did, most of the time.

Youth had given quite a lot to the man, which only turned him all around the den in which the women hid from him in the days he moved around. He was only doing what he knew, most of the time. But, there was something he never understood. How come not a single man fought back? It was true, that he displayed his strength every time he got his chance at it, without furthering away from what just happened to enter his gaze. Nor would he step back against no bear or pelt that turned on him, or whatever else. If anything he had only taken it more slowly than before. He left them easy, and no one would complain nor ask for more.

Several clouds took different shapes. His back only seemed to be against hay. It looked like something he wished he dreamed off during worse days during which he would be sad. Young men often had similar feelings they could not get rid off, but that wasn’t preventing his enjoyment from going on. He was only doing what he had to and could only do it so, when asked.

‘Will you marry me one day, Aleksey?’

‘I will, if you ask me again when the time comes, then I’ll come out of my way and do what’s right for both of us.’

The man said with a smile. Though it would be cruel to give her false hope, he didn’t know any better.

No one wish to end up alone.

There was one lady in the village which still had been pure. Liliya remained alone for most of her life, looking out of the window, every time the wind hit the chimes, the wolves howled and she desired something more. Looking at a distant clouds, her heart would only fade like theirs until there would be. That one.

She missed him. Her eyes could only blush against the gray of sand, the hills were round and it looked like she would never make it past the valley.

‘Morning Liliya.’

‘Good morning father.

Has she returned yet?’

‘No, and I have not heard anything from her in the longest of time. I think we both know enough.’

They both ate bread, cheese and two cups of cold milk she pressed on the family cow. Days were nothing to be recalled and she could ask even less of him when he was around. But he was never there either and sooner or later, they'll find her, whether she was in a grave, or in the bait used by fishermen, near one of the cold Iles.

'I wish she came around.'

'Have we not been through this before? Your mother is not coming back anymore than I am leaving.'

'What of the day you'll die? Who should I look after?'

'You can look after a husband of your own choice, Liliya. Have you taken up a suitor then?'

She only shook her head then. It was something she took no joy in sharing. He was her father, yet she could not talk to him. There were too many sad days still on her mind. It was all too plain for her to see that her heart did not work properly. Father would not accept that.

'Have you taken news of my sister either?'

'I don't think so, she left two years ago. She has her own life now.'

They still got her letters, but they stopped getting them once news of a child came in. It's been long since and the godfathers had been long since chose, with them out of the picture as well.

'What of my older brother then?'

'Gone as well, in the army, I hear he's in a high battalion now.'

There was noise outside, and she returned. It was her new mother, Zhanna. Their lives together were something neither of them wanted to acknowledge or bet talked into. Both were dreary eyed and appeared to entertain the man of the house when he was around. He would leave in a few hours, and come back the next day. And there was nothing sad about it, but she wished he'd stay. No day spent apart shortened, yet it looked like they weren't reaching an accord. Some days had to be settled in that manner, he wasn't short of temper. His heart wasn't getting any stronger. If only he would stay for another day, then he wouldn't.

'We're both sad for a reason, and we'll never be able to get rid of it that way.'

'Maybe we don't have to. Settle down with someone and be happy. I don't need your help around the house Liliya. I can handle myself and I can handle my own ordeals, please. You deserve this as much as I do.'

Weeks passed, Zhanna left father, just as soon as she came, she was gone. It was the fact that he could never leave her out of sight. He wanted her to be happy, more than he was. Always there, but slowly dying, like a broken nest that never stopped. With each stick falling down, he never got to tell her of the best years in life, or what to look for after that.

Poison

One contract stood out, amongst the various stacked papers. They were ill-tempered and somewhat, strangely caught within the blotches of ink in which they drowned. A mark of blood lay on top of the divine command in which it had been written. For some reason, whoever pinned it down appeared to have treated it like some piece of scripture from the looks of which, there was no man of cloth around. No one wearing their sacred symbol of anything even remotely similar to it, which left everything walk on its own two feet, on alley streets where the chopped ones hadn't realized what went through them as well as the amount of blood which crept inside their lung muscles.

'I see, there's a mark, no, there are a hundred marks left for his head.'

A dark grin filled with yellow teeth inhabited his mouth. His inability to properly chew food only made itself apparent now. With every passing second he relented even less. No one around him lay without a case of the bubonic mind-inhibition. Other criminals and cutthroats being stably set on stabbing various walls for no other reason but to entertain their waste of time; yet he was of another breed. He seemed only to care of himself and the weariness he had to go through in order to reach that liveful thing he called a life without worry.

I will be the first one who shall kill that man. Krestl said, as he sharpened his tiny thorax-pounder, as it only came upon his nimble fingers unruly. He was somewhat set, unable to look ahead past the strangeness his eyes dictated. He was weary, looking with some stray eyes, unable to understand why the colors were benign. He made it with the contract, no longer set on asking for any direction. Then he stumbled and he fell. Nothing remained of his little finger-like emotions, instead he came to ask.

'Where might I find the pass towards Neibl?'

One of the very tall men, with the hair around their brown shoulder hairs, which held two helmets deeply planted and extracted from something which appeared to be the hornet mass of dark fighters who established their kingdom inside his bone-crass. He looked down on the petty simpleton in front of him and smiled back.

'Straight ahead, my dear man, you little petty thing should understand that there's nothing yet to fear for what's going on there.'

'Where might I find him?'

'Anywhere you need to go, I shall take great pains to get you there, if only you would allow me to help you.'

With the least amount of effort he tried lifting the little man up. He's done it. He had failed to see the rims of the contract which had been kindly pushed inside the back of his pants, while he appeared to have completely grabbed hold of his waist without letting go.

‘I’ll make sure to fling you as far as I can. Are you certain that this is what you want? Certainly, there could be some other thing someone as small as you are could look after.

Perhaps you could be set to sweep the streets somehow. I wager you would make for a good floor mocker.’

‘Nay, I am an assassin and I shall be nothing more.’

‘Twas’ his destiny after all and he couldn’t deny, after a fit that he liked it. He enjoyed doing what he was after, never trying to go for a while. Never asking for anything in return, nor mourning what seemed to be the rocking cradling mass he had become.

In some better word, he would only speak as he was called.

‘Go ahead and claim what you may like.’

As simple as it were, he was taken by the gulp, his throat attempted to enact something which only appeared to be similar to a choking sound, then he was clocked out of it. Leaving himself in the inattention which was life, seemingly caught, for the first time in flight, across one of the bridges.

‘And don’t come back in one piece, you hear?’

He had failed to know the pain of being kicked, but he’d survive. A bit bloodied on the lip, but he would make it through, without doubting himself on the way, past the broadening of the far more docile critters who followed. Still, no one in the back, with that in mind at least he would be weary for something else that might happen on the way. He could convey no emotion, nor would he attempt to push himself or ask questions. One of the unseen bleeders came through. Over the span of a few seconds he made a twirl then he bled on the floor, covered in dirt, never to ask any question after he fell.

‘On your knees, you criminal, you killed that man and I have seen it happen?’

‘I have done nothing of the sorts. Who are you and what have you against me?’

‘Speak plainly your dirt-rod.’

‘What did I do to you?’

‘You’ve offended my sensibilities, that’s all. If I were to look at you for a second more, I would simply lose my countenance and faint. And who know what you might do to my unconscious body afterwards? I could not only lose hope for life but I would also.’

He sat about the place and spat on the corner of a cucumber-colored stone. He spat again. And he did it once more to prove his point. He meant what he said there, and he would spare not a second to him or to whoever else asked.

‘I seem to have got you now and here and there. Now that I got your attention, say, what do you think of my pray?’

‘Wait, you’re the one who killed him? But I thought.’

‘You thought what? That you somehow took his life without being aware of it? Don’t make me laugh now, you did nothing of the sort.

If you were a mere cowering figure, I would’ve claimed your neck before the chance. Otherwise, I would say to you this, go back to where you came from.

It’s more than clear that you’re unfit for this world and nothing, no amount of sight, no mindness or clarity would give you such.’

He was of an arrogance such as had never been seen. He wore nothing but plain garbs, hiding inside of them the reverse body of a man he had skinned alive. But most importantly, he appeared to be without fear and came to no quick conclusion as would be his blows for who he were.

‘I see that you still don’t get it yet. If you make it past me, you will die. Either the wolves will eat you during the night or I shall put an arrow at the back of your throat.

Don’t make a sound yet. Think about just what I said. If I were to claim your life, I would do it without asking you for a reprieve. That’s where the chance comes at hand. Return from where you came from, this evil nation of yours.’

‘You know of it.’

He quickly interrupted, without having to say one more thing in question. Of course he had, no other sane man would make the pass towards the enclave. Except the man he had chased in. But he alone was someone no one had to make a clearance to.

Far, in the distance, there stood a single stalk of myre, they rose up from the depths and left the place one had so lusciously admired.

There was a sad solace in which he hid. Nothing could make him look back any longer, during that moment when the entire world was shaken from underneath the soles of his feet. Disturbed by it as he was, he could not fathom staying for long, upon the plain board which seemed to have replaced the bottom of his whole charade.

He was struck by it, as he only looked for a way through it. Pinned around each corner of the room, he looked for nothing and had spared no wonder, and he went out of his way to look for them.

‘Where are you, Ogoth? Prude?

I cannot see you any longer, where have you gone to?’

It was crude, and safe to say, he couldn’t see where the planted roots, the grim lips that had entered the rims of the ceiling had done to him. He didn’t look around, as he was simply shaken by the sight of it. Wreathing in came the head of a single watch, the snarly-like surrounding having encased its almost elliptical sight. Its eyes started slowly boiling and soon after, it had finally entered the nearness of his malignant gaze. They stared, only for this long, that he could finally get himself prying through. He could not talk yet, as he had started stepping on the stairs made out its peculiarly solidified sight. In that site, despite how lurid it had been, he found the solace of waiting and wondering where he might be. There was no reason for him to be there, nor would he ask for anything, yet as he rose on top and came out of the ceiling, through the roof of the house, he had been greeted by an ill-formed paradise. Which only loomed, and never boomed out of the quietness of his own voice, as he had thought to inquire, in this solace which had been filled with naught else but himself, where he might find them.

Nor was there an echo which would make him shimmer.

There was an antecedent of stone which drew him back to where he stood, he planned for naught and never asked. He had attained something which could come close to being called a stub. More often, he started. He was not from around, no longer met by those he lost.

And there was once a man named Chivalry, whose fate had desecrated itself as well. He couldn't fathom going anywhere no longer, as his blood was boiled, he could not tell. No longer was he of this world, but he still watched from one of the most benign corners it bore.

'He was the child I had undertaken underneath my wing. What has happened to him?'

To that he could not say at least. Out of his shoulders appeared to have sprouted the peculiar dole-necked ostriches, in all their might, and lack of sight, their feeling gloomily forlorn after that. It could not be wagered by him or no stranger, that the halls would listen to him as he spake. Of his tongue, split ends. Mostly pushing out, ajar, from the bottom of his coal-mouth, a single heeding neck-lard, it asked of him but hadn't come. To no fruition, it could not tell of what was worth.

In the quiet, he chose the elation of the breed, that which only loomed inside the freshly white-stalkerish like walls, which could not fathom themselves dreading themselves out. It could not be taken out of his heart. He could not fathom the light of the fire which burned his skin inside out.

But yet, he felt no pain, directed towards nothing more but the reenactment of the disease, which had been tried and prided in itself as they could only shiver in the blaster rain. A piece of him would still remain, in the back, a horned shield substance, from which he had contorted his spine into a wheel he carried, long-around. From it, there melted, lost shouts. All of which had his face. And suddenly to no disgrace, he heard them speak, deliriously in nature.

'I wish we could finally take you in the direction we're drawing you to.'

'Where would that be?'

'Towards the man you want to see, that's all. We want you to see him after a while, after that, we won't be able to help you no longer.'

Least of all, they would remain, but that could not be accepted as well as he could tell. Another wheel formed in his back, this one more jointed than the other one had been at that. It would be crude, a-calling, watching the order in which they prided themselves with some lease. He felt around and in the back there leaped the formed, a mountain-back, of stone and grass, made out of his bone, alas, the mask, it looked like that vile face of the recognizable Ogoth. He who showed some kindness to him during the time he had been in need.

Though he faced little and faded after dark, he searched for something and couldn't hold back. No tears would end, none would remain. Mostly, they had been drained away by the bickering of pain he felt, seeing all of them emerge from the back, an entire carriage, which was living, had stamped out. And in its strangeness the quiet could not return at all. They mocked him forth and could not fathom listening to him as he wanted to see for himself, who came forth?

‘Are you the man I’m searching for?’

‘There’s no one here, but one match, a single fire shall turn your pink blue in a deeper hue.’

The Charred Man spoke so well, he couldn't get himself to tell. Of no one and no bitter needs, he could not fathom what happened to his diseased fingers, as they entered through his uncanny world. His other side, past the brims of the white-painted, almost aphrodisiac nature in which he waited, he looked for no other excuse. And chose to play with himself under the Prude appearance, which he pulled from the bottom of the earth, as a corpse out of a coffin, unable to get him yet.

‘What have you done to him?’

‘Need you know some more, seek for the other piece of his body there.’

In the pile of masks, there stood another, it appeared out of one of the hidden holes. In which he counted, twice as many, including one which resembled that of his own. He had dared not touch it, but he had counted a finger, or thrice, off the body of the man.

‘Someone tried to cut you.’

‘You’re perceptive are you not? Yes, he had, right as he showed up in front of me long before you came along. I think he put, a battle, rut, and could not fathom it, ruth.’

Of the making, there came the quiet. And he could not wager trying to make it forth, or step unworthily at the expense of his own uncanny muster. He would be knelt down, he knew it, after all, he was merely unarmed, and uncanny. ‘Keep quiet and we may hear his voice ringing.’

As no prophet would be complete, as he died before they could get him. Though plain of mind, he could not deny that whoever got created bore him oath. Agamemnon would have their throats and he would bloat them into quiet. Children freed in the disquiet.

‘We should look around, I see a way.’

There were no eyes to register what went through their heads.

‘But whom, might I ask, though I may be in doubt as to ask what my mind wagers, what’s been happening to the man in charge of dreams?’

He woke up from a slumber within the marks, taken by the breed, and thrown around as if he had been nothing. Only then had he remarked, in doubt of what went out.

‘I am an assassin of no less worth.’

He spoke as well as he could out of the bottoms of his lungs, pushing on.

It was clever, Sekelee thought to himself, though the man was strange, he was an assassin, not worthless by any means, nor would he would have to look away. The other man, at tall as he was gray, molded his feet as he skinned his pray while resting.

‘I shall invite you then, if you don’t mind, to the only needed place you may come about.

It’s no longer needed for you to fear. I’ll make sure to entertain your journey and split the paths only when the road gets rougher.’

That much was said and done without the infantry getting in the way, though they were of no royal breed, they seemed to be of an army of dark-armoured guards, who seemed to come across the land, establishing a dominion of their own. Though little was told of them, nor would they be seen past the river, or outside of it, out of the forest or even in the dark clouds. They marched even in the dark air which seemed to come every now and then and appeared to walk on invisible stairs, only when there was dark. Shrouded in no kind mystery, they waited and carried for naught. Of their wont, little was asked as no one dared match them in combat, as they dared to asked nothing but to contain. Their business was their own, but their numbers seemed endless.

Sometimes they would appear, sometimes they were near. Sitting in trees, other times never walking but merely levitating in a still position as they thrust forward around the greater part of the enclave. So far, there was peace between them and the assassins, as neither of them appeared to have taken one down. Yet the intruders had faced worse fates, which could only serve as a warning and a shout. Loud wings and strings could he heard playing in the forest, and a sight, above them they would stand upon two branches fencing with large broadly curved swords which pushed out of their wrists and leaped into each other’s laps. Never cutting, yet sings of laceration could be seen.

And they were observed by Sekelee who was joined by the bandit. Both of whom knew of no other path ahead, nothing which would not take more than needed, perhaps adding to weeks of hard walking. There was no way to point anywhere, or ask for some other way.

One porter had come through, in front of them, as many would. Never to ask or do something which might make them cast an evil glance. They pushed away each other and could convey no word as from brother to brother, they asked for fewer days together. And walked in circles, followed at times.

‘When will they leave us alone?’

‘Don’t fear them, that’s the worst possible affront you could make.’

‘What if they try something?’

‘They won’t, they know better than to interfere. But I on the other hand could slit your throat at any moment now and they would no step an inch or lift a finger to aid you, regardless of how hard you tried your hands at it.’

‘I thought you’d say that, and for that I thought of this as well. You wouldn’t do anything to me now either, I made sure to be prepared.’

Though he was not entirely onto it, he couldn't have known just what went through his head and for what reason, instead of spreading about, each finger loss serving as a testimony for every petty crime and everything bad he's done. Though he still had the fingers sewn back, the bone reattached and working as intended, he spared no single wonder. He stood there and grew stronger, even as he had, he looked around. No trees no longer, an aspect which made both of them as weary as they should be.

And the knights wore a dark shade of red, which only went deeper as they ascended, instead of going towards a light, they headed at the moot point which looked like a giant red-dark ball from which many strings or many light reeds pushed everywhere around. Between them, at times, every now and then, a dark knight would appear, with his deathless eyes and deathless gaze, out of which, as he opened himself like a stove, from the insides of which there came the master of knights for as many times and as many of them which opened, he would appear a thousand times.

A fleshy thin man, which slowly pulled his long legs out of the stove, meat compressed no longer. No armour on him, only the helmet which pointed into each direction with a nasty-looking grin a sunder. Which burned through his skin, only to reveal that his blood had been completely contaminated and would not give anything back; out of the many cracks inside his back, curtains pushed out and unrolled on the ground. Nastily looking just as him, in the form of wet fly wings, but they only spoke of buccaneers, the type which swam in scurvy. Another one of the masters came, he joined the other and they conveyed their secret messages.

What appeared to have gotten Sekelee's attention in particular would be nothing more than their hands and feet which looked like gloves that were filled with water as they would constantly push in and out, ready to outgrow their wrists, never to give an inch of what was being taken from them. A mass of meat and one of blood, which only added to their figures as they would use them to mask their mouths; it looked like they were caught by that constant need to hide their grins, a desperate attempt which only dragged them closer to the ones in front as well, two fold, never asking of one's worth. They pretended. As if they were looking around, as if they were somewhat ascended compared with the two of them. Though that would count for nothing and would mean even less. It looked like the knights were nothing more than their shells, which only served for their majesties. Trying to push underneath their eyes, they would not be found, they couldn't, the benign.

'They'll sooner or later forget about us, I know it.'

'Why are you bothering, short-man? I don't think they're even aware of our existence, nor should they be, if you know what's best for you.'

Know your betters, that's what he meant. And he was right in some way, he didn't want to convey anything else than what was needed and what he'd say.

'I think we ought to approach that globe.'

'Very well, but we won't ever get, Lankly Laster.'

'Not bad shortie, I think that should do for now, Lankly, I think it ought to fit me for a while.'

Lankly, he thought, what a great name at that. What a fellow he was, despite his short-comings, he was still somewhat special, different, unlike anything he had ever seen before. He wasn't a bore for once, and then, he even shown himself to him.

As Seke pulled out a knife, he got ready after that and threw it towards the mid-most centre of the sphere, in hopes that he might catch it off guards before it flew out of his hand and out of minds. A miss, but that didn't matter. It flew away like any kind of majestic stutter. Instead of it, there was nothing but the distant echo of the fall, as the moving dark left some light in. But it was not of yellow, not of white, nor colourless at that, but of a deeper shade, of the hue they shared in quiet secrets never told. They spoke less.

Quiet arose, and he was not in the least surprised that the likes of them found themselves here despite not being welcome at all.

He was different, unheard. But he looked like a complete suit with many open sutures in the wild sharp shapes of cuts and other scratches left by the short coming paws of feline soldiers left on top of skin. Desperate or not they saw no reason to push in or ask for what was going on. He only sat there listening for a while, wondering whether or not there would be a reason to ask what went on.

And he appeared just as confused as everyone else, not knowing how to respond to any of the wild images and the dark. He stepped forth, implying they were of no worth.

Mightily rude.

'I came here thinking I would find a soul filled with some kind of intelligence, that he might explain to me what's going on.'

'You've come to the wrong place then. As there's no one here, nor should there be, it's way too dangerous.'

'Come on, flee now, flee, they're coming out of us.'

The Patron-Masters were in the hundreds and they only grinned as they chased them without the shimmer of a thin mind, without the dignity given as well as they would run. So tall, they were simply too tall to be taken one against another. Hard of touch, and brought together by the looks at that, they were never tired by running and could do about the vale in which they entered. Though a small puddle here and there only marked the signs of a rain. In it there was one of many, both the assassin and his companion refused to acknowledge during the disappearance of the quiet, when the loud sounds emerged. During a time they couldn't look back, nor were they interested in knowing, who it was and what they wanted.

A flow of strong words, wrongly handed to them. It was a sign of desperation, them hiding in the puddles, despite having no recourse to take. And they could not uphold any, or ask for something even less. It was strange, asking it out loud. A shroud covered them and could not be in doubt.

'I think we should be safe in there, don't raise your head, madman.'

'I thought you were fearless, you killed a man and skinned him in front of me and that takes a lot, more than that.'

‘Shut your mouth and don’t sell us out. You should know better. You should be able to distinguish between a simpleton and them.’

As they ran, the ground shook in a mishmash through which the vale in which they were, the perfume could not be contemplated or conveyed, or seen by means of hearing. He doubted that they were after them and even asked of a better way of pushing himself out of it. Drawing another breath as he sunk deeper, leper’s throng, bringing in the magnitude of evil thought.

He remembered the importance of the contract and how he would have to prove himself when the time called for it. When he would see it fit, he’d have to face that man and for that to happen, he would have to get his guts to face him in the distant bed upon which kin stood.

There was much to be said about them, though this may not be the best time and place to discuss these kind of matters, leaving all that mild speculation and other various head-wrongs to be largely ignored by them. As it happened for many of the Patron-Masters, the dancers as they happened to be translated in some language, a detail which would not be mention more than it need be, seemed to draw the sane conclusion that their bodies were somewhat made for the kinds of acts which would be undignified for the lives of a knight. Instead, one may even be as peevish as to think that those bizarre creatures are rather flamboyant in their looks and act. But one need not be fooled by their wild appearances as they bore a special kind of malice, hatred, of which kind would belong to the utmost putrid kind. Inside their soulless armour, they might’ve compressed not only their bodies but their violent tendencies as well. For as soon as they were released, and as soon as these social creatures suddenly stopped pushing themselves around, they looked after satisfaction elsewhere. One of these included what would appear to be some kind of hunting or spraying of the most peculiar things that seemed to inhabit the more obscure plains of slouch in which they stood.

It was their den after all, the Masters had their dominion and claims against all of whom entered the forest or beneath the water, in the muck, which only brought dire new to the two of them. As they stared, ever so momentarily beneath them, Seke and Lankly were both surprised to find that the bowels of the murk were theirs as well. Not only were they there, instead of the weird dust or livid misery which once inhabited the pool, twisted in the obscure. But they were also of even stranger forms, untouched. And they could not be touched by any means. It was their play, their plan, the pus within only pushing in around them as they coiled and twisted everywhere around them.

Neither of them wanted to get out there, where the threat of steel and the threat of iron would completely destroy bone and cartilage, whereas, here they’d be safe. And they had tiny straws they took from around, as they grabbed them during the run, through which they managed not to drown as they only pushed even farther below their dominion. They were being chased even there. Farther inside, the sea looked like no puddle, but this was the murk. And inside the murk, there were steps they could only seem to replicate whenever they could. Not out of spite, but there was nothing they could do in order to control themselves. As that, they pushed.

Of the wild dangers the Patrons possessed, it would be no less impressive to admit to it that they bore something which neared the strike of the plague, yet it was all inside their bodies and inside their heads. A constant leap, a beat which bounced inside their bodies, leaving no trace, as they were of no other stature and could only punish themselves for crimes they hadn’t committed. Since the two of them were out of reach, they took the smallish animals they found and made them leap on their feet, without a chance through which they might be able to rise.

Some of the squirrels and other critters who found themselves in the wrong places appeared to be nothing less, other than complete Pantheons of Gods, reflected if not refracted in their small bodies, which were armoured out of the wills of the Masters. Yet those were no real armours, as they were mightily ceremonial in sight. Instead, they drew out and grew as fast as they would, looking like the broken images of pagan-godly creatures, which had wore their giant pelts of wild critters in death and it naught.

Then a master leaped what seemed to be twenty feet towards him, taking the first strike at his shoulder, completely falling one of the animal-like arms, which had been once sharpened a spear but had failed to defend his suitor, as he came upon its neck, the trench. Which was formed around him only pushed even deeper until his entire body appeared to crawl all around the ground, in pieces, after each satisfying blow and after the bloodying of snow, where every Master looked farther beyond their heads only to realize that the snow was red. And it was a land which would not satisfy, it couldn't work that way and it would be taken and heeded for.

Many breeds appeared to die, ever-so slowly out of their own desire to match in combat, as this was only the beginning, which didn't even bode close to the satisfaction they bore once they worsened the stakes. From the open wounds and broken parts of the Pantheonic animal, many of the limbs appeared to have been given other lesser gods of their own to be projected on. Insatiably so, they all came together, like a group, and started pounding on each celestial body of their god of choice. Feeling no remorse whatsoever, for what was done and what was being spread between them. Only the hearty throng could say thing of them. Wronged in form, and in pain they chose to remain in purity. To the mark, as even lesser crudities were shown to erupt and spread about the place when needed. It was poison to them, addictive in some way. All the pain they caused only forced them to retreat after the echo or the shout of the forest.

In search of other venues as they were, not a single voice appeared to mention the other part and the mindless darting through which they came. Four long-tooled tree wings, which only looked like palm-pouches appeared, ever so slightly to be manifest in the extra-air region that was created after they went ahead and killed another who was blind. Behind each back, through open poured, they stopped. Watched, unpleasantly so, it seemed that shadows spoke inside the wings and they were kept that way without prying too much in and out.

Poison, I think I've got enough poison to take it down.

Thought Seke, though he was mightily uncertain, just as in any other time of what might happen if he stood too close. If he drew in whenever it happened for a single thought to rise, he rose. Not outside of the pool, but to a place he had largely misunderstood. He was plain a creature and could only do as much after all.

There were eighteen hundred seventy four, well sized, giant urns, which were connected to one another through strange supports that were hollow on the insides, yet carried through them the rains which kept work going. Inside each of them, largely, wild-plated, square boxes caught hold of large lumps that were being pumped by larger ones in the back, cogs that would keep them going as well as the sand-dust which had to be pushed out and released with the rest of the waste. After all, this was the engine which controlled the movement of some of the cities which came to pass through beneath the ground. It was unthinkable, how other devices would even fathom working at such a productive as well as fast a rate. Otherwise, one would further be disgraced by the fact that they stopped at the most inopportune time, when the flight of a city had to stop and nothing could force it to resume working, it happened. Too many a time for there to be a difference made.

Every now and then, a worshipper centurion, the whereabouts of whom were unknown to those who lived above them with little knowledge of how the inner-working of the system went, would appear as he would slowly tinker the ground-work. That, in itself was in a dire need of recalibration, as the various leg-strattae that kept expanding out of their large bodies could not be held in place for long. Bouncing around the urns like rounded coins until someone caught them. And if left unchecked and uncaught, one would even come to the conclusion that there was nothing beneath the earth but a disaster in need to happen. Worse for the wear, there was no saying when one urn began and where one ended, nor would there be a pointer towards where the centurion looked around.

He did his task, his mission's proceeding and then he left as if he had never been there.

In one of the living cities, still on the rails, during the time of movement, there was relatively no one who risked killing another man. Life-taking was risky out there. As a matter of fact, being out there when everyone else was inside provided just as much of a risk as slitting someone's pocket without his knowledge and without his honor being at stake. He put a lot of thought into it, and one of the little-throat defilers came forth, inside one of their various dens.

Large buildings, all of which looked like hats, old hats, rotten and pushed in one direction, this city was disgusting. It was the Hick's alcove, and it was shameful for a good man to find himself there. Even the assassins and the low-lived avoided it.

Then he came. Too mechanical-looking, despite machines not being something that were wildly used, or even worked any longer. He wore a large animal, a metal-bear, or something similar, made out of nothing else but the various bear heads that attempted to eat the various parts of his body towards which they were pointed at. Something even more ferocious came to him.

Lekklee wanted to befriend him. Not because he knew that those weren't real machines, or that they weren't made out of metal, but because he knew they were alive and moving. More so he spoke with one of the flying heads, of which texture was that of honey-combs brought from a place where the iron-wasps melted themselves into the main hive. They weren't likely to share any kindness to any stranger, especially one who would sniff too closely, onto business he had no dealing in.

Since they were stuck together, he struck his tongue and approached. He didn't particularly enjoy the beard, yet he felt himself unable to look anywhere else, no joy would make him feel the same and he felt as if there was something there he should look after, if that meant what it meant.

'I think I've seen you before.'

'So have I, and one of my companions already told me your name, Lekklee.'

'Does that mean that you're not hiding then? Does everyone know?'

‘On the contrary, I think. No one really know what’s happened here or why I’m in this position where I’m being kept a hostage after mark.’

‘But I thought you were their master, or at the very least someone who shared with them something in goal.’

‘I wish I were, but that isn’t the case. Unfortunately, I’m just as caught here as everyone else is and I cannot fancy of a way out. I wish there was but there isn’t, not for me.

As soon as the city stops moving, I will have been entirely eaten before I was given the chance to explain myself and the mark on which I earned my sentence.’

‘Whose life have you taken in order to earn this, then?’

‘Oh, but the life of no man, but one of their own who was sent out there to scout for their food and chimes of iron dines.

I should’ve feasted on nothing more than needed but I lay now with nothing but a closeness to them I dread to think off.

Because you don’t understand, I can see it in your eyes, I’ll tell you this, as simply as I can. The scout never made it back, and some of their young starved. For that misgiving, I’m to pay for, and do as they please before they can finally put me into my place and turn me in their feast.’

He shed no tear for himself, nor would he be greeted by anyone, since they were all too miserable in this place, a distant nothing that only got them to tell of something, and their disgrace being largely exposed to everyone that lay there. A man would feel nothing in an empty place, if it was filled with people who owed him at least the benefit of the zeal. He went on a tirade and asked of them, as they finally revealed, that they could talk, despite as muffled as it sounded, he wanted to draw on their attention and make something out of it before his feet got draggled down.

Shameful was no word that belonged here. It was something that had to go. They wanted to shared something with the only real murderer in the room, whom, he along bore the ear of a single concave-poison hold.

Rising anger

‘I’m mad, I’m pissed, if you don’t close your fucking mouth, I’m going to fucking rape you.’

‘All right, I’m going, don’t get nasty with me.’

She was bleeding below, and it was still going. Drenched bellowed her pants already. There was a small ball of blood clot, it was metal, it was all mercury. She was being poisoned, she was bleeding. It pushed out of her nostrils, all the way from the fridge, where he stored the other half of her head. But she couldn’t say no, she was bleeding. It pushed out, it poured out. His eyes were on her. She was moving in circles, she was wide-spread on the walls. It was a piss poor electronic car, all broken up, driven into the entire kitchen, burning, oil pouring out of it.

She was beaten, down there, still spikes of metal, all inside of her. She was chained down there, it pulled out constantly. Punished, Bonnie was being punished for the abortion now. She was being punished. It went through her head. She would be raped again if she said something wrong. Pulled by her knees down, dragged, dragged, she grovelled her pits as she made it down there, again, greeting her husband. He was god now, he would be god inside this room and while he was god, there was no word she would be allowed to put in. Con didn't respect her any longer. For what she's done, and the law prevented him from hurting her. Everything that happened here happened because of her. Bonnie did this to herself, it was the guilt she felt for ending another life, it made her feel inhuman-like and it was only reflected in her appearance. Dreadful even, no nails, she walked into the other room, there was no room. And the neighbours were taller than the entire building. They laughed at her and could only keep laughing at her. Throwing her around, nasty, nasty wench; piss and watches.

And the watches didn't tell the time. Bonnie needed to tell the time but she couldn't tell the time. It was all knives and sharp forks instead of tongues and she needed to eat. So she turned and looked around and cackled as she looked down, there, there was her child. It crawled into a corner, dead, it started pushing out itself, both of them grew, chewing the carpets off and the small termites. Some of the termites were hers but they were killed.

Bonnie's small collection was stored into a big skull, which was pink, of a dark hue of blue, brown-dirt oil painted into weird colors, and she licked it off. Her husband wanted her to make it. Hallucinating things that aren't there, Bonnie?

'Bonnie, Bonnie, Bonnie, Bonnie, Bonnie?'

But there was no Con. Bonnie was a good girl, or had been, before she killed the child. Cowardly creature, she used others to do her biddings instead of using a knife and doing it herself.

It was plain she liked it, like all women do and there was one thing and only one thing that could bring her back to reality.

Being slammed against the curb stomp asphalt by her husband until her head had been split open. It was so soft around the spots, all the wrong sides. He wanted to do it again, so he dragged her out. Con couldn't help himself. He was a criminal. He was an outlaw. He had a record for burglary, theft, assault, arson, attempted murder, homicide, general sociopathy and other unnatural crimes that were not pinned down. Writing them down was illegal. What he was doing to her wasn't.

'It's the constant flow of the universe, honey, that's how it works. It's the hierarchy of how things work, the circle of life, I'm telling you Bonnie.

One man insults another and he can only hit back or misdirect it to someone else. And since you're such a split head and a child killer, I don't see you as a human any longer. That's how life is. So I'm going to, I'm going to kill their hyenas if I can. I'm going to kill all of their hyenas.

I want to punch a hole in your nasty cunt, I'm going to do it, I'm going to pull everything from inside of you, don't move.'

He did so. He started pounding on her until she fell on her knees, begging him not to do it any longer.

At the same time, he couldn't explain it, the presence of so much rage. It made his eyes red, almost bloodied, red, pure red.

There were a few red-painted streets. Violet, and filled with some strong senses, avocado being collected by large machines that stretched all the way in the back; right around a corner from which a few more, and they were all beaten and left alone. It went through their heads, all beaten, all put through one asphalt wall.

They asked for it and they were put through, pouting. As it happened for it to return once and then again, always that thing, that boiling hot-mess of blood which spurred in their veins.

Another Con came from around the plane, from which flatness masked his bloody-beaten face. It made everyone shiver, looking how the entire skin fell off his arms, leaving nothing in there any longer, only the matter of bone-tusking bandaged plaster-poles which shot around. There was an outrage, an outbreak from which he charged the first hick, grabbed him by the tackles of clothes he wore, then he couldn't help it. All that deranged activity got to his head, he was foaming blood, his teeth projected through his skull after the first hit made contact. It was too much. He lost control.

He punched the cartilage sheep skin which countered his wild surroundings, leaving him exposed as he bled on the ground like the stone-head beaten up morsel he was. And the lesser Mongoloids came and ate him, even though they were of another time and of another waster.

The face brought the remains there only so they could detect themselves with what they could and only so they could be allowed to finally grow in ways shouldn't. As they were made reflections of another world, even though they were still somewhat anatomically human, they didn't act as such.

Bonnie and Con stopped, they turned immediately, caught in the act. Both stood there, in the trenches, during a common sun-surge, where they looked at one another for only one second before they fell.

Just in time knees blocked, joints stopped from moving, they tried not to rock the bumps. Some of them in the road, one exploded in a single tube-like rocked form of fire, like a small pillar-pole that almost drowned the sights with no smoke.

It was an unlit hand, which got pulled in, holding a single pack of cards, most of which were shuffled in this order, from the back of the pack to the front, starting with a standard fifty two card deck, two of clubs, four of hearts, jack of diamonds, three of spades, three of clubs, five of diamonds, ten actual hearts stuck inside the pack instead of the ten of hearts which was missing, six of spades, Jack of spades, ace of diamonds, two of hearts, ten of clubs, king of spades, four of clubs, ace of hearts, two of spades, five of spades, nine of spades, seven of clubs, eight of hearts, king of clubs, Jack of hearts, six of hearts, two of diamonds, ace of clubs, five of clubs, seven of spades, ten of diamonds, nine of hearts, four of spades, king of diamonds, six of clubs, eight of spades, three of diamonds, four of diamonds, eight of diamonds, nine of clubs, queen of hearts, ten of spades, queen of clubs, eight of clubs, ace of spades, seven of hearts, six of diamonds, Jack of clubs, queen of spades, three of hearts, nine of diamonds, queen of diamonds, five of hearts, seven of diamonds and the king of hearts which seemed to be attached to his every heart from which he sprouted, as the incarcerated fiend of drowned blood he was.

‘Where do you want to eat?’

Con lead the way, he knew where she wanted to eat. It was an old part of time that neared its renovation state. People died in there often enough for them not to know what to do once they met a dead man who had been robbed and desecrated. He was poignantly pressed, he pulled her by the neck and threw her on the ground, kicking her around as if she were a slave and naught more. Beaten in the head again, she whimpered. Without any pressure from the north, the stage was set. Red buildings, followed by white, then red, then white, the light went away, the floors were an immaculate steel of shrouds, all place in a while errand, two heads prodded. But no one wagered to ask the orchestra to stop. Lights faded, and they were on, watched, as if by a subservient world, which applauded them as soon as they walked on their own.

Both of them deformed and grunty-looking in a peril of the kind of which had never been seen before. Tormented by nothing else but the Scythian-beats, they looked for no danger, there where the lights faded and the stage was in danger of fire. No storm could put it down.

They listened.

‘May I have this dance then, Connie?’

‘Of course you may, dear, of course you may.’

To which they offered they hands and went away, rounded up in circular motions, deformed dogs flying during the commotions, papers flying and floating towards the abyss, towards them small picks joining the haze.

They spared not a second, as the crowd of dancers emerged, the pseudo-ballroom being somewhat deranged. And then they were not caught off by their lances or dances of disquiet, they only listened for a sign that the fire may stop.

‘It is false, my dear.’

Con drew nearer to her face. He came so close that he could see every detail and every pore that rested on top of it. Every side and every little change that occurred in her, as her heart beat outsider her body, like the waste it was, with all the dancer never bothering to take her in as one of their own. She was repulsive, truly, in spirit. A wretch he could barely look upon. Yet she was still his, even though her body and mind was dying.

‘Your death may have been sublime if you were like us. But you decided to end a life.’

It was dreadful, how her every breathe felt like a swoon of led, a light which died as soon as he chose to extinguish her soul, whatever was left out of it, only to bring her back home. Right before the next act. When his hate and rage suddenly grew thinner, as well as he had starved both himself and her. It wasn’t likely that he’d choose it in any either way.

‘I’m not going to let you die just yet, for what you’ve done, my dear. We’ll go on tomorrow, and afterwards we shall do as I please and as I say.’

By the hand, back into the broken household, where all the drafts and all the sketches, all the bookshelves lay brokenly smoothed around the edges. She was thrown around some more as he made sure that everyone would see what he was doing to her. There was no pride for this act, and there was no light in the man’s eyes. As decadent as he became, there was no turning back from this. It was a mere served for act, paid with nothing and left to rot like him.

A house which spoke of no childhood memory and only of the mundane, she was going to stay with him there, for another day, so she thought. It was a restless night, seeing no lights around, nothing, not even the closeness of a sky that might’ve been seen through a missing roof. Only their soft, cold breaths, which did not let her forget that she was being watched and messed with, for every reaction gathering as much as was needed.

It was pointed at her, from every room and every house and in the adjacent apartments she was forbidden to go on with and mess for, around which she stopped. It was a missing, he went too far.

Again outside, this time he brought a knife with them. People would generally be disturbed by the sight of them, at the light which emanated from the edges of the blade, from the quietness that its voice spoke for. How the dull blade said more than his bird would ever dare come up with.

‘This should quench your thirst, if you’re still upset about it.’

Connie refused to speak.

They were inside a, part-cut from the giant neck of an ancient head, from which each side appeared to have swallowed, each piece of the world which hanged onto it, like the cast of an unfinished sculpture, beyond which there was nothing. It pushed out around where sky met ground, beyond which, in turn, no man’s land pushed on, all worshippers aside, rightly past the point where people died.

No assistance was required any longer. Connie’s eyes were still missing from sight. Though they may not have been pulled out of their sockets, it felt as if they anything but in the mood. A lost species that had been reserved by them, preserved not in the annals of time, rather in this one corner of the head they searched refuge in, without the blinds being pulled off. And there was anything but a desire to return. In a time where things were just like they used to be, when no touch meant death and no one could direct one another towards them.

It was hard pressing in a word, only to see no expression on her face.

Perhaps it got too tedious after a while.

Even looking at what they left behind, there was still nothing too glittering, shimmer that went through their hearts, out of affection. It was simple, more so than a simplified sight, there was nothing around to mark the passing or the crossing of an end or another period anchored in them or inside their guts. It wasn’t the time here, nor was there a time anywhere to make this distinction.

Since then, they ordered a drink and parted ways since.

No signs of any divorce having happened, that wasn't the case.

Silicone lamps, everywhere around, placed bastardly on top of each other, unlikely to have made much of a difference in any case, he stopped. Con was alone now, and she? There was no general information about his whereabouts. It was all gone, almost driven into the same well he planned on drowning her in. Somehow it would be fitting.

Green-violet, in strange.

It was night.

All of the sudden, with every relationship he's ever had having ended with her, there could be nothing going on around the place any longer. Not a bright sun to follow, the night would never end and he knew it. No apartment to go back to. He would be sad for a while, and then, what?

Con walked and knew of nothing else but what he had. As little as it was, as short-lived, vulgar, painful and violent, it was just about the only thing that curbed his mind. He was cruel to every animal that got in the way, to every woman, to every man he's ever crossed paths with. Even with his family with whom he lost contact half way through.

Henceforth the night would never end, as painfully beautiful as it was, seeing the streets as they ought to be, at the end of his frustration there was no other place he would rather be than this.

Two of them pretended to have souls, in some way. It looked almost surreal, the way in which they moved in, a replica of dancer being all strung up, lynched by the ones pushing the lines inside their arms and legs with no attendee to look for them.

And then he entered, Con came back. He was applauded, all hands were cut.

Though he was much taller, the epitome of the agrarian man. Connie was inside his spine, hanging like a glider which was stranded and expanded on a vertical sight until she extended to a thin sheet of paper-like foundation from which both planes which constantly circulated both right and left started pushing out the last remnants of what had remained of the child before he had been completely decimated and killed. From him there came a giant arm, almost pushed out, in a strange colour of blue-ochre, which had almost been eaten by the one eyes, almost poorly formed head of a single mongrel lad, human-looking but unfortunately the result of an almost detonated atomic incident.

From the insides of which, the outer body appeared to be a large cocoon which pushed from the largest crane head, of metallic hues, winged with the large spread of eighteen servants of the god. All of whom were caught and part of this perpetual living device which basked in its own image, no longer in control of its own maddening on-lookers, carved as to fit, basked in a tar unlike the ones they predecessors had been completely coated in. A flight had emerged which dragged Con with them into the high-kingdom which seemed to drag the world.

The half-head smiled, it cackled and called them back home, to the children that died and waited into the nothingness like stars of peculiar dark glowths of quiet. In them the fright of the child-killer emerged. Sang by their other heads, as they deformed what they could, shaped what they would in the cotton that came from the one ear, from the cotton formed the dark tower, many features of the men that served in the empire being carved on them, right before the many lights started pushing everywhere they could. A demonstrator of cancer being there as well, bearing his abomination of a body made out of three main pieces. A growth which took his legs and the one head which looked like a cone, leaving the other part as an invisible symbol in the likes of the depression which was felt by the crying they left after.

As Con was carrying his dead wife, in an attempt to appease his dead-child, in need of no woe and no broken horizon from which they might drag the lights of the unknown. From the light-bulbs that had been erected in eighteen-hundred men. They floated instead of trying to pierce the veils of disquiet, during a time in which no one would suffer a single lesser stoneoid to proceed. Towards him, from each flat end, that made the cut-head come to live, large hairs spread out an equal amount of holes, as they held the reality, anchored from the hold of a single desire to drag it into nothingness when it was needed. Less than it would be of worth. Thence they asked and saw of naught.

Farther as they travelled, the more had he desired to come back and endlessly walk. In a night that might never end. This was degenerate, instead. He could not fathom every part of the world being completely turned and twisted around the hairs that loomed around and crept beyond a single doubt. He could not touch and feel no heaven. Nor the burning of a hell, nor the encroachment of decaying in a place like theirs. Instead he followed through, to the broken part of a single dead child, which refused to step in line.

Anger could not be pleased. It fell from within, bringing nothing any longer from within. It was the point where it fell hard and it could do nothing about what went on. He had no control over his action, nor could she make any reaction yet. Dragged inside, they fled. Most children seemed to have gone to bed. Some left and none suffered to have their cried laughed after, leaving them to travel yonder with no disciple that may make a child, or leave a wreathing smile to be heard as well by the beating of wild chokes.

They were approached them, while flying.

‘Where to, master, tell me so I may have an easier time accompanying you when I am in my time of need. I need nothing from you instead, so I may only ask of you that I may be allowed to see to it as I please, and ask for less and ask for more.’

The gore of other rocks only coked on themselves as well as they snored, the silence faded, as did the sleep.

‘There’s no break to it, is there?’

‘Of course, observe.’

Con spoke to himself. He was strong. His muscles were still strong enough for him to carry it through. Picking up a boat in air, he started rowing just about anywhere, he couldn’t help it though. Every single time he passed one of the other canoe riders, he wanted to smash the paddles in their heads. Air was dry but the sea was night. It came from one direction, through a funnel, which was stopped. Drops could not fall out of the place, he had no face for no disgrace could stop him from thinking of his ill-wife, dead in sight, but he knew better than to wait for her finger to rise. What might happen, if she gave the command? It could only push thrice her mind now and he could not abide the rules of this new house of ships. He stopped into one of the dorms, asked for a captain after stepping on top of a floating anchor, knocked on the door, revealed. He could not fathom the appeal of being there. As this captain, alone stranded, Horbonok, he was called.

And Con and Horbonok could only see eye to eye, as he had only destroyed half of his house with the thing which pushed out of his back. But Con still had the intelligence of a man, which, against all reason could destroy the world if only he wanted to say, what was in his mind. It was the one gift and the one rotten thought, that crawled out of an ear, past this mind and onto them, alas, it spoke.

‘I wish I could have your throat, I need it to get farther away, while there’s still hope for me to make half-past through.’

And it was promised, though he could not tell by whom, of an ancient side, of a sight, and while the rowing would prove to be benign that he would be met by something as weary as old age. Sky became a star. The sky was burning but with an inverted light which looked like the space itself. Yet those discoloured flames were not flames any longer, as they pushed tiny legs and walked all over the place, unfelt. No touch would be melted and he could enact only the wrapping of his body as he would be discarded one day. And below his floating boat and the cabin in which Horbonok made his house, though he was no captain, only a pretended and a layman who had never fished in his life; many a man had badgered him with the desire that he might return somehow if needed, the touch would be heeded and one day he’d listen. To their wants and to cries, of Alabaster, what a crude disaster, he looked toward, as long below, he could not listen to the thought, nor had he known any better.

Many feet joined the ground. And two stars pointed at one another, yet they had become the embodiments of space, from which no race could fathom living in disgrace. Everyone who had remained below, became a leg and could not show the agony of assimilation or that of supreme laceration they had to go through while the painful process continued with them. Some were taken, none may rise and they would feel the tide being made benign.

‘And I ask this, only this, I want a reason to live.’

Layman Horbonok looked around his cabin. He kept a few lamps, oil, a bed, a spare window in case something happened to the first eight, a prism and a desk, seated backwardly, against an almost empty wall there was also a deck, stolen from a ship, and pushed out of his house, where the other plates were being placed. Some of which, patches on a doll, welded on top of every wooden door and every wall, and everything in need of fixing, many of whom would have to be employed again, as he would have to make it for what was lost.

Horbonok opened his forehead, and pushed out of it the long quadruped-sterile knife, of silver and of deathless hide, which made the hilt and never had a quilt been used to write to ink nowhere else. Inscriptions faded, yet the name of Rod seemed to have remained. He was there, in the back, sipping on milk-tea, boiling in a broken sauna. Out the window, they were looked for. Someone searchingly, he floated. Out of the pace, out of balance, he could’ve fallen but he was stuck in his house, as the windows could not provide a way for him to get away. It was all too much, he wasted one of his watches which, upon combining with the wood, had shook his memory, twenty years ago, in a block. During that block, he remembered everything being placed differently.

And many of his lamps ended having wood and smaller watches and other clock-devices embed into them. Whichever the reason for that, whichever might it be, he could not take his eyes away from the fact that he was not floating. The flood had become a rising device, pushed by the extra material which worked itself during need.

‘Feed me the pleasure of asking, but do you know where I may find a woman?’

My mouth is dry, the floor is not wet and unless I found one.’

Con thought about it long before he met this man. He thought about replacing Bonnie and seeing another younger lass, he wanted one, to put himself against and his mind could only take a great stand against all evil he would unleash upon his newest bride. Though it was immortal to think about it, he considered taking her youth away on sight. He deserved much better especially as a man, and there were things you didn’t tell someone, especially since he dreamed as well.

During days she’s see one, thrown in the dirt.

‘You are my woman and I am your man.’

‘What do you want me to do then?’

‘Cook, clean, take care of my children, and offer yourself to me every night.

You shall do everything I ask of you and you will breed as many a’ child as I ask of you.’

‘I’ll do whatever pleases you then.’

‘I hope you will, otherwise, you know what I’ll do.’

She’d listen, as a good woman would. And she was anything but helpless, she enjoyed listening to him. He would be allowed to drink, and do as he pleased. In return she would not leave the house unattended, nor heeded. No neighbours would be in sight and he ought to be the only man she ever laid eyes upon. Otherwise she could commit unfathomable acts, unlike him, who’d be allowed to proceed and do as he pleased.

And he did, often enough in his fantasies. Con had his way, just in the same way he’s done when he had Bonnie. There was no shame and no guilt in him doing it, after all, most of the other women meant nothing to him. He desired to have his fun and he had it.

All around it, again and again, no one would have his sympathy instead of crying too soon after, he knew it was better not to say a thing. As long as they were around, in laughter, someone would notice him. Eyes were watching, but not after. He’d beat her is she cheated. But what of life after? It felt benign, after a while, all of those escapades ended up doing nothing for him. His life before him strained, beyond it just as well. Since he kept no men around, he had no one to talk to and he would have to drive ever the farther, even the farthest a man had even went to work. A wearisome task which only ended up with him suspecting his other wife, or the fiancé, despite there being no one alive, and no one in sight, he could not, for the likes of him tell it. Just what was she doing without him?

‘I wish I could find a better woman, layman, I think you are the first stepping stone in the right direction if you don’t mind me saying this. We ought to make a good deal out of it, now that we see each other face to face.’

He was somewhat disgraced about what he felt. It took some time but he could not, for the likes of him take the man seriously any longer.

‘All that talk about you pushing them around. You’ve been reminiscing about this for the last half an hour or so. What do you expect me to guide you to now?’

There’s no saint in this world that might be able to put up with you, let alone the wenches that are around the corner. Better accept it, as you’re still young and become a monk, at that.

Free of those ill thoughts that enter your mind, and free of all ambition and the gladness there is beyond that.’

Vessels

‘It was just as simple as it once had been. Once they see the alternative, they will know for certain that I am.’

He chose to satiate his hunger for now, eating what he could grab off the ground. There were just enough remains for a man to take. It was mightily pleasant, getting a moment’s worth of rest after walking all day. By now he was done with the lecture and left the university before he would be struck again atop his temple. It neared his boiling blood that he would lose it, somehow, out the top of his lungs, there would be nothing more to look after.

He entered his apartment. No one waited for him any longer. By the looks of it, a thunder-like growth, like a lightning bolt which sprouted across his forehead appeared. It pushed around and loomed for a few seconds, making ant-hills which were zero point five millimeters in depth inside of it. Through those holes, he finally pushed out the vapors and relaxed.

He finally entered his apartment. Came like a bold before long, taking a piece of the roof-lantern which him as he dripped the entirety of his cephalic-looking rubbing vulture- sharp head in. He was barren, he was one of them, smelling of some unnatural smoke, the scent only coming through him out and once in a while.

His skin crawled on top of his hair tips. It nested there for a while. Little trick, which seemed to appear every once a while, feathery-trenches dug around his home. This was too much to bear for a sane man. He chose to do nothing but turn. There were the murals against his face. Shone as they had during their inception which his mother died during the impregnation of the lot; mostly bloated in disgust, they came again and shone through the march of glass-shards, in the wake of the beheading, the deadly stalker came in at last.

But before Leopold could say a thing, he wished it gone. Then he was alone, but it couldn't be done. No in its entirety, not since the change, as it happened for his body to be in the opposite room, still attending to the other guests; alas, he could simply take their place, he was given as much, the grace of having everything he wanted, everything he needed, with not a single brooding thought elapsing from the forehead crudeness. It pushed through him in a matter of days. He took the absinthe and swore he would drink his sorrow during such a personal time. When they asked him to come up with something, he simply shook his hands.

He would die out of shock again, realizing that this life meant nothing anymore. For a primate like him, for a vessel which would grant him anything he desire, it meant that there would be no purpose any longer, no reason to live and to strive. Long since he knew it, he would die. Getting back again, despite wishing it to end somehow; that was inescapable, that wasn't meant to be that way. He failed several attempts, which pushed him back into the place he had been before.

Prior to the meeting, during the time he had come to question what was going on 'round the place. Yonder, there was hope and the disgrace. No hope, for the coming of the pass.

This was life in one of the replicated worlds, those who started molding themselves into the most uncanny things, most of them inhabited by what seemed to be real people. Yet, they were just as lifeless as he was. Destroyed, beaten, put down, with nothing more than the simple fact that they were in the same place, the same spot, and there was nothing they could do about it any longer. It felt likely that they could have lived through some extinction, with nothing of the like having happened. They felt like gods but they were not.

Ever so present, the vessel tried not to look down upon them, as they wasted. It was their desire, after all, to make do with everything they had, this false symbol of power and.

Nothing. There was nothing there, but some wild spreading depression.

It was hopeless, trying to achieve something, only to be destroyed or recreated, remade, reworked, or pushed out of the way, in hopes they could muster something else. Living through countless time, remembering everything, life had become benign.

There had to be something hidden there. In some corner of the room, some blooming plant which sang in letter, some ancient language which might provide insight. But they had long been gone and this desire and the wish had not been recognized at all. Mostly, it worked through their memories and the professor knew it.

No matter how hard he mustered all his brain, he could obtain nothing more from whence he came, they didn't ask. They didn't bother anyway, they must've known something went on. Through one of their pint-heads, in the coming, a carpenter awakened still. He took his coffee, then made it outside.

Another day under the day-light, where the birds had become an alabaster-green, the grenadier-like fiends that soon came to pop like dark, smoke under their wings, the image of a crown figure glowing within before it faded away.

'Is there anything here which might satisfy me?'

There was no wonder that no one wanted to answer. No one cried and no one asked for more. Lesser beings would've measure their worth through any kind of way than him. But he alone had to hear it from him. Since the vessel listened, through the calm had it awakened.

'I wish I could be granted this, a sight within space that I may see.'

Before he finished, he made his claim. It got counter-weighted, though he couldn't see it and he got his ration as he wanted. This strange being had grown like a glutton, being immersed in the body he had created in our image. For such power, it acted as if we were the ones in charge. It felt as if we were worshipped, not the other way around. And who would doubt it in any possible manner? We couldn't face it any longer, nor could we give in, after making it through.

It was pitiful looking at it. While it pushed on, within its two main pulps which crested the hood it bore itself farther on, and thought it could not fathom seeing itself grow on top of the ill-touched, many fingered-formations eruption out of the channels of tender marks which seemed to boil, from the depths of which crested no shapes, no forms but some blindness which was carried through an air-born virus, had it managed to snick into the general's room.

Twenty, or eight, or one hundred days before, before they had made the leap, through the nuclear universe where they hid. It managed to claim another victim, of which no sound could leave impressions on the walls or the place.

There was a nuclear ulcer caused by one of the submarine-missiles which shot out. And they could not do anything worth of a second thought, nor wonder in the darkness of eve. It would not wreathe in pain, nor would remain solemnly forlorn. It had been found a home in higher peaks where it could not bother others with the sect of lids, which closed the eyes and shoved the one who dies into a distant pit beneath the ground.

Thence their kin sought no more.

Farther, on a distant line.

'Join the other line.'

'Which one was it again?'

'The one on the right, where they harvest the organs and send them to the other heaven.'

'Rightly, so, but which side would you suggest I take?'

'That one, the same one you're on right now, inside their backs.'

Another man seemed to peel over and out of him there came two other men which only appeared to be completely in awe as they stretched out of him and survived. Usually they died before they had the chance to get it out with it. And they were warned not to make it out alive, otherwise, one of the many grim-looking axe holders who wore long cowls on top their heads, cowering everything but their eyes and mouths and nose would chase and chop them off their back blocks. As they would allow them to glue each other off and ready themselves for the cutting.

One such axe-holder came, like the Marshall of quiet, who wanted to chop, chop, chop, those who fell didn't run at the sight of him, nor hardly to the brawn were they. Instead, they were taken as fools and pushed over until they fell in large pools of their own bloody misgivings, and were chopped in them, thrown to waste.

But the waste was not bloody, yet it was outstretched, between the wall and the floor there was a gap where everyone threw their dead. Once that threshold was crossed, one could see the bodies turned to a metallic looking stone which only became a pool as it would harden again only to make the inverted sight they bore in the past. With every recreation being pushed even deeper between the air gaps, making it seem like the insides of a crudely drawn building in perspective, with no regards for the model as every level would have their lines, with metallic-looking sculptures moving aside by a process known as melting and reformation.

How the melting process and the reformation would work, in such a way as it would be known and yet, wagered for would be this. One could observe the top of the ceiling release a single drop on top one of the many statues which moved. The statues moved by melting a millimetre out of themselves only to be replaced as soon as they would be allowed to, received what they lost as soon as the ones on the top did the same thing, as it so happened, since they were all connected in the metal frame which combined everyone's wrong and well doing, their supply would be nigh unlimited. And they would somehow wager to do something of a lap.

The reconstruction of the top-most model which they attempted to replicate was not perfect as there was no door, nor any hole for them to walk towards. But they would do this nonetheless as they had no will of their own, doing only what their masters told them. And since their feet would somehow start to push even deeper, they would sunk below, giving the impression, if observed over a long period of time that they were sliding. Drawing further on and pushing on, as they could not stop this constant impulse. Sooner or later, they had stood at chance, risk at hand and everything would fall on them, not of glory but out of hand.

They could not fathom getting too much mass out of bodies that leaped and were chopped. Too many would be harmful and it was something one could not do. Not to rise too much, the making and the quiet, but so much so, they asked the hue.

Through echo and through time, they waited in line and the mindless ones got a response.

'It's pretty dark in here and I think it's all plain dark wood and something like that. Why do you think there's something here?'

'What?'

'Who are you talking to?'

'Yeah, answer us, who are you talking to?'

'And why are you looking at everything so, so, thoroughly? Are you a spy of some kind? Tell me stranger, are you a spy? What have you spied on so far?'

'A puddle, a grip? What have you done since you've come here?'

But he couldn't answer any longer, not in the same way he would've done so. Out of the very fact that he was closely being watched, and had just as much remorse as he had some fear for his own life, it was threatened, by them? By everyone.

'En guard, I will take all of you if I have to. You know what? I have no fear of no one and nothing. I stand for what I say, I stand for what I call on. And I will never yet convey fright.

I've done well for myself even before I decided to step in line.'

'I'll eat the soles of your back. And you'll bleed them out and pay the fine.'

He could look ahead and see for himself. Not that he needed to do that in the first place, as there was no need for any kind of confirmation. Damned him, he wanted to look, out of the bottom of his heart, he'd do it and he'd take what he needs with him. No one would harm him, only then he noticed how weak and frail the man began to look. After the axe-handlers, as they had rose in rank, while bearing their new cowls on top of their bodies, as if they were barely patched together would come to the fruition of chopping a man.

'I want him dead.'

'Take another spot and say that to me again, or I shall, I shall.'

'You shall do what exactly? You're a humpy and you got knots for brains, just like everyone else in here. We're headed to a wall, can't you see it yet?'

They were indeed heading towards on. And what was worse was the fact that they were entering him, least of all would they seem even more elated at the idea of taking themselves to a distant rose that might eat them while they're young. No one lived past fifty. It was only a matter of life and death. Death had to wait, for with it, the dead prepared.

'I should've known this would happen, if I enrolled in the wrong school of thought. But I needed to be free, somehow, I wanted to say and do anything my heart desired.'

'Everything sounds way too painful, way too wretched, careful now, after a while, that might get just as boring as living is and even I would take you and throw your body to the side.'

'Then I shall do you the pleasure of leaving.'

With which he leaped into the pile, not to question, not to wonder, not to ask for anything else. He simply chose to die. Even the mighty axe-holders who were near their more seriously looking, yet whom hid their smirks behind their newly formed, masks, seemed to hide something close to a cackle. It would be recognised, even to this day, as a matter of pushing and dragging in a business beyond hope. They were all worthless and everyone had to be made as if to feel as if they were worthless.

Dark room, wooden floors, white-like cotton, rotten pas the bugs and the other insects which were part of their steps and more than that, close to the gap, the walls which separated it appeared to be made out of a livid organism which appeared to be changing into metal as it pleased. From the smallest of patterns it looked like the crumbling skin-rash which might be seen as it would grow on top of a single shin, slowly breaking like desert dirt. Blunt but inside the cracks, smaller deep-worms would push in and out until all the insides stopped working together and the cotton-dirt mice started to push. And they would flourish, sometimes spread, some of them as thin as nickels and most of which were mightily sad.

But to look back on their worthlessness, they would be beaten, almost consistently to a pulp, until they bent down because of all the pain. Refuse to step in line and feel the thorough strength which was shared between all of them like brothers, sisters and the distant head-bitten plebeians they seemed to cry against. It was too soon, they were destroying everything as they stepped in and out, in and out, until something was done.

Ears clipped with the back of the axe. Mostly, it was foreigners, all of whom were trying to get past. But there was nothing on the other side and they would fall past an even deeper abyss than that of the aerial-plates which kept the gladiatorial combat still going before they fell into the pit of light where all men fought for their lives and they could do nothing to face the loss, of their kin in future pass. Everyone had to die there after all, why could the same happen here?

Nothing worked.

Man was sad, he took whatever he could and broke it down. His face was pouring out, and he could not talk any longer, because of the wild things that entered his mind, when no one's watching. There's a sharper thing today. And he cannot listen to the conversation any longer. Telephones rang, they came out of their way. Some of them were making too much noise.

'I am way too paranoid to answer that call. Someone else inside the room has to take it.'

'I will, but only if I am promised something in return.'

'What do you want then? Ask and it shall be given one day.'

'A foot-hold, I want to be part of that plane. I want to be the engine and fly through the insides of one of the satellites if I can.'

'But that doesn't sound too right now, does it?'

'What if I were given a moment to catch on my breath if that means I will be able to answer every call instead?'

'Liar, you don't actually want that, you're only making it seem that way.'

'Here then, I will answer the phone.'

And to his thread, the meat-grinder pushed out of the holes, like he would instead of standing there for long. He wanted to hear something, but he was deaf. Without a sound, and lacking in compassion, he seemed to be out there. Prolonged in the disaster, strolling past the rain-tracks, on the main city-building which was cracked down upon and messed with despite the warning signs being just about everywhere. It was difficult to be in one place at a time but there were better ways to dine on. And so they had. Time after time, they were listening to the lost signals coming out of the telephone shaped house from which both of them walked out of.

Vandal and Print, seen on a wanted poster, both of them were placed together, shared bounty, split in half, wanted dead, not alive. And that poster was just about everywhere. It was unfair, trying to make a life out of their stories, they were largely unfit. Couldn't be retrieved any longer, brown ashes making bones, charred because of all the smoke and everything they had. Made to walk around and push others, they were conjoined by the entourage of the hell-hole they frequented at. Slimy-fellows, both of them made for it. Every single time one of them fell, the other only pushed him on.

'Twenty more, I think and we should make it.'

'You mean shots? Do you mean shots? Hey, what did you say there now? Did you mean shots? I couldn't hear you Print, come on.'

Vandal didn't want to acknowledge it either. But a phone was ringing again. He was desperate not to answer it, instead he paid only the worst tricks that went through his mind. This man would be robbed blind if he could sit still for twenty minutes. On top the shots, he also had a few damned, irreparable cups of coffee which made it all the worst. Both of them had been aware that things were not meant to go this way. Rightly so, they were caught inside each other's place, they switched spots. Not out there, place was full.

Hands worn out but every single one had a pigtail in their hands. He would not want to disturb them any longer. He was not cut for this lifestyle and it only came back to them, biting them back despite not being asked to pay for what they broke, kicked out by one of the busy-bodies, never returned to the joint.

Wreckage.

At the bottom of the Bunker, where everything was destroyed, one of the abandoned wreckages, there stood the Violator, king of all. Since he had kept his loyalty to the body of choice, he would not shatter any dream and walk on the wreck, never to return to a humanity that waited for him. Most of the living beings and even the androids were gone. Only he remained, as he was strong.

The Violator was supreme, caught in his own corner, felt within the cage, he slowly walked through what was left of the fallen ceiling, the watches and some of the old homes which had belonged to good men, all of whom appeared, every now and again, to be placed here and there as bones. In the throng of the bone-watch, there lay the eight skeleton heads he proceeded to walk upon and crush with no force being involved, with no worth being pushed along. As he had made little sense of what went on when he was alive. Chimes was one of them, who died protecting something he called his den. It was something cozy, pushing through a blocked door, having the numbers off, still going.

Single note written in silence, for the bodies with more of an organic mass, there was nothing to be sure about them. Nothing remained of the brass. Nothing stood in place and in a moment, even the higher rooms would fall out of their way, unable to contain all that weight and the unequal distribution of the build. It followed him this way around.

When an anatomically formed meal appeared to be somewhat fresh, he would near it and grab it by the waist, performing the same weird rotation, like shark-tails in a black puddle of blood, swimming around each other as they would eat and eat until their prey either drowned or had been completely eaten alive. Though the time of pain had been gone, though, if there was something, from all the debris. And all the junk and missing broken shrills, it was the fact that some lights were still working. Somewhere out there, a source of power still seemed to store something in it. And if there was one, there would also be a few. A few of them would not work unattended, hence one would have to deal with them as he should. By force and by attendance and only the living could attend to the devices. Unless there were others who replicated their functions and still chose to hide themselves from whatever emerging threat that might find itself there.

For that, he followed, each cable and each shallow piece of cord, to which, something had to be dealt with as they would chip one of the walls. Some of which were largely threatened, a disgusting thing, but nothing fell. Not for too long as worth would say so, there was no reason to be out there. Not for long, the wind had sunk and in a moment, the whole underworld would be drawn even deeper down.

No force or voice could be heard in the halls, no one who was lost and somehow found himself here, of all place, where light pale and the performances began.

An old tv-set, somewhere close.

‘Ladies and gentlemen, I have the honor, at the dawn of the new-year, the gold year which may bring the static back, that there’s nothing to fetter for any longer.

Wars have ended, life starts again. And there is nothing one should look after any longer, for life starts again.’

A-new, he repeated, another member from the crowd. Joined by another one, they were ready to hang them before they lost one.

The sons sang of anarchy but there had never been a government to begin with. Through one of the bullet-proof window panes, the Violator proved himself to move closer, only so he could see himself push past them during the time their reign was not known. They suffered losses, he broke through.

Misanthropy coursed through his tar-blood and the Violator could not hope to leave them unattended in the back, where they could do as much damage as anyone in their place. To destroy and to touch where they didn’t belong and where they’d only get further away. It was the glutton’s joke, no way to get through it without hope. Inevitably touched, the set was completely destroyed, without being given a fair chance. There he would lay.

And remain after in the same place. No alarm so far. It was all as heeded. Sounds appeared to arouse not only some suspicious but alertness as well. Yet, it was strange that he waited for so long. A creature should be mindless, it ought to obey. It should be pushed around back on the streets, made to charge in a building as it desires only to destroy. That’s what an animal is. An animal cannot think for itself, as it can only obey the needs and the instincts that draw it around.

It should matter even less when one looks around and sees no connection to the force that pushed the breed instead. Past the ruined building the Violator charged through, there lay the bridge, but he didn't follow through. As, how could a beast know?

Did they show intelligence?

'Would they bow?'

Another auditory device went off by itself, without daring to make too much of a noise, or carry on too strange of a message between units that did not account for its presence there. SO much unfairness in the wild sharp noises, no one could make a thing out of them when they were alive, let alone now. When he had to feel, he'd see to it, that no one would be left to witness. No camera standing, no need to check for any survivor. Thence the bridge wrapped a small cord and for a moment, there, the Violator came forth. It was but a dream, parts had no life of their own.

The compound

Could hear some sounds, coming through. It took a while to do something with all that noise coming along and making the hard noise sharper. Nothing pleased him so far, especially not while trying to make it for the first handle he could lay his fingers on. He was no troubadour, but he thought about one for some reason. A bad thing, he couldn't think. Not while being there. It would elevate him to being exposed and being too close to the landing. He stayed his hand, at least for a while. It was getting harder, focusing on trying to do something without touching them. Four sides went into each direction. At least that changed.

'I'm glad we're back together.'

No answer. Keyringer could not figure out whether or not he had been accompanied by Christine or by Filler. Both of them had been separated for too long. He didn't see right. His sight was either a blur or a near-extraction of a near-sight. He only looked past the figure and could see the empty. It looked dark, like an eater who had left its teeth marks across the walls and in the surroundings. He was bent on it, one of his disjointed knees. He walked with it on a limp, broken and seeing everything in blanks.

There was a pistol in his arm. A Colt that was somewhat still working and a man he was asked to kill, it could be him. It was too far now, he couldn't see whether or now there were knives in the air, or pushed through his back, farthing away like kites. If there was a mass there, he could shoot it and only startle whoever that was. If he missed, there would be something to pay. If, no, I've already spent too much time thinking of her brother. And that didn't end up helping at all. She laid dead and he was free-walking, somewhere, with power stilled in his arms by the court which named him.

He had to have gone hand in hand with that man. Ivanoe might've passed the sentence now. He was largely at fault, unable to make anything out of it. He walked.

Both of them did. Unable to figure out where to go now, feeling across the air, if there was something to be taken away, it was the nasty-looking walls which spilled. Perhaps that was one of the effects of being near-sighted. Seeing everything as it ought not to be like, he jointed himself back through one of the thoraxes which crawled from the floor. They were everywhere, spread and eating some of the rust and the bacterium bits that were spread everywhere. I knew that.

'I know it's late, but.'

Who was it? It wasn't the figure. It didn't speak, nor had it walked plainly ever since they crossed paths. As a matter of fact, if there was something, or some way to quantify it, that would be the peculiar bobbling teeth-like oil which boiled his skin. Dark surroundings followed.

We walked a few feet and secluded ourselves in one of the rooms. Not because of my command, for I dared not say a single word, but because, it appeared, for some time that I was out of breathe. Unable to figure out who he was and why was there noise being made. Under scrutiny of some law, the dreadful quiet would make me look around for the wild surroundings. Trying to make it for another one of the wild gates which appeared there, it was a carpet vision, but pushed through my skull. A skin plotch, like a lamp out like a cradling vase pushed out of the back of his skull.

The stranger had seen in at would've said something if he weren't shocked by the sight of it. Or how hard it looked, as a second smaller skull which came out, trying to make for an escape; something in it appeared to draw out some air until it could do it no longer. Dead men were not supposed to talk. But some of them formed in that peculiar growth, until it was too uncanny to focus on anything of worth. Some surroundings started fading.

Now Ringer ripped out the mark on his chest.

'I'm Markovich.'

He said. He was a long way out of it and appeared to have been walking the wrong way ever since he made that cut in the ink-arm. They were loaded, all of his veins appeared to have some kind of ink inside of them. Most likely out of some unnatural thing, which only seemed to bear his own repulsion; he couldn't do it, work for too long. He had lost too much blood and it spilled everywhere, but that wasn't his. His was back, the one on the floor was red.

And in its reflection he saw, as he knelt down and licked it clean, the teeth were still there. He saw as much as it was fit for him to react. It wasn't decent yet he had done everything he could do with everything concluding into trying to cut one of his ears.

'Is this close enough for you to notice me?'

'Christine, I knew it was you, I knew it all along.'

'Why is the Colt pointed at me then?'

From the angle, not from the ground. Both of them were standing, his sight was clear, they were outside, in one of the main lower-attics of the compounds. Some of them appeared to hoister some cages, others normal dorms. Most of them were a melt which had included some apartments from the bloc. It couldn't be seen though, other than the ruling numbers that kept going down, there was nothing more to look forward to. They were out of it, no longer listening to their surroundings.

Again and again, they kept finding themselves displaced from reality, while trying to listen to something even nearing common sense. But it was simply not meant to be.

'We have been going at it for how long now?'

'I think we've been doing this for a while. Think it's going to change now because you noticed it?'

'I doubt it, somehow I seriously doubt it. If I had, I might've said something a long time ago.'

'Great, now I've got you on top of my head as well.'

'Whoever's making that infernal noise should be shot in the head.'

The echo came from another side of his eye. It went and came back at various intervals, which haven't stopped going at it ever since.

'Hello, what are you doing there?'

'Checking the archives for something, I'm one of those people who work on the.'

Prescott, not named yet. Yet to be baptized, but he wore it around his throat, like a tiny prick of metal denture which sunk into him. He was out of it again. A slight play of hands got him nowhere. Nothing to see here, other than the people who were called for the move-in. They were desperate for something, at least up to this point when they didn't even want to admit it. Most of their fingers were cut, off around the buckle, dragging.

The chief-in stood there, waiting for answer. Prescott couldn't think of anything for the time being. His bile had been corroded, he was struck all the way back as he turned to see who was going in which direction. If he made the run now, no one would catch him.

'Yes, he's from 'round, don't worry about him. He won't cause any trouble.'

Senselessness was somewhat indispensable from the road. He could walk away, but he would not feel the soles of his feet working again. As hardened as steel, his will was not to be touched yet, as he only did as he was asked for. He followed Keyringer around, trying to stalk him out of his desire to kill him.

Another man following orders, that's what they all were, in some way or another. Doing everything they were asked for and never claiming anything as their own. It would have to pass, he thought at last, what if I decided to kill him now? Out in the open; he's distracted by her. If only I could make a few more steps, then I could claim his life and no one would suspect it was I who did it.

There were lines inside his gut, made out from the concise marking left by the Receiver, the one in charge of his servitude, the slavemaster who poured a piece of his soul in and called the shots. He wouldn't be too calm yet, nor would he remember. It was clear enough that they were a few feet too far away from where he was standing. As harsh weather tops started drawing forth, the area surrounding it, the puffs of smoke-like loamps which crested themselves around them started bumping and feeling like ingrown cotton as they started wrapping them it.

Though the slight touches were soft and they could not abate waiting for long, they suffered no pain and could, least of all face none else but the vitriolic substance inside their open wounds.

‘I fear we might have to move, now, Ringer.’

‘Not yet. I still haven’t made up my mind about you yet, my dear. I can only do what I can to stomp you out but don’t be weary, I’ll take what I can and then I’ll see whether or not you should make it.’

‘But what if I don’t want to?’

‘Then I’ll offer you a quick release. If that’s what you want me to do.’

Less than happy to attain I, they wondered no longer about what was happening around. Sharp around the ears, sharp around the years, most importantly, they spent a few days staring at one another, a standout which could not continue, as, at the end of each week, they could only push so far until they couldn’t help it but give into the growth of the mass which had accumulated underneath their legless brass rings, needles and various other tiny star-like balls which wore spikes of their own and could do nothing but feed themselves into one another until they could not do it any longer.

‘Ah, I see there’s a reason why we’re here.’

‘Where?’

‘On our feet again, I think I’ve already taken my shot but I missed.’

‘How so? You aimed at a blank range, how could you have missed it?’

‘It wasn’t my intention, initially speaking, but I’ve come to the impression that everything I’ve done so far was a mistake.

I shouldn’t fight it, but I’m still considering going on with my initial planning. If I could somehow reach my goal, I could make it through and take all the lives and make the necessary arrangements to mark their souls with ink. As one should do, as it is needed and as I can, if I can help it, I will do it.’

‘Then what are you planning on doing now?’

‘I’m going to keep you alive for as long as I can.

If my suspicions are correct, Christine, your brothers seems to be looking for you for another reason other than your murder.’

‘He’s still searching for me?’

‘He is and I believe I can prove it somehow. If you would only give me the chance to show you, I think we could both make it far enough for me to give you all the necessary explanations without risking your life and blood being spilled again.’

There was no assurance, but he could only do as much as it was needed. For some reason he was dolefully quiet. But he’d do. He didn’t ask for anything else, as well as he would.’

Ringer never imagined. It sounded strange, incomplete, in some way, just like his mind was. He never got into the habit of using his mind to create objects or see through lenses other people like him had long since taken them for granted. And when the realization came, his reaction was more than likely, mundane, never given to a second thought, never asked for, nor would he ask himself again when the time come. But this was not the time, not while she was near and not when he had already made his decision. They would still grace one another with each other’s company. That would be a given now, as he needed her more than she apparently needed him any longer.

While being weary of it, he finally lowered the shaft of revolver and started pacing around for twenty seconds, it was only in this time that he did something which would change the terms in which they approached one another, least of all would they know how to handle it.

‘Your brother needs to die. We need to put an end to him. I think that way we might be able to prevent this.’

‘But it’s already done. And what’s done cannot be changed, no matter how many lives you’re taking with you.’

‘You can’t be serious now, after everything that happened to us, something as mundane as a simple murder will certainly bring you back.’

‘It’s wishful thinking; and being mundane has nothing to do with it, this will still be a murder of some kind and we won’t be able to get away from it if we proceed. It will haunt both of us in some way or another.’

‘Which is still better than the alternative, you dying, and I having to deal with the loss of you, not now, not since I got so attached to you.’

‘Why did you aim the gun at me then?’

‘It’s simple. I didn’t know whether or not you were who you claimed to be. I don’t remember much about my life, I know my actions dictated something else, but I don’t.

I’ve always been going by nothing else but dumb luck and that can only bring me so far.

Guessing your name, the date of our weddings; I think we have been married twice, at least, and twice as long divorced, but then we’ve came back together.

The problem is that these memories don’t fit well inside my head and they don’t feel as if they’re mind. Not even the closest thing, if I come to think about it. I cannot work through it.’

‘Then don’t, accept it as it is.’

‘You know I can’t do that Christine, look at this place. If I came to accept that, what else would I allow my mind to go through before giving it all in?’

I couldn’t stated letting everything pass through me, I wouldn’t be a man if I did that.’

She considered telling him, but just as quickly as she had been before, she abstained from doing so. It was taken for granted after all, despite what he claimed. It could be seen in his eyes, though his mouth moved in whichever direction. He loved her and that was enough to make a pass for everything that happened to him so far.

Again with the key, which only triggered his reaction, searching for the ink, seeing how it deepened into his arm until it started reddening. By then he was walking alone, searching the first open door. Closed, it felt like the air itself was inflated past that air, the molecules striding inside of him during their wild attempt to stop him from doing whatever he could in order to get away. But that could only work so far.

‘I want to speak with the man of this chamber.’

The patriarch arose, as if from one of his dire graves, the floor being represented in eighteen, finely squared cancer octaves which sung the song of cancer as he rose. And it was dreadful to listen to, as they could never to pride themselves into their open gashed, through which the smaller copies of human stood, being chewed upon, as they should. Many of them looked like they bore remorse, for the man who was inside the room but he was the worst of all, as he knew of the suffering, yet he did nothing to stop it.

Underneath the cowl, under the barricaded clothes, in which he hid what seemed to be the worst possible sight, the un-likely non-delightful watch of scents, which hardened as well as they pushed the advent of a being, he relented and pushed a piece of the lumped-barricade he wore off.

Inside of it, the scent of death appeared to bear the body of a man. He was half-caught and could only be a part of him now and always as he wanted, as he was meant to be, there was no other way for him to see himself through it.

‘He is called Gordo. I have stumbled upon him during my time with the company, though I dare not say how we got into such close quarters.

I seem to have recalled something which neared his question, in death, he had emotion. But he didn’t manage to live for long enough for me to be done answering.’

‘Why is there?’

There was no answer, nor would there be one, as a matter of fact, this creature could only get more and more aggressive looking, uncivilized, as if Ringer was meant to know what was going on even without prior knowledge of the fact. It dawned on him that he could not fathom, nor look for any other than needed in the sight. Some light appeared to have guided him there, but that was benign. It was still obvious enough that the generator was still going and it would still go for a while, long before died. And it saddened him to hear of them bicker that way, throughout the span of a few minutes where they conveyed nothing.

‘He’s not there any longer.’

‘It was merely a sight, that’s all.

He’s not truly molded in my body, it’s the scent. It plays on your senses and on your eyes. One day you’ll understand it as you yourself shall be affected by the scent inside your turn. Otherwise, I bid you farewell and wish that you wouldn’t be as arrogant.’

‘Like this?’

He didn’t have to ask to begin with, but he pulled his revolver and shot him in his chest. Down the taking, there he bled.

‘One knife is all I need, Ringer.’

He could feel it pumping. The Foreman was close, he would feel little to no remorse for those he touched. As muscles pumped, so had their heads and the knives manifested inside their backs, ever growing until their meat expanded into plain tools for him to draw upon, without a question or a wonder, the filth of the grit being chosen after.

It was understandable, after a while, speaking in speeches benignly.

‘I wish we could stay a while here.’

‘So do I, but this can’t go forever and you know that just as well as I do. It can only go one way; you know where we’re headed, don’t you?’

Keyringer spoke to him, though there was no distinguishable feature for him to be able to hold on. There was no distinction between them. They weren’t copies, but they were also never silent. It was a sight they refused to look past.

‘We should try to make it in time before our arms twitch.’

And they compared them. Shattered bone almost lay exposed. And ink pushed out and poured out until it drained through the blood; that was somewhat which was clearly inevitable. Only one way to go and only one way to know if they would die and, so-so put, it was no one else but Keyringer who suggested it. He was impartial to everything and wanted to do nothing with them. All of those who followed and asked for nothing else, but the mark of ink which drew them, like the wasps they were, all of the gloomily caught lepers in their ranks, marked out of time and left to fend for their own.

‘Here, take this knife, push it through, you know what to do and how to get rid of it.’

First cut, they did it at the same time. It almost came to push out of them as they wallowed behind. Twenty five, but it was unclear what the number meant. Out of so many days and years, so many false hopes they had attained, there was no reason for which they would continue with anything. It was lost on them, hardly ever talked upon. But it appeared in the halls inside the compound nevertheless.

Even if they had been placed there improperly so, they were still there for a reason neither of them acknowledged so. And every action had been dictated and left to flow through their minds, it brought too many bad memories. It was this lack of control which showed itself on Ringer as he grabbed a ledge, then he pushed himself through it as if he wasn't even physically there. One of the old, frail, he touched him on the back during a time he would be most exposed.

It crept out of a half-skull split, finally, it left him. To the beat of a single stick, he had been turned by nothing of his own will, which only made him cover himself in dirt and shame. He killed again, eight, a few more seconds but they were gone. As were the numbers, which made him desperately, look for the man he met before. Hours at worst, it was not meant to be.

Something changed in the compound and it was not the general sight, nor would there be anything else but some kind of pain which would aggravate him even more than he needed to. It was only that way that he could feel it, the pain in his legs and arms which dictated every action, the pain which took over the control.

It made little sense, and it would also make little to no more than him finding himself even closer to a split head, he opened it instead, this time around, and found nothing in but a mass of coal-like filling he dug out, desperately trying to find something in there. He started eating from it as soon as he could, never asking, nor pushing through.

'You will get sick if you keep doing that. You'll choke and I'll have to bury both of you.'

'How did you find me here?'

'I was always here, one way or another, don't bother look back, you left no trail for me to find you on. Of course it was only a matter of time I would find a way to lure you out of your hole. But you shouldn't pray that I may find you this way again.'

Because I'm leaving and I have no intention on trying to force our paths to cross.'

'You won't? How so? I can only think of something this way, it won't work.'

I've tried, I've tried tracing my steps back, in the mind or.

I simply can't find her, nor him, and I can't find that moment when I had you cornered.'

He couldn't stop staring at the Foreman then. And it didn't matter, regardless of how hard he tried pushing himself out of it.

But the Foreman walked away. And in his path, the walls started revealing the excess skin left in by the knives he planted inside of them. It only marked his desire not to be followed. Not that there was a chance he would not subdue himself while doing so, but he had to go through it.

They weren't to find each other ever again, if one meant to live and the other meant to die, in whichever course of action that would be taken, they refused to meet each other at the end of the road. 'He has a tiny switch-blade!'

The man pulled out two of them in each hand while he held another one between his curved long yellow-tinted horse teeth, through which he spat blood particles which splashed on the floor and became yellow with crass.

‘Stop him before he does anything.’

Late on the watch, tiny woman, no voice, surrounded by a crowd, only a few steps away made by everyone around her which revealed the spotlight-space of a circle which surrounded her. Others wore rosy cheeks while having been long-bent down their feet, caught in this warehouse of Platonic meat, from which they could not wander off.

‘Stop him.’

The first victim fell. Her throat was slit, her bottom feet, two inches in a closely guarded eighteen-foot deep diameter that managed to shatter her ribcage and dig so deep inside her cavity that she was almost unrecognizable as a woman, let alone a corpse that would walk. But the woman crawled away, despite bleeding and her head being just as split about the forehead to the chin, as her body was within that point of cutting, jutting, scraping for more.

What Solozarn had done, was take a gulp of her blood which induced in him a worse state, of mind anemia, no blood group seemed to be as vile and as functional as theirs had been. A Han Chinese was there in the crowd. As soon as he pulled on a gun, everyone ducked almost instinctively. But he looked feminine enough to trigger a reaction out of Hans Solozarn.

‘I hate women, and you look like a woman to me, boy!’

‘We should take a break and talk about our differences then.’

He said, right as Solozarn took the ‘height’ in and tackled him down, punching the Han to death, leaving a gaping wound gashing out of his neck, which immediately shot eight pints and eighteen gallons of blood against his chest as they rushed towards the man’s head, turning it into a blood flake, which flattened. His touch was simple, he killed without eating, but he tasted the man’s gut, pulling out a single throat-neck which started walking on its own, burning everything below it.

‘Ahh.’

It managed to ricochet against his cheek, scraping off a bit of it before it showed off against his blood-shot eyes’ reflection.

‘I can’t stop hating them Negroes, you know?’

The sociopath said, as he was looked at by everyone in the crowd. This was the eight side of the tram which now lay connected to the compound after all.

But he didn’t see it coming. The bone rebounded itself like a piece of shrapnel, going as long as to push out of him.

‘Truth be told, I wasn’t planning on this.’

‘Can’t be, it just can’t be?’

‘What? Just another gulp of it, then, maybe I’ll stop the bone.’

But he smiled candidly as he pushed out eye's worth of vulgar slurs. He fumigated with then, they stared. He pushed them out, they stared. Even when he pouted, they stared. He couldn't move without them staring and waiting for him to do something else.

‘A smile, please, applaud.’

They did as he pleased.

‘Negro-blood courses through all of your veins. I'm not paranoid, I have to do it. I have to cleanse you all of it. I need you all to be clean before you cross the river Pyre and burn on your way to the devilish zone of the Nightmare of dreams.

Peace cannot be attained as long as you have to paint the halls red with your ancestors' inhuman limbs.’

They were crippled by it and could not fathom looking into it. They could see the zone, the other one, in which they ought to end it. There, in the distance, there would be little to no salvation as they'd only come to replace themselves, with glowing bitter goats, the lambs and the ropes, the dogs and the fat-lumped rhinoceros jaws, all of which would cackle at each other, their kin and all, until that point of no starvation, when they were determined to put on a fight.

‘Someone needs to pick up that gun and kill him before he butchers us.’

A man alarmed everyone of the hard-head, the diamond shredder which pushed out of the window. Close to it mirror-knives traveled slowly, only to stop and melt, and through them, the shrapnel-like head stood erect. Pushing out and foaming broth, and blood sea did not see it happen.

Blinded by Hans, they started cradling each other in the nearest corner, something they hadn't considered or did in a long time. It had to be done, pouting in the sickening of the light, the blooming fingers pushing out and being cut one by one. Deranged and pushed back, outta' it, they couldn't bring back, not even a single shimmer of their filth-mongrels which had been headed by the rear-windows upon their attempt to invade their privacy through uncanny means.

‘Filth mongrel, you're a descendant of Mongol. You must be cleansed. You must be killed and slaughter and beaten after and devoured, just so I may attain that piece of your mind and knowledge, right as in the olden times.’

‘But is that not a Negro tradition, that of which you accuse of us having intermixed with.’

And they laughed at him, unearned so, which only added to his annoyance and the amount of self-pity and content he felt for himself. Which brought his other, more aggressive side back to reality, as it writhed its ugly head in, as he grabbed for a woman, bringing her to her knees, pushing her through one of the tightly hidden, if not compressed holes through which she fell through without a limb to stand on. He kept them as the hole sealed itself and there was no way for the others to know how it worked. Despite that, they all seemed to be desperately searching for it, without giving in the doubt of the need, while the people standing closest to them started dying.

It dawned on him, they would not escape.

Many of whom, of better if not bitter hues had lost their fingers as they pushed through, nails dug and 'diggen' through, dug through skin and dredged in sharp meat.

There was no way to hide it, he walked. Not the facial features, not the behavior, not the act. Not the filth, upon which he had no control off, nothing. It was time he finally showed his colors, for what he were, and what had remained of him and what would come after, as the act were done with. Sickeningly he stopped breathing, only pushing in one direction, lost in thought. A name that was not his own and would not fathom pushing out of itself.

Twice the size through his back, he carried it like a sack.

Joined soon by another one, who seemed to look just about the same. Though he had only seeped in through the straws that entered him instead. Through twenty other small containers, they walked on a single bridge of solid fat. It didn't lead forward any longer, only at the bottom of the ravine, towards which he seemed to have been lost.

'I see.'

'Was there ever a reason behind it?'

One of them men asked. They were plainly exposed, and lost in the various acres which only pushed on. Dreading themselves after being unable to prevent it from happening.

Another two of them seemed to be absorbed, into the fall. During which they didn't stall and only came through, until all access to life ended and they could not see it through any longer. They would be damned nonetheless, even if they stayed. But neither of them could be allowed to remain alive, not for long, not to fend for themselves or start on breathing. It was unacceptable, even pushed through.

And they were used as they would be in need of, to cover the various holes left in the walls by the Foreman himself. He needed to make sure there was still a reason for the Compound to keep him alive and this was only the greatest if not the only thing which seemed to make him work. It was only through him that they wanted to push on. Another attacker came back, he charged the man and only ended up being thrown on his back as the Foreman turned. Knelt as he pleased and crushed his skull before him. He dared say something in two tongues. But couldn't do it past that, they couldn't fathom looking anywhere.

It was the only push there could be. Some of the men where nothing more but a mercy kill, which could only be ended through the strike of a depression.

The Depression left many men wandering from their factories and from their various parts of town towards the Compound. Though there may have once been an open path, during a time where the bunker wasn't in place to stop them from coming onto it, as they placed themselves there, no one stood a reason to be there any longer. Watching after days, and nights, two swollen through the dark and light, obscured by some of the blue clouds, they seemed, almost moronically caught in awe.

They could not be blamed for it. No one would expect this cackle of rotten sights. No delight to set them in awe, no food for the ones that came from a far distant land. Looming around this senselessness added nothing to their worth. It was only a seemingly useless thing they did out of the frustration of their country's misgivings, since it had surrendered to the barbarous outsiders who would spit and piss upon their guts.

And one of those men seems like he hadn't come from nowhere else but his own peculiar ideal, the man who would turn alloy to diamond glass. The same man who ended up being pounded in the ground while he said nothing about no one else surrounding him. He could only be pitied for so long now, until it would be enough. Some worth could not be taken out if, swollen and erect like a horn.

'I'll take it back if I have to, I won't turn upon myself no longer.'

'Don't start it yet.'

Filler made sure everything was in place, hoping everything would tie off eventually. There was no certain way he could look past it, but he tried it anyway, at least three more times. Without something to come along the way, they were directionless, and the memories would be forgotten. Once, with their death, so would the events prior to their meeting.

In the short-comings they searched one of the brothels. It was a given that one would find its way down inside the compounds. As one and only one possible sign of the melting, and pouring in from the outside world, which took away the perspective they had on the world. It was all they had, torn apart-a land or not. They were confined inside one similar room. Over and over again, overtly trying to out-do themselves over, only to end up where they began. No, Christine was gone. It was almost as if she had never existed to begin with. Out of the picture, legless, desperate, broken apart and dragged in by a brother she has never shared any connection with whatsoever.

Through the tributaries, one, in the distant search of the dead-lamb, there had been a charge. From an almost flat-cutout-like turbine, that kept everything going there was one director. He placed everything that could be seen around the place. Going further than that, there was a disgraceful act, the body of a man being ripped apart in plain sight.

A bastardization of the old Christ tradition, a mockery which was placed on the arm of a man who had claimed the name of Ringer, the Key being lost. Him being locked inside, there being no way out, and as a single sign of that, with every picture taken of himself and the uniform he wore, there would always be that single sign making the change apparent. As if there was no single emotion in his eyes. He knew, he had to remember every kind of pain that would be omitted by the death of faith. It's what degenerated the land, and in turn, he chose to do it as well, coming to a quick turn of tides.

He had been a man of cloth after all and not much of his brain was left. Too many cuts here and there and it seemed like he could only look forward on close calls, when it didn't matter any longer.

His mind was gone and gone with no one else to attach it. Being desperate to make a change, he only drew on and lost another piece of his brain. On dissecting small birds while performing a live autopsy, but more importantly, being somewhat caught by something. Despite there being the high-punishment against stalking, there was a stalkerish behavior apparent in most people that could not have been observed in any other place. First it began with the taking of a single cabinet of drug after breaking into an apartment belonging to a woman called Vika, or Viki, something like that, same three and just about about the same origin. She was looked for, over a few streets.

There he came and he didn't bother to look around or ask for anything as they came to the realization there was nothing going on. No bystander knew what was going on. Not a single would dare know what went through his head, everything going just as planned, for a while.

It was simple, he would walk around the places she occasionally seem to subscribe to, place a dollar on the counter and proceed with the bait. Afterwards, he would not stop thinking about it.

Perhaps it was meant to be that way. With his account being unreliable, there was no pointer going towards where he wanted to go now.

They left him, just about everyone. Leaving slowly, with spots on the floor, they weren't glue there, but they stood out like cutouts of carpet rounded foot-prints which appeared to have been stuck on top of one another, forming small circled patterns. He wasted no second as he started prying into them, going by the glow, as he was followed by no one. Wearing it would not make a difference any longer, but he did it anyway. Glassed by the skin, and cut about the forceps out of the scraps he had attained from rubbing his arm against one of the unfixed walls revealed as much. There was no blood but ink dripping out of him, a detail which saddened him most. Since he knew that he was human no longer. Since he knew that it was already too late for him to get out of it.

Even his faith had been somewhat bastardized in the process, to the point where he was unsure what to believe any longer.

There was still so much to do around the halls, and they were endless, as the compound was only the smallest sub-claves of the great building his in the heart of the Northern Blocs. Without hope or doubt, he walked, without saying anything, without bothering to look around or see for himself what reason called. Being there was dreadful, but time would do.

There was still Filler who seemed to breathe, despite the circumstances being the way they were. And there was no reason for him to prod there, especially since he would only be alone from this point on. With Ivanoe having given him the sentence and him having no chance to spare them around, doubt at least appeared to infuriate a man the most. A cruelty like it could not be felt. It had to wreath its two heads in and bite as deeply as it could, pushing through until it was uncanny for it to miss a single second, another wetter piece of glass falling from the ceiling. He had missed it just now and couldn't go back to the moment when it fell, not without suffering the loss of another finger. Two were missing, on his right hand. They were only pushing through on the last span.

They were dependent on it. Just as the mold of a single casket would be during the flood coming from the same room he was locked in. But there was no point in trying to get out. It wasn't made out of water but the wiring that remained, the ones that dragged it away still heaving as he had done before. Every miss and every pain, once it got out, nothing remained.

He was trying to undertake the task of understanding what was going on around him, with the wild surroundings being somewhat, still, no reason to ask for more. 'You know what's so hard to distinguish about them? If you were to look at the bottom of their shoe's soles, you'd see nothing else but the pointers to the footprints which carried blood prints all over a single flat outstretch of snow.'

Tracing it back there, to the point where a single man managed to escape was pointless in some way, meaningless in the other, it lead to nothing, meant nothing.

As the steps drew back in, there drew the marks of the steppe which were ever-lasting, never glancing, pushing through the cowl of snow, tracks a-making on various rows during which the snowstorm only got stronger.

A corny sight, and the reeds were blue, mostly painter by a Dutchman taken out from the golden age of drawing, before he was abandoned there with no means to fend for himself or face the cold.

Entry to the building from another angle, Christine's brother, whose chest still heaved as the other projected body appeared to have finally pushed itself in until it had become part of it. Never throwing, heaving after dark. It could not handle all the bottled air inside its chest before pushing out.

The same song would not be played twice now. There was no announcement yet, but the man who used to play the piano died.

It was saddening, in some way. But no one seemed to show up or care. It wasn't like they were heartless, but they could not look away from the threat which appeared on every possible surface there was. Subtle or not, it wasn't tracked down, nor would it be more obvious than it should be there. Tiny pebbles appeared in places they shouldn't be found, not there, not at this moment.

Something wrong happened inside of them, no process of taking, no manifestation of bodily functions. But it felt as if they were bones, their bones, moving along the ground until they entered the various soldier's bodies and honing their return towards home. It wasn't right. The sight of it was anything but right. Like some bitter-sweet deformation suddenly breaking the joints before they had the chance to develop; infantily being broken down as they'd lose control over the way they spoke, moved and fell on their knees as they broke.

Fingers locked, all around the four points which forced the alcove. Some of them stretched directly underneath one of them. Tossed over the shoulders, Corpus Mortem walked to the side, picking off what he left behind. And there was no antecedent to the ones that were there before him during their sad attempt to grasp the meta-straws. Some of whom were still there, part of the alcove, all on each side, holding candles, burning with them as their splits opened like their wounds, everyone was being treated the way they should. In one direction there was a dire man, his name was Euphor, and he owned him thence. During their savagery they could not decide against which part they should stay on. Without saying too much, one faded in part and looked around, the pain was dry but tiny critters lay inside. All of whom seemed to wager that someone was there before there, the stranger.

Twenty miles way, unable to breathe through the devices, primed for them, a nonce entered the hold. He had made his joy out of picking up the ones off the ground who couldn't help it, gone in the making.

'I shall claim a piece of my own and expand my world whether or not you like it. I'll do it and I'll kill whomever I want, I'll drive them madly in to the nearest walls. I'll, I will, I'll.'

'Had enough?'

‘I still have some power left in the backburner, but I won’t allow myself to be used in such a manner. I am the last and I’m going to be the last one alive in this place.’

He said to one of his female suitors.

Corpus couldn’t fathom staying long around them for reasons. They all made him feel, all too wrong, all too touched around his head. He wanted to be out of there, already with one of their teeth out, guiding himself by the scent that loomed around. An ivory puddle in the north, he knew what to avoid in order to make as fewer trouble as he possibly could. It was the invoice brought by theirs. He could not remain in there a second longer, because he had plans of killing them. All of his hatred had to be equally distributed along.

‘Hello there.’

A fright had inhabited his soul. A stroke had almost claimed his heart before he could do it. There he was, the man known as Abel with his back device, trying to claim his life before his exploration even started. And whom might stand against him that way? What was in his mind, what was he trying to convey? He could kill me, he could snap my shoulders off their joints, I know he could do it as easily as he wants to. I could not cherish a second more against him if he had decided to try it. Try it, try it, making him beg for an escape.

‘I think there’s something dangerous in the back. Your safety isn’t to be satisfied that easily, is it?’

‘There’s nothing there but a few females lying on the ground, have you used them already?’

‘I suppose their company has grown tiresome after a while. I could not fathom trying myself ever and after, yore and wonder. I wont nothing and I bid you seek the same.’

‘Not so fast now, I need some directions first, before I decide to do something about this company of yours. There’s something I truly don’t like about it, you know?’

So many leaps and so many goes, he couldn’t handle going through them again. He was the fourth man who tried conning him into heading the wrong direction and by now he learned just about their every trick. Head on there, pay heed and grievance to the dead sparrow, it might guide you into the right direction if you paid enough respect to it. Perhaps one day you’ll learn something, or you’ll make it through eventually. Keep at it, take left, another left, another left, then into the circle.

But before he could be given the time, suddenly he started sharpening his toothy grin in the back, the mandible cresting in the back, even farther than an average bear-trap until it finally arched towards the breaking point. Stress had went through him by the second and now he released it.

‘Aaagh.’ A sudden shameful cry, as Corpus felt his shoulders pop, out of no wonder and as no mystery for what was going on. He knew what this had happened for, and his insolence only showed in the form of being vile and passing.

‘I thought I gave you the right directions, but you haven’t even checked them to begin with.’

‘I don’t think I can make any sense out of what you told me. So, if you’re not so minded as to tell me, where’s the north gate?’

‘How would you have me know? I’ve been charmed by those females in there and have spent my time only because of them. Nothing more and nothing less, I’ve once been just as lost as you were.’

‘And you expect me to believe that somehow? You may be a good liar but I can see your shoes, both of them seem to be worn out, right out of long days of walking, how do you suppose you could explain that?’

‘I couldn’t, nor will I try. It’s only a matter of time until the others come.’

He left a trail for them and only now could he see them around. In every place as well, they were pale and could only make the lights tremble as one of the generators started hurling itself forth, even though it could not be touched by any, it wasted no time proving its worth. Lights were overburdened by the constant upheaval of surges that almost broke them in halves. It took too much out of a man to look for one of those and the engineer was too deformed and lacked a mind.

His face shot in every direction, through his arms and legs and body, with sharp-stretched angles, his teeth grinning as they grew inside, black of grit and seemingly all too sharp to be that of a man, instead of a beast. He was also too tall for a single man to take on if he decided it would somehow be fair for him to take on the challenge. Most decently, he kept on bobbing one of his wrenches against the top head of the turbine-wing, which only made the machine slow down as it started pushing down the insides of the generator.

‘We need to come up with something before the room falls down on them. Certainly you must understand that, Abel, after all, I know you’re not as cruel as to start pounding through my bones and the steel I have left.’

But the mechanism only rested in the back, showing ever-so slightly up whenever it was called upon. And it acted way too fast to be completely ignored, or left to the hand of fate which might take away from him whatever he might hold. He was not, in the least surprised by the fact, that wherever he looked, in whichever direction he ended up pushing himself towards, there was at least a sign of something rowing. A pair, a laughter and steps flowing, regardless of the direction he seemed to be looking in. That alone made him anything but uncomfortable for obvious reasons, it was messing with him. Through whichever, and whatever, he clipped him once again, until he was forced on his back and thrown against the ground as he could not be made to hide the little thing that poured out of his shoulder. Blood it wasn’t, nor could it have been a thing, nor could anyone pay attention to the signs as the dames appeared to have followed in and left the premise.

Sooner than expect, they left on threading. Neither of them suffered a single lass to stay behind, or make too much of a case while wallowing there. He was one of the few people who believed they belonged there. For some reason or another, it was simply how it was with some people, especially the ones who spent too much time in the compound, that dragging for far too long. It was hard to tell what the life outside had become and what it had generally been. Not without losing hope over what they lost in the ground surrounding and the waste. During daylight, there were slits, real ones which lead to real long gaps through which light passed on. And no one could distinguish the real thing from the fake one. It was hard it could only get harder, thinking of a way through, of a way out, making something. Making anything of the lost doors and pushing through when they needed to do it most.

A man got desperate there, unable to seek aid and look for anyone, beg for another spare leg after wasting the last one he got his hands on. It was infuriating, being abandoned by his group of eight hardy-watches. All of whom had once been used to appeasing their own curiosity until one by one, neither made it through. It was just and displeasing being there, a life without hope, where he crawled.

‘Anthony Rope, I need you to do something for me.’

‘Where, how, come on, give it to me straight on, I’ll deal with anything if I have to.’

Both shared nothing and lay their arms to rest. It was obvious that they had been there, for what seemed to be the great part of fewer minutes before they left. He was left to crawl in what would be the most dissatisfactory walk a man without legs would go at. With the stumps, inside of which there pushed only the most dreadful heads which prided themselves with the hardening, wearisome nature of the liquids which were being pushed in them. They paled and grew fatter, until they had become not only stronger but appeared to carry on the entire weight by themselves in the back. Both new additions appeared to have achieved the maximum quantity of their extent, until they became erect again. And two heads had come in the making, twice the quietness as they drew on. Spilling as much of their concoction as they could as it hardened, allowing the pressure of the other unseen limbs to thread on.

He was pulled by them, until the floor had changed into what appeared to be a painted world, as if he could finally breathe in the finality of his sudden freed will, Anthony rose up, being kept only by the constant spray which strapped below and appeared to feed his walk. With every step at that, he refused to stop and set to flight. A single fly just as gray as the others, whose chest heaved open and there came the crystal. Which poured in the front, as it let a final long shout, of sour watchers, all of whom return to gloat at him, the one who made it through before he could be gotten past the breeds, heed his call. Watching him as he joined the others, with the throat being nothing but an electric arc, which poured through the paint as if fell from this arc of his into the compound.

‘We have to seal the way in, we have to make it so there’s no reason to push back and see the crowds of soldiers emerge.’

One of them was nothing but a poor-headed man. Little to him after a while, instead, soldiers showed up after all. They could not be fathomed to be looked on. A fake one amongst them but they could not speak freely without risking being seen. Seeding and rooting with the mark, they listened and started lighting the plains, after a while. Could they not have heard? Was it worth it? After all, instead of trying their hands, most of which were calloused, panting. They were trying to do something.

Trying to open fire on the flying things, who were bringing from the depths of the earth, a colourful string, as thick as large erected bridges, all of which would be put together after a while, most of whom being as hardened and benign. For each had born, his body torn.

Then he walked obscure through a moving, flying, rotating throne. Inside of which the colours faded, out of which the blue and red, the pink wings emerged. A white triumphant soup had pushed him, and never ending sights emerged. He walked on crippled long legs now. From the fat baboon-like spikes only a slimmer of the grease had stood. But they were primed for the stabbing, beneath him eighteen men were sickeningly put down, and made the floor like a taxidermy ground.

From which the pain, and every scream, which made his body thin by the moment as well as deeply or even deeper within, he looked for some respite.

Rope said at least.

‘Will there be a moment when I will have earned the satisfaction I look for?’

‘Not as long as you are here, for know that the paint is cracking as we speak. Sooner or later, during some restoration, you shall be lost and covered as nothing more but the piece of a phantomatic smudge.’

With that he was left with nothing else but the truth, from why he did not shy away, nor could he convey nothing else but the most pure feeling of grandiose defeat. He felt melancholic as he saw them on their feet.

‘Lay with us and perhaps we might play later.’

‘Can’t you see that we are hurt?’

Nothing seemed to emerge in terms of emotions. Only that he indulged himself as he would want for nothing. Given and received, he lay. Rope would never hope to gain anything from them, nor had he looked for anything in return. For every moment spent there, his heart was missing, his hope ran dry.

But, there was one thing he refused to look into. And there would be no one to come up with any kind of righteous explanation. It even perplexed him in the most peculiar and unearned manner. Why would they not tell me? He asked himself. But no one really wanted to look at Rope for too long. As this simple action only awakened some kind of wild response of guilt they didn’t want to feel either.

‘Why are so many horrible things happening here?’

‘I don’t know.’

One of the sealed humans whose face had been affected the hardest, who had worn all of his sutures inside out, seemed to be of the same opinion as well. There was no change in them, they could only obey the need they felt to spare no one of the sight and of the pandemonium which was instilled in them.

Soldiers joined this strange paint-looking, poorly coloured place. And nothing much could be said other than the wild abstractions and the wrong colours used and the peculiar pastels which ruined in. What of the break if there was nothing to ruin? Nothing to destroy, as long as there was only ugliness in it, as everything in this world, there would be nothing to refrain them from doing so.

‘What will happen to them?’

‘Observe for yourself, this should be easy enough for no difference to have been made. I wish there was a heart to ruin. I hope there is a change as well. Make sure whatever you planned to do with them is wrongly accustomed. For pain and agony will claim them.’

He repeated this as if it were some ill prophecy of his people. The ones which made him be stuck in this place in the first of the takers, during the times, during their minds and. He couldn't think right. It was all wrong.

Those men suffered and it was even going to be for the sake of them addressed. Instead they did nothing to change or prevent what went through their heads. It was all too gone, all too broken in them. Those ribs, their very, not souls, but they simply looked out of the world, beyond abstraction, too stretched yet in the same chamber with them.

All of them together but in one spot, all of them there but not exactly there, only a few steps forward, more backwards and eighteen hundred on the sides, which constantly drew them back to their original position while they remained still all the time. It was a strange sight which wasn't even human. A derelict of parts, not even those, they looked like wild long, thrown out surfaces which produced the utmost insufferable noise their kin could ever create. And they were absolved of the pain they caused as they pushed on and contorted their creator until he had finally stopped and appeared there inside of them. But he was nothing even remotely understandable as he was only the guts and the heads and the geometrical objects which had assailed and connected their brains as the worm-like intestine constantly writhed in weird circles. Only at that point could there be pain.

Only then could Rope admire what had happened there as he only thought of a way back, to a time when everything was fine. His heart beckoned for an escape. To be back inside the Compound, not here, where the hills only raised themselves upon a whim and bore the mighty grins of which beckoned teeth bore axe-like infantile limb-cacklers. Embed in them, features that remained somewhere obscure and unable to suture themselves into death. They begged for that mercy instead of quitting through their lives. And they could not look beyond it. Life was sad in the mouth of the hill.

And plenty of other hills appeared to have stocked themselves with the mightiest similar torture-chambers one could end up being at. Never to have felt the love, never to have suffered less, it was only too obvious what he had desired, out to get them, much likely as to impress their living sides. And he could only spear them with his eyes as he finally got back up. He wanted to share whatever slim emotion he bore. There was no time for it, not while they were drawn towards the hills and being spread without them knowing what was going on. As a matter of fact, they tried their hands, sliding through, soldiers faded. Neither of them were headstrong enough to make a difference with all the splitting happening in-between them. Everyone had to be taken whether or not they liked it, and that in itself was irrelevant. As they jousting against them with lances that spit led, watched upon clearly as they would give it all as well; sooner than expected, more than a few of them leaped in.

And the other soldiers which were pulled down the hills and up, upon them and most of them inside had suffered no less than it was needed, as their very own lives were at stake and could not be held upon the high tide. Most of whom, and most of less, they came from the main mass and appeared to stretch. Without wonder they asked for no more than what was needed of their worth. Some would even go as far as to crush their own lots and inflict some sever rations, thrown against their faces. Fed by the disgraceful army-lot porridge, they walked with empty bellies filled with food that only ate their bones. Fealty was not needed as they knew they would not shoot each other in the back. Hard to see, as from their uncanny lepers, there was not one but two of them who made the cross.

Off into one of the many hills they leapt, without disgrace, no medals, generals of death which wore their skulls underneath their helmets. Most of whom appeared to be of a distant defiled, mostly enabled piece of the making, most of them appeared to remember the chains, which dragged the keeper beneath the earth as their ascension was denied even before they managed to prove their worth. It was impossible to keep up after a while. But most of them knew where they were headed and felt no sympathy for themselves, nor for the others. As they pushed on, threading not like lovers but lenders who lack compassion. It was well earned, of no worth. Time had asked of them to give up upon their slouchy bones and leap inside the hills.

Mostly on a whim, he asked.

And Rope could not be tried. He only wanted not to be denied, in a matter of sprinting through the masked and lasses. In memories of young days, where a lad would dream of having them, he only thought of a single one and married her. Only to wake up in this chaotic space inside the hill, where nothing looked like the other places and only seemed to draw them farther in, where it was unnecessary to fight or strive for more and one shouldn't. He wanted to pull off everything off the skin which was his suit, the uniform he wore, the dog-tag saying, 'Tomorrow Morn.'

And that's when finally, Rope got to speak. He looked with no compassion and seemed to have joined the leap. Here and there, cutting the men below him like shades of butter, frogs were in the sky. Most of who were accompanied by fox-heads and other animals which were cut just so they would match the form of the frogs as they would come back to life. Again, they sang of no retreat. Waking up at the feet of knowledge, as most of them were only linked by long-strings which only made it so, that only the knowledgeable knew what seemed to be inside every shimmer of an alcove, the light which drained itself through each strand. For every wire bore in it the fraction mind and the rest of the bodies from which the new-animals were made out of. It appeared that from every piece of fox, a long twenty-five centimetre long snake-line pushed out at the middle of the bottom ear had been eaten at the base, only to reveal the growth and the push of a bigger head which leaped around and seemed to have no other feature, yet it pushed cylinders out of itself, which formed the planar legs that opened in order to draw the air in. And at the rounded flat end of the cylinder, the holes looked like some tiny mouths of some lost distant creature whose eyes would not fathom being anything but some tiny legs that were only pushing on as hard as they could in order to glorify the stingers that came out of them.

And smaller accesses grew on each. The preacher came out of one of the cylinders as a voice. The sermon of foxes would be heard.

'For our kind will survive.'

But his voice was cut as he looked upon them with non-existing eyes. They were animals no longer, ochre darker, mixed with raw sienna, dirt engulfed and looking like they were old piped, rust embed on top of that. With all the cracks inside their hard-heads and bloated, from which the winds could only be inflated even more with the amount of meat which poured out. And with every cord, some of them, that may as well be called the satellite-points, there came the others as they were drawn in to form the blockers. Like mines placed inside of water-stoppers, there past a lone lighthouse, where the watch of men turned blindly upon them, punished for looking for too long. Not too bold now, but cold-blooded as to the suffering they could not spare themselves off. It could only be this way.

‘I have failed in preserving the nature of my species. What is there left for me to strive for?’

He didn’t answer, nor could he care, as Rope only seemed to dare look at the hills in the most peculiar awe of hearts, he could not fathom looking back, nor would he have spared himself, of looking through. And in sinew, through making, he looked for a single way out.

‘Make it through, I need to make it through.’

‘You won’t. The hills have asked of you and have already commanded that you may join them, even though you may not suspect, or might direct of see eye to eye with them, there’s still a chance.’

His heart raced but he had not dared stay for too long, it was something he could simply not do. The world out there was abhorrent, but here, it was naught. Just what was this place and why were they being brought in it?

There was still a way through. The scent of rum passed him, at the cue. Other soldiers rounded themselves, and more had come from distant lands. This place was far worse than expected. No cold attempt in the making. Sector eighteen forty six, of the main section of the compound, the upper-top region which stood about the curve, which disregarded the other rooms below. It was hard to see and even harder being around so many places at once but he would do it. For now he was one of the creatures responsible for making sure that everything was in its place.

A wild one he seemed. The other guy with him, large comical grin, a face held by sticks from a body that looked somewhat, partially if not entirely the way it’s been, mechanical, of no greater or lesser use. It pushed out of him when needed, and seemed to bear another smaller soldier’s upper torso which was being stored for later usage. That’s what kept him walking, stalking, never asking, or else he would be asked as well. In his company there was only this, the need to avoid asking questions. Those would not do, especially since there was the lack of trust between them which passed the trough.

‘Carry him over for a while. I think I’m going to make great use of him later. If you don’t mind the trouble, make sure the other bodies are being taken as well. We wouldn’t like to have too much trouble because of it.’

And they were piling up, all of them seemed to have been made out of pure desperation. Recycled bodies being somewhat acceptable, it was the only thing they seemed to be bearing and sharing between them. It only had to go that way. A head was chopped, and one was brought and the Porpot, who seemed to jiggle his sticks could only push another one out and another one followed about ten seconds after, when a nest only came as well. In it, for what seemed to be twenty eggs, there was one rotten, one forgotten and one which appeared to be shaped like a cubical, spherical pole-mace, which increased its size to a wider fit at the top-most reach, through which it poured out the smaller ones, the children of benign birds, which only seemed to come out in the passing.

Most of them still-born, nothing was questioned about this process as it would be way too unfathomable to be touched. It brought the inattention, the wreathing speed, the mighty heed, as no one wanted to look after.

‘I want you to take but a corpse. I want you to bring him forth and make sure he’ll live through it.’

He had been passing, past the mass, he wished there was a reason after that. But there wasn't, the orders made no sense whatsoever. They were written by a man with two heads. He had been reputable, but looked like a strangely injected, deathless-gazer, who could not tell for the likes of him what he was staring at, why they were trying it in the first place and how reality came into place. During his advent, there was no end to the exchange between them.

Blood for the plasma, spilled between them when his supervisor wasn't looking, Portpot knew of this exchange, he had witnessed it. And looked gloomily red, around painted cheeks which shot him humbly to the single bite of a disease, he wanted at least this, to warn anyone who was looking 'round and cackling. Yet he found naught and only seemed to spare. No one of.

'What's that now?'

He came, a nomad invader or the reins, in quiet, a Mongol who seemed to spare no one of what he saw and what remained of the old Golden horde which still ran through his veins. His shamanic lord might know the better, but he had sipped in and lost his temper. In the echo of lost dark-clouds, he leaped at his leopard, with the knife in one hand and the spear-shaft, the arrow laughter. He felt beneath him, like an anchor which deepened the disaster. And all the while he felt to his knees, begging for his sickly-looking sticks not to be removed from his neck, the body being largely archaic. With him being lost in thought, it only gave the start for trying to put one down. He couldn't do it after that.

Not while he could face the cold, the sight they would push through him as well as everything which went forth.

'I've killed your master, this jungle of metal is mine.'

'Spare me, then, and I shall be your servant if I can.'

He had no word, not leper's cry. He didn't want to die and the Mongol only looked as if he was readying himself as if to try. And in between, as much as they'd know, there was no hope for the master to leave him past the throng. Not on his willing feet, not to understand what went through him.

'Face it now, I shall disembowel you if you make the wrong move. Need you know lesser and think even so. But I can simply tear out your shell as if it's nought, you'd better sow and face the vile truth.

You're nothing but a poor-minded and less hinder-sighted slave. Nothing needs to be spoken of you as it will only be a better hue that'll be decided.'

Thence he looked out of his prisms. And looked upon the colours which were projected upon him, through the hue, thence the coming of a read and sienna, he had to try. With a single flash, which only crudely touched him as well as it could, at last, he released nothing but a cold running oil. In need to be used by the desperate as they would only see it as a way to cut through him.

As well as he would rejoice.

'I've marked you now, and that's the only thing you should be focusing on, there's no need for desperation. No attrition may due. As long as you're in my service, there shall be no need to starve as you're coming through.'

He took only after himself and gave no explanation to what was going around. They shouted at both of them, which only drove them further away, through their places and in the back. Spotted, looking at what he's done. A hot iron poker had marked him as a servant, Mongol only laughed at it as he had no clear desperation to his name. He felt nothing and achieved just as much by looking at them. Plain windows stranding, no one watched them row, as swollen as the sea would be, neither of them came forth to ask.

'We need to identify both of you before we can allow you to set forth. How does that sound for either of you?'

'It's fair enough, wouldn't you say so.'

Portpot was not desperate, yet he lied. He defied all logic and only fended for himself, after asking what went wrong through them.

And they were both dreaming it alive. Waves of electrons shooting around every possible edge of the place until someone who was viscous came from beneath the ground, the earth, the part of the waves which were pushing around them, from each side. A counter wave appeared, crisscrossing the other. Inside of them, at least two other fearing-lovers, who were levitating from their pits, bore nothing but their frailness as they floated from inside the abyss. Down there, many like them followed. Completely annihilated or barely formed as they were, dust forms came to life. Like tiny particles which pushed into the middle, they only drove each other out. In there and out, they could not fathom staying for long. One could see them as the after image during a flash photograph being taken which only complimented their dark figures and the accumulation they seemed to hold onto. No telling could say of what their bodies were, nor of what was going or what their minds conveyed.

Had they dreamed the place instead? They walked. In gross and even grosser forms, with every second passing, they only drove the part from hiding, looking even more human as they rose and walked so. But they only took the legs and wore them instead. Fancily displaying, taking seconds as to stand. Bearing only the least delightful praying, as they shoved the lights off, this had happened, only a few meters off the painted disasters, which explained their apparition. A condition of the disturbed mind, one of them brought only kindles with him. Cradling it, instead of painting the blind off the quiet.

'What was going on today?'

'What had happened yesterday of course, have you missed it already? Do you not know what's going on out there?'

It was a miracle in the making, neither of them knew what was going on. They were too tired to walk and were only standing on legs that didn't belong to them but to the Feud. The Feud was there, only a few hundred miles below, nearing the point where one could draw the road to the ship. And danger rang as the throng of the people and the humans could stand to emerge. Out of agony they could be reformed and they could live again without the hope of trying to live again. Bastards of no buildings, those who did not belong, unwanted.

'I wish I could meet this Feud, I'd have so much to tell him if I only knew where I could find him.'

'Never wont and never want for more, he's dangerous after all.'

‘So what? I could handle him if I wanted to, there’s no need for me to put you through it. I would thread on and meet him on my own.’

Though the Feud was made out of eight spherical glowing, expanding cylinders which seemed to be constantly switching placed. Outwardly, it pushed out all of limbs it took from the adjacent areas from which there was no reason to push in and look. Everyone who died appeared to have been dragged by the presence underneath. And they were abandoned into rooms no one entered, as they were completely sealed from the way above. A great system, which only signalled the distress, not to confess for too long now, but there was no one left to impress with what was going on. Only a loaf would think of it otherwise, let alone make the case.

But blue was the colour of staying and the halls were only flashing green in the eyes of Portpot, who could not be taught either, that he desperately needed to confirm himself as being alive.

‘I wish I could tell you that, strange being, but I don’t know myself. A slave’s life is not a life worth living. Nor is there a chance that I may be alive to begin with.’

‘What do you think of me then? I am a Mongol.’

Though he alone was unnatural, he looked benign. As a matter of fact, he was anything, if tried for counting, natural, but the common ancestor of some dreadful beast which would serve out of light.

‘I seem to have thought so as well.’

In the waves there was the scum-trough, which only brought the world of Plunhesse back in, a stinger pushed through, he would face the Feud and talk to him.

Firs the Mongol and his servant, right before Plunhesse spoke. He could not be met by anything either, as the consequences would be far too dire to get through as well. No one understood.

Plunhesse spoke through their bodies, malignantly so.

‘Mongol, that’s who you are.

Your name rings familiarity.’

‘But I am not Mongol, but a Mongol of the Golden Horde.

I shall be called as who I am, I claim the name Han of the North.’

The location seemed to check in, though that would be unpleasantly, a coincidence, from which he sprouted. Dated like no matter-spun, he spoke about it no longer, none. It made no difference and it had made less sense. He was distressed and knew not what was going on, nor whom to ask or why they were pushing on.

‘I shall ask of you this then. You need not do any heavy sweating or make it so as if you’d please. But needn’t bother in the making, I will smash your head in.

I will smash your head split open if I have to. Even with these weak bodies, I will smash your head in and I will make your slave clean you off with his tongue until your boots are wrung upstairs. And until you're beaten off to an inch of coming back to life.

With your head being completely smashed around every single wall inside the Compound, have I made myself understood? ‘

‘Did I say something wrong then? What did I say?’

‘You didn't have to say anything, I only wanted to make sure you know what the stakes are. And I will completely dominate this place and in order to do so I need to make sure you're cripple. I can't do it other wise.’

He stepped in, and the Feud came as well. From the looks of it, there was an entire building which formed, through the bodies of the dust-particles which only united themselves to the pit they came out of. And there were many hands coming out of open windows. All of which had big stretched arms which only started pounding around the place and the walls. As heavy as they were strong, they pulled long knives and broad swords and claymores from inside their apartments. Even the Feud was just as surprised as everyone else who was present and was looking at it. He wanted to smash them in, both Han and his slave. But they didn't say anything out of place.

‘You know what? I don't need you to be alive any longer, I will curb-stomp you if I will it so. I will push you around and I will smash your body, hence I will it so.’

Then he grabbed both of them with what seemed to be a strength and a force and speed unmet. Both of them got immediately stabbed, their bones were smashed. Han lost his right arm while the left arm had no fingers to make it so. Both of them were held by a pair of arms while the others were used to beating them until they got nosebleeds and their livers started pushing out of the slits which had been made in their bellies. After that they were thrown, picked up, thrown and left in a corner, abandoned as they no longer wondered.

‘Neither of them lives any longer, we can call that a case closed.’

Then he approached the Feud. He watched the creature wreathe in the atrocity which was disease and asked for nothing yet.

‘What happened to this place then? I shall only ask this of you?’

‘There's been something here and something there and something just about everywhere. But I don't think there's a single reason, or a culprit for what happened.

Whatever lays outside is beyond our reach.’

And he knew that well enough as he had no peace of mind, nothing of his own. He wanted to watch it again, so, instead of taking his time to come up with some excuse, he simply went around the halls, picked a few men which were lost inside the Compound and threw them in front of him. All of those limbs appeared to function with or beyond the will which was being spread between them, out the bringer, then the quiet.

Plunhesse only wanted to wait. He could not fathom looking away. He needed something to make this inspection of the Compound worth it, only so far, he found himself picking up on the lower beings.

‘I won’t shy away from killing if I have to. There’s a lot more I can still do here. Don’t make me though, or I will kill just about everything I can.’

He’s done so. Eight men, thought not them, they weren’t soldiers, danced to the tune, they were strung and shunned as they would find none of this too amusing. One was strewn, accosted, shown pain. While the others were pointlessly tortured, one thing was still way too constant to actually matter. He appeared there, out of the wave.

The hues and the waves were not made by Han and Pot, instead they remained no matter who was there. It could not have been any other way, nor made it worth. They looked forth. He flied, with a white porcelain sack instead of a head, small black eyes which looked like Turks in slits of eights, all of which looked as if they wore their hairiness inside the iris, the bug wings and all the legs, through the slits of their surroundings. And the white-headed creature, of which arms were not present could only bear itself to be completely stuck of a flying shell, made out of the bodies of the strange servants that worshipped in during a time where pagans ruled the site. It was dreadful, listening to them.

He wanted to be gone, out of there, to a more peaceful place. Yet he called himself Preppe, and he bore only slits of the wrists, vertically made, instead of a mouth. No shout could alarm him, for his arrival was long expected, earned and looked after. It was a painful condition, to look through and missing it would mean sinew.

‘And who might come now and disturb both the Feud and Plunhesse?’

Both seemed to think, though there was no certain need to make it be heard out loud. They shied away but pulled out the nostrils of long-lost ages, through the makings of the disturbed.

Preppe only showed himself the tie of dirt and both of them were silently back to their own doings. As well as they would butcher as much as they could. It was a necessary act they could not pull away from. Feud had only thought of rough, as he couldn’t make it past one of the cracks in the walls, the ones that moved every single time one touched them. And they could only walk behind. An echo would be faintly-heard. As it happened for there to be no chance for a man to return, this was an exception.

He had to make sense of his legacy. Though Filler took the place of Ringer, he could think of nothing less than the strange confession his brother would pass onto him as soon as they were out of the earshot. He was contemplating on something, the camera he left behind. A few shots may have been enough for anyone to make it, but nothing made sense. And it was peculiar, since wasn’t that dense to begin with, only that he couldn’t have it. He would not have it any longer, mostly because he had grown weary of everything. Losing track of time. Make something of the shot.

It was one of the moments they shared, being caught inside the room with the caged monkeys. Anyone else in their place would’ve thought it somewhat useless, or painlessly obscure. It was something they refused to acknowledge, both the presence and the armoured one who seemed to come from time to time, regardless of the floors and the benign ceilings that were shared between the rooms and between the sightings. He alone would make it.

Still, he seemed to have no trace of ink on him. Knowing Ringer, he would've bothered him again, until he came up with another lie, only to avoid bearing another argument. Every single time, they didn't know how to fix it, that was clear. And since he was missing, out of the picture, there was also no dating on the envelope, nothing on the shot and not even his wrist as cut. As he remembered sometimes, then, back when he grabbed a single finger, he pushed past it and found himself cut. Every single time, and the rooms were empty, as were the halls. Both of them could not make it out. They couldn't make out what was going on, and for some reason, he only thought what he was thinking.

It felt as if he had taken his role, but he could not look around and search for more. Nothing would make any sense, as long as he was there, nothing would.

'I need to get rid of the pictures.'

Finger, that would be fitting. Since he was wearing his uniform, he stopped, stepped aside and almost put out an entire jug of water's worth out of his mouth. That was it. His mind was not strapped onto looking, nor could he get every shot in order. Twenty of them lay, all of which appeared to convey no more than the first scene, or a deviation from that and a leap from in-between them, doing their business when he wasn't around. For his own sake, he returned to the room they initially looked for a retreat in. And for a time, it was pleasant being there. Pleasant as in being wrong, he couldn't shake it away, nor would he want.

'I wish you were still here. To see the dead monkeys if anything. I think that will highlight just how low this place had become. I didn't think I'd make it, but I have.'

He also got his only revolver. Sweating, heavily, and it's only been twenty minutes or so of walking. It was by no means easy for him to accept what was going on there, to make everything which went through his head make sense.

The monkeys, look at the monkeys. You need to force yourself to look at them, now. He couldn't, it was hard felt, moving took something out of him. Tired legs could not walk back during a time when he desired them not to be his any longer. Instead, he looked for a reprise, and finally, he noticed their demise. He could see them through the bars and through the walls, and through the air, as if they were also caught in there. But he couldn't explain, the weird shapes through which they had all been thrown and ripped apart, yet still were of one piece. Until from the distance, and from the right angle, upon being looked upon, one could see their monkey dance, torn out of their ribs, and put back, piece by piece. Worn out and pushed through, lost to the hue, as they could not fathom living through the sinew, they stopped. Only for a moment, could he see an eye turn back, still caught in that initial shock.

And before he knew it, he saw the entire room for what it was, and how it had been completely torn apart, with the mercy of putting them out of terror. It hadn't stopped.

For every single one of the subjects had been pulled inside one of the cracks, slowly as the rest of the ceiling was drawn back, to whichever hole they would push themselves towards.

During that strange abyss, through which the levitation could only piece him back, piece by piece, it felt like his eye would only blink for a single second. As he wished no more, finally he would be dragged and ask for no more.

Yet he wreathed across the bridge, as he lunged, as he tried to piece it back together, as it happened. With him taking the first leap, only to find out that he was missing. Though, to his unfortunate mistake, he had survived by a mistake, being caught by leg, wrapped against one of the many railings which made it the way it. Before he was pulled by the other people who were sitting adjacently to one of the side-bars meant to prevent these kind of incidents from happening, he was met by them and face no one.

There was the patch of green where he pushed out air, poured out water, as for a single moment he lived, again. He was still nowhere to be seen and for the first time he realized just how much he missed him. The two of them had come together there, and he was lost without his guidance, towards anyplace, or anywhere.

Roses lay in the water, of a wild desaturated turquoise. And amidst them, a single blue snake, a serpent. Split just as he walked, until the white foam of the water drowned in its blue blood. Until nothing had remained of the water and the cold froze his wont, he wandered. Alone, now unattended, with no one around to pass any kind of judgement, he chose to pray. Passing a small temple, with its cheddar gate twisting in a single knot, the cross being somewhat too old, in the only place he seemed to had been brought to. He felt no evil in heart, but knew that couldn't be right.

There was a priest in the temple, waiting for him to return from the storm. Yet, as he stepped, he felt it again, he saw his finger and this place, just as they were. Forced to belong, but slowly pushing him out before he could make out whom that truly was.

Twenty hours still remained.

And he still had a gun on him, a missing man.

It was outdrawn, and fully loaded, with the same dosage being split, across his hand, body and finally across his forehead, in the shape of a scar. Not a normal one, but one of a failed surgery which could put up no longer with the stress that was being forced upon him.

Nostrils in the cold, uncanny hall, he had nothing dear to hold on.

This was always supposed to end up this way. Since he never stood a chance to push himself out of his way before it all started, he turned it on himself and enacted the only humane act he could think at this time. With everyone abandoned, and without a chance to fail, he finally understood what it took to be a man.

An echo was lost through the halls, during which there was no presence around. And no obscure and nothing pure, and no one to be understood, it was simply the sound of a heart that would beat no more. Filled with the echo, the generators, for one moment stopped as all lay in silence. 'This is the turn of the century, and it can only be described as nothing else but a success. To that, my dear friends, I tell you, we must hold a toast.'

'And what if I cannot hold anything, me arm is broken.'

'Out with you, on the streets, you shall be a street-sweeper from now, cheerio, go ahead, don't join us any longer, we have no need of little people like you.'

The young lad was then kicked in the arse and killed, thrown on the streets where a real street sweeper did his actual job as he cleaned up after everyone. They were not going to make it, not after a while. Hard-headed, yet at work, they were not ready to put it past him. Sweeper of streets, a killer of sheets, in which he hid the corpses, all of whom approached him.

‘Poacher, are you nowadays? Think we could have you around a jiffy old cell if you make too much of your round?’

‘I beg your pardon?’

‘I could apprehend you for loitering around the place. And I cannot have the dust-bunnies.

The dust bunnies are in my head.’

He looked at the man, and he was not right. His right hemisphere of the world was missing, which made him looked deranged. After all, he had a leathery gut-planet inside his body, sticking out of his shoulder, forearm, ribs, and a part of the lower side of his body. Mostly taken by the gruff, he wanted to look sad but failed. His planet had no natives, instead he had a lot of burial grounds which were all filled with the births for everyone who’s ever died in it. Fended against disquiet, he wanted to be gone. A brain was missing, he was prime to ask again.

‘Where are me’ bunnies now?’

‘Have you come here to annoy me, sir?’

‘Of course I have, there’s nothing I’ll look after other than that. I only want to take a single cackle out of you and then I’ll be on my way. There’s something else to your right.’

A curtain blind which looked as if it pushed right out, right out of a corner, which left the close disorder which inhabited the Isles.

‘And another toast for everyone. I fold no hand and wish you all a better year that might lay ahead for all of you.’

To say the least, he had at least accommodated everyone who travelled forth, though they might be made out of no lesser and thorough worth. First of the families moved in, asking for nothing in return. They’ve been stimulated in their heads, and it wasn’t worth asking, just what happened to them. Only a foolish mongrel.

And mongrellic races became weird trinkets that floated above their heads. Several coloured realities came into view. No one should talk about it, how they started pushing out.

Drooling out of their largely exposed mouths. Through small riding motorcycles, vehicles which were attached to their back of their heads made out for the fact that their bodies were no longer there. Instead they were not meant to be there. Anywhere, one could look, the open space looked like the site of a barely constructed world, which had its flaws, awakened and thrown around, as the pillars shook even the riders. Many of them were marked around their faces, soon picked up by flying magnetic-pole hook coloured in a deep purple-violet, from which many other flying torsion made out of centipede-barrels which had their backs inflated with rock-like giant balloon-fat ingots which were melted together and formed various mirrors that were used to recreate the smaller aspects of the world in them. Through each surface, a sight of the reverse, crippled walking cycle of a man could be seen.

Blue bipolar fighters ripped out their faces in a fight. In another one, eighteen of them appeared and disappeared in the matter of a few seconds, as many other lights started turning everything in a giant formed turbine. A blood-box and a box of steel melted together, outside the centipede-barrel formation which appeared not only to float but it drove itself into one of the giant cages which bore all the unsatisfactory destroyers who inhabited the evil world.

One of them had been impaled by the body of the centipede barrel, which forced him to bleed out of his eyes, with the organ-green-blue of puddles which poured. Drowning more men as they could not fathom worshipping so many wild things which happened around them, which in turn grated what appeared to be the part of the ceiling made out of wild long-twisted cables, cutters, spinning turbines and other various almost, nigh-metallic prototypes which pumped in and out, everywhere around the great rounded circle which stood completely out of place in the room.

It looked like a single drop of lime, that only expanded as soon as the mechanical hands reached inside and pulled out the only one. A single servant, of the reverse world, for he had an arm sticking out of his arm and eight legs on the left side of his body. Pushing on around himself, as he appeared again as the belt around the satellite eye, which came out of the sky and entered the building, trying to push everything out of live.

And despite the size of the road which was there as well, though it had been completely contained to the room, there were other people on the track, not only the ones on their motorcycles, of which bodies suddenly appeared inside the barrel centipedes, those being spots of storage. There was dread amongst them, as they came. Dread which pushed out of their bodies, as the red coloured blue containers appeared in the giant ugly eyes, they were driving smaller compartments not meant to be used for this slamming and the breaking of everything which even had the most remote surface. So many people had been lynched by gravity.

They called the people who were killed 'The Peoples of the Apples.'

For each apple was rotten and appeared to be the meal of giants, bloated outside and made out of the body of eighteen others who happened to be around when the contortionist of dreams appeared. He made giant fruits out of living beings, then animals, then solitary citadels which were placed around the place, but never too close to the cages. Even he feared what might happen if the cages peered. And leered at him, in the absurdity which was reality, a smaller chamber appeared to lay inside his belly. It was dark in it and after a while, someone like him could know what the reason for it was. Twenty-pole like controllers moved constantly inside of it, making it so he did and would not miss a single beating, his pump being a rotten heart. It would give away to the darkness which followed one of the miserable crowns.

He would be named king by his people of which race, there was no disgrace in, asking for a chance. He was mad in some way, for asking help. But he could not be held accountable for all the evil in the world had come not from the working levers in his gut, or the smaller people which entered him at that, but he encouraged it once. For that he would suffer after. In solitude and in wonder, he looked around only to see the strangest things happening. People stopped poking around where they had no business being in. A shroud of many lacerations on their bodies prompted no retreat. They fed themselves with rocks and bled, the men were not meant for this place. Nor for the walking machines, which were half-made in bodies of rock-heads and other deranged structures which were sculpted to look as if they had been taken out of the sky despite not being a part of it.

Grates all around the place, looking mightily barred, spiked and worn out. So much metal had accumulated rust that it could only be that the water brought in there hardened to iron. Other kind of insolent mandible-like sharp glass blades erupted from the earth, vibrating with a rage that coloured the surroundings in pure white. What a delight, seeing them alive again. Frogs and toads were worn at toes, by a simpleton who appeared to have his head replaced by two broken monitor holders, only the supports. Lesser things only pushed inside his throat, where he stored the fat.

Moisture erupted from the lower tunnels, some of them being brought. In the making of their darkness, faded, there was another light that was no light, produced by a rotating limb, which looked inhuman but closer to some animal appendage from another world. Pulling in all light from everywhere around it, there was the strange sky which only crept through, until it left nothing to be discovered from sight.

It took all the light and left some patches of the walls, ceiling, the cage and just about everywhere it went as discoloured as they could get. After that point, it disappeared into a flat lower level, kept beneath the earth, a storage facility keeping everything working. Filled entirely with obscure detective-like figures who had their faces replaced by longer ones that melted and appeared on their chests. Constantly they would drip their features until beneath them, on the floor, at this point having gone past their ankles, there would be a pool of them and of their features. But never would they disturb anyone, until one day, some of them dreamed that they were living another man's life. Most of whom woke up from the dream.

Every single of saw a flash of shades that pushed them in, deeper into dirt, no one would be of any lesser worth. They could only stay there for this long until losing what they had of the great lives they lived through. It was nothing but a miracle that they were here, in this weird cage. There was no way to reach the ceiling, unless they completely managed to flood it. And it would seem like they would.

But the power generated by their dreams and the confusion only powered the device which helped on expanding the room, which was above them, as it would turn into what seemed to be the larger body of a malignant colossal, wider leviathan, more so than one. Fully gone through the evolution process, where his bones would not be recognisable any longer. Fruit flies were being shared and eaten for no reason by what were giant men. With straws coming out of bloated holes inside their mouths, filthy, filthy and gotten rid off. Straws would even pump themselves, a strange foam that would liquefy everything in order to be properly digested. Feeding now on weird mammal-oxygen which was solid with fat, as it erupted out of a wider range of serpentine-head stoppers, attached to the servants which moved on.

Large servants moved ahead, eight feet, two on each side of the quadruped, revealed a longer chest like that of a plant, of which trunk, and head, and legs and hands, that of a man, coming in eight as well from every side. And a head for each direction, leaving more than sixteen of them, smaller than usual, yet interconnected. Static-like flashed of gray dots, spots or other check-board patterns inside their eyes.

Inside their open mouths, the long strangling formations would only give birth to square-eggs which floated and pushed open as they would become formations of largely clustered limb-stones, adding to the greater floating piles which followed the flashing limb around. During that chase, these servants made sure that no one was harmed, during their incantations, they would be heard somehow. Not to make too much noise, not to appear to parasitical, instead they mourned and asked for no less than what was owed to them.

A need for peace and something that might give them something to strive for when the time approached and this diseased spot faded. To the gray-looking wilder-spots, which were shaped in form by peculiar water drops, on a wild corner, here he stood. One of the servants who looked around, misunderstood his place and what went on.

So many flashing colours came onto his retina. Two irises started going from one direction to another. A brotherless creature, in need of a disciple of his own. Her didn't ask, nor was he given, he was asked and pushed around, with hope. And every shaped giant tear-drop which came from one of the clouds, for what was worth had holes everywhere in their weirdly concave walls, through which he looked. He shook as well as he could. It went deeper into each direction, as those holes were unnatural. Someone dug them through and they could only push even deeper than that, as they wasted no second, the creatures that made them had tiny fragmented houses of their own.

And they were no Ouroboros-snakes or no giant worms but fatter things which only dragged along as they came forth from every possible corner, making everything, uniformly pushed, from every side of their bodies there being smaller outposts with giant drills and longer thin knives on each side, allowing them to dig even further inside and out. Pushing through everything, as they would set; the order had to be maintained and dragged around, the leper would know best.

As in each of them, these pseudo outwardly fragmented buildings which were not cylindrical but came in a strange legged formation, there lived many communities that shared their lives together and sometimes interacted when the hole builders took breaks for the people inside of them to make whatever they could do out of everything which happened around them.

Lowering bridges even as they passed from one side to another, sometimes the people would trade or exchange goods or even share people, which were being loved.

'I wish I could wed you when the time is right and when I shall be given you forever.'

'Dear me, dear me, but what shall I do if I am not to be offered your greatest kind? I would be indebted to you for another time and wish for nothing more than my hand being given to you, I hope, I hope I will end up making a great wife.'

Therefore they exchanged hands and moved from one side to another, while carrying and exchanging their dead as well. Various coffins had been brought and made great use of.

'And who shall speak in his name then, during a time like this when one could not trace the vales and put them into a spot, for I see nothing that's broken about this law.'

As the lawmaker spoke only of the most terrible thing, an utmost peculiar ward of text in which, it had been declared that every man in the nation, whether fathering a child or nigh, should die by the end of the sun-dove eclipse. To which they'd bathe and wake up in the night, as when it came not a single soul would be able to face the reigns and the destruction of soul that came with it, at last.

‘Allow me to introduce myself, as I am the man of the House of Hulno.’

Right above and ever farther, past the piece of land, on the opposite direction but even farther than where the anchor lay. For the anchor which guided the direction, as no compass would, there stood, in place, the rat-entity, that crept and stood. In place, it would refrain from walking, stalking only the most insatiable of kin. But never leaving the crops in making, though of that they'd never speak.

Instead, it seemed, in that small patch. Upon the place they stood and latched upon and never called, the blasted thing, the quiet, strong. An access of land and peril pushed, used by the most vile, that didn't matter.

Only this meeting had, and they could only sit hit and ask for a resolve.

In less than the time of making, the men had gathered around the council, only to discuss and wonder.

‘What will happen when it comes? And what of it then, who shall put us down when the time shall soon arrive? I could not fathom looking anywhere I could not look to, I could not fathom that such a law compels us to die.’

‘But it shall, and I am not to be blamed for it.’

‘Were you not the one who wrote it in the first place, Lawmaker?’

‘I was, but my intention was unclear, my mind was not here. I mean there, my mind wasn't anywhere when that piece of law was written.

My fingers were ants, my toes were termites, I could fathom no less than I was and looked like a hive. As they fought inside of me and spread around, I can only admit to this. It was them, and it was no one else, but them and their making that pushed me to commit.’

With little doubt left for you to seek, I must admit that I found myself, wildly attached, to the knife I will use to slit your throat before this hearing ends. Oh Bastard, I know you, I know of you, peril in the making. I wish I could put an end to your voice, to throw you out on the streets and voice my misgivings when you needn't be called no longer; I shall have you, that much is true and by the time I came upon your throat. He thought for a moment more, and he could only come as near as he would before having himself gotten rid off.

His men bore no respect for him any longer. It felt as if he was forgotten.

Four way pint crossing

He was not of the lot. He was born a man who was meant to do something with his life, yet he was born with a conjoined twin attached to him. They would be unable to achieve anything in that manner, since, for the sake of their own wrongdoing, both of them dragged each other down, with no guilt or shame shared between them, out of the bottom of their hearts. It was an uncanny thing, seeing them act under the name of their master, who he, himself was yet another creature like them. It was just that way with defects, or errors of nature as they called them. For the same reason other people resolved to stick with their own kind, so had they, taking it to the whole new level where some may have proclaimed a level of servitude that may have been somewhat unachievable in every other way. In that case he rose.

Corot and Pinto, both of them were unknown as to survive the birth, yet sightings of them around the area where the car-docking occurred was by no means unheard of. Corot was the one that was taller, and appeared to have his face contorted in the back, leaving only one eye working, while Pinto had been all bones, all of which protruded out of his mandible, his shin, thighs and even toes. Many of those extra additions were rather too sharp to be touched, going as far as to bear the strange appearance of charred bones and tiny pricks instead of working on towards resealing the wounds, Pinto looked like he was a corpse that was mistake to being alive.

And what kept them together were some seals of metal that were pinned onto them with bolts. Mostly electronics attached to them as well, making their general stature be dwarfed some more.

A man of no words, he stumbled upon them during the night, in his dire mission to find out where the dreadful noise was coming from. He was delighted to find out that whatever he was searching for was somewhat ill-founded, as he had little to no desire for such an encounter as with them to take place. They were wreathing, out of their nostrils, acting way too primal to be defects of a man. Instead, they grew, right there in front of him, with no shame whatsoever, displaying only the most dreadful of twists, as they became alike to a pillar or to some greater horn-like toe that came from the volcanic depths of the earth. Yet they could only display so much magnificence as they showed their skin to be not unlike tar, but of a blue, which got even closer to the purple and the skin they shed as they pushed through. And the deeper shades, the fairer they got.

With their brittle belt no longer working, yet in doubt they looked for no excuse, instead they chose to push themselves, and crush whatever came through them during the time they were in the bloating quiet. Through which they ate meat from clouds, as a much larger extension like that of a man climbing on an invisible ladder pushed himself out of their backs and made the rain fall. With drops of slit veins and thorn out face, a disgrace like him could not face the others now that he's been mistake for some divine being.

Other citizens came and begged, as haggard as they looked, neither of them could refrain from doing so. That should settle any kind of exasperation from being spread amongst the clouds. Now that they weren't used any longer, the servants could only come out of their lives and make it so they were being listened. Some of their frames were being benign. It was peculiar, how someone could look so peculiar, let alone an entire town. Many of them shared a common shape of their heads and limbs which appeared to be pushed in together by weirdly growing balloons, until their limbs and everything else bore that strange concave, convex and in-between curved, for every toe and every facial feature and everything pushing out as well. Rubber light-bulbs, that was as much as it could be said about them. Dreaded, dreaded thing, it tried whispering at the most inopportune time.

When the flying kites bore they angelic grace-like flowering fireflies, of which whiteness only grew and told, a story of old as they only gave themselves to him. Would there be anything even more disgraceful than that?

Pinto only rots now. He doesn't think of much since his brain had a tiny bone pushing through and taking away every memory he had of his brother during the times. They were of a different song, they could not listen, nor would they be worn out by what was going in. A song, for him, rather a chant.

'I brought you something, beauty of evil that I serve. Have my first born and do with him as you please, as I have no need of him no more.'

But Corot was annoyed by such an insult. This was something he would not have. To sacrifice the young to petty fools that misinterpreted who he was? He spat on the side and whisked him away. Not to make it even more obvious but he spoke in their tongue and asked for him not to be seen around him for as long as he could live and get out of his way.

'Don't do it, Karm Sutor, don't give up our child. You can't sacrifice your own flesh and blood, you heard them, they don't even want it.'

'One of them didn't, but I didn't hear the other head disapprove of it. I think there's something there.'

'Will you leave my son alone? I want my son, give me back my son already, you bastard.'

'He is my son and shall do to him whatever I please, now be gone woman and clear the beds, I am expecting guests for the evening and I am not to be disturbed no longer.'

'You are making a terrible mistake Sutor, I love my son and I would not let a single strand of his hair be touched by you.'

'Are you seriously pointing that gun at me woman? Have you no shame whatsoever? Put it down, now. I am your husband and the man of this house, and I will not have it in the least.'

Sutor dared approach despite knowing that his child was in the other room, sleeping inside a tiny bed-roll which was encroached in warmth. He was sleeping on top of an Ottoman after all. Before he could reach her arm, she already unloaded the revolver into his chest eight times, with every shot having been split in half, leaving two barrels empty. Sutor fell and bled.

Ark took her son and made away through the night, before the cavalry could step on their horses and track her in the middle of the night. If she rode through the night, she might make it through before being caught off her rails, and into the veins of the mountains, where the passes cut through the prairie, leading to a barge across a great river that lead to the valley after 'morn. Despite the time, she picked only some bread and the kindness of water before they shouted in the night, that they would follow her after. IT was something she would not see, the light was far away, but so was her lay, as each slap against the horse, the hearse pushed her to make the trip at worst conditions than the giant-head.

And thence the giant-head still strung its wings. In the night it pushed out of the bottom of the earth and appeared to steel itself in place. A few paces above the ground, floating in the air as if it were unable to make contact with anything other than the pushing lout which shrouded the sight behind them. Some reeds may have flown, throwing each other past the disappearing fog. Yet a river lay there dry, as a hole of murk that hardened, with all the frogs and fish suffocated through the small weedy straws that grew inside of them and started feeding on lungs. It was that way with them, as no one stood witness as to see from every rising body, be it scaled or any other kind, to tell the least they started yearning for each turn. Twist in the makings, the reeds were wings of their own as they attempted to imitate the giant-head servant. Who came and pulled out of their insides, as many as he could try his hands on, all the fish-bread, the frog-bread, even the dragonfly-giant-heads who happened to be there at a most inopportune time.

They were not meant to suffer losses, no disgrace would make it worth. And they could only face themselves no lighter, than to die at their own hands as well as the more. More of the breed, no more quiet, they would heed no one to make noise.

The giant-head servant was someone who had killed his business with the rituals that pushed inside his guts, a whore. She lived in there and ate what he had, like a tape-worm which wreathed in and out, but never stepped out of the confines of her provider. He was set, never to direct his anger to any other place. He wanted to see the appeal, the fear inhabiting each man. Who faced a woman like her, many. At times, someone ended up dead. And stricken down, the fool in making felt nothing for the wheels that shunned him and spoke behind his back, yet set in flight, they could not be dealt with, nor could they be held accountable for something he alone had refused to set in mind. What lay in store, he asked for more and all of the sudden, he woke up from the coming of an endless-gore. The pain of seeing his family left behind, the giant-head was spiked inside, with blades that hanged from every possible corner and every shade and every spot that remained. They would be worn, and better torn, and even lesser, through the shade of a glass urn.

One of them fell from above, and by a slim chance, it managed to have all the hearts inside of it be stored for long enough before it rose, but could not face the pushing throng.

And from beneath the head, a single long spineless thing emerged and pushed out, drooling with as many of them as they could come, unable to defy one another as they crept out. Many hearts lay impaled, but grew on the outside, creating a ladder leading to the head, of whom sympathy gave it the means to climb and set the lesser ones in line.

How did he do it?

With a single slit in his hand, he managed to pull a single hard strain of clotted blood, hanging around the tip of his iron pick like the face of a leper.

I shot him in the head. But the shots only moved through it, pushing through his chest, arm, then at the tip of the fingers until a small forehead leaped out of the top of the pick, bearing all bullets out, leaving the same way. Shooting out of the copy of bone-shrapnel coming out of him, giant-head servant began resuming his ascent. Seeing how most of the horse-rider had come here with nothing else other than a desire to find the child, they could think of no other culprit.

By now the head grew a pair of ribs encompassing the hearts, protecting them from any kind of mild touch or wild interaction that might disturb their pumps. And the head had a single four-stoned, sharp-glowing eye that managed to seduce two of the riders, at least for long enough to make them turn the guns on themselves and release the bolts passing through their brains. It was just as needed, worth of less. Bloody-making and less than likely there was no one there to impress, they had to kill the servant, he had to be wrung around each corner of his ear, as they pointed their revolvers, again at his mouth.

‘Don’t try it again unless you want us to leap on you and eat you for dead.’

‘I think I can deal with you once I’m done feeding my house-pets. But don’t make me come over or I’ll make sure that neither of you will make it through this night.’

‘Enough of your nonsense, I had it just enough with your threats! Tell us where you hid the child and I won’t take that iron pick away from you and shove it up.’

He had no intention of drawing. He knew better than to try away. It could only be that he was in no state of walking onward, neither of them were. Company included, all drunk, showing even fewer emotions than needed, but sharp enough to aim it the right way.

‘Bastards, you killed one of my house-pets. Those are irreplaceable, how dare you?’

How dare you trespass on my property, accuse me of kidnapping that child while killing one of my dears? What give you the right?’

‘I’m sick of talking to you, give us the damn child, give it to us now!’

He went ahead to unload even more chambers, shots, and slugs, from as many guns he pulled, stored behind his smaller horseback. From where he seemed to have even more tricks up his sleeve, many of which came sharper and travelled even faster than his bullets ever hoped to achieved; making it all the worse. He could not understand how this man made it with the child. What could he have done with him in the strange house while the rest of the house was underway, out of the picture, without the slightest doubt or chance to get him past the time.

But every shot only carried his contorted features as to be replicated and dismissed. Some of his animals started feeding on those as soon as they pushed in. And they could only be held down for that long before going rabid, at each other’s throats. Unable to withdraw from what went on around them, as they started spilling out even smaller salmons painted in the color of their insides. They disappeared into the hard-muck and of them nothing was said. Peril of blue, the sky was a hue of purple-pink, with globes colored in light green with a yellow tint, whereas the trees were barely fleshed out, as they looked like the touches of large brushes painted through from above and beyond.

That much had to be. They saw no reason for them to have so many of their lips split. Every single one of them without a single exception, drawing in to twenty days ago, it could not be fathomed, that they would draw in for that look.

Training grounds, to which the cattle were upon their aim. And each arm only took the first shot as to cripple the animals, before they strayed their arms.

‘See, I told you this would do. Suppose’ I’m owed an apology now, if you don’t mind it.’

‘I don’t think so partner, I won’t be taking no excuses to push you around if I have to, but I got nothing to say to you.’

‘I think this will do then.’

‘You don’t want to do that. I know you.

We’ve been riding for months now.

You’re a stingy-shot.’

‘And I’m close enough not to piss on top of a snake if you try me.’

‘Again, don’t make me, It won’t pass through. I’m going to repeat this only once, walk the other way.’

‘SO you could shoot me in the back?

Not a chance, it’s already too late for that.’

‘Then draw.’

They were too close for that as well, a quarter-inch in and he could almost taste led. He had had a meal an hour before. It was something he didn’t want to make too clear. His stomach ache, it was only a black rock in it, terminal. He hadn’t much to live in any case, but the man pissed him off. Two-time Joel, that’s what they called him. And he pissed everyone around. Even if I died now, I would cackle knowing I took him with me. That gave me a pleasure I could not express any other way.

Near them, just about a rock, in the distance, farther away, past the miles, there was an abandoned city they all refused to approach. Nothing more of it shall be said.

He needs to die, I think he’s asking for it, he really is. Should’ve known better than to trust Joel when he started shaking his pocket, picking up what he called an old tobacco “cigar”.

‘A little bit too sharp around the edges than I’m used to. Care to explain?’

‘I think guns are an old man’s rule and I’m still young.

You’re not getting any sharper than you are now.’

‘That’s definitely no way to talk to someone’s whose about to slit your pork chop off boy.’

‘But I’m the one holding the knife.’

‘We’ll see.’

No one else in the training grounds wanted to draw near them. For what was worth, they had already cleared just about everything and made do with butchering the remaining cattle. Some of them would be used later in the day. They were in some manner of speaking sociopathic, infected by the mad-cow disease, with little in doubt of their own. That's how it was around the parts, and there would be no complaints about the pints of pain they fed them on. Many of the cows and bulls didn't have their back legs, but were carried inside some modified troughs which encompassed their entire backs and lower sides. From them, cart-wheels appeared to allow them motions, metal, emblems surrounding them.

That was enough said, for everyone involved to lay shut.

They stepped out of each other's ways and only walked backwardly in an awkward manner. Two toes met, each cut, let them down as they bled during the first day.

The cattle-drought, it starved the province. And the Providence could not be held accountable for all the heads that were being turned on the inside out morning for anyone that might take it out on them. Some of the Providence workers set out with their outposts, trying to look on the roads, making sure the cattle that were being brought in were not contaminated with life. Otherwise, it would not do. Too many mouths to feed everywhere in the place meant that there was no way of separating them.

A side was contaminated while the other was somewhat better, or at least they took some notes of the bovine creatures who made it all in one remorseless trunk they were being carried on top of. Those were the ones which were in the best conditions, otherwise, it could not be called. They were strung and could not get out of the way. Many men were impatient, especially the bandits who attempted blending in with the general crowd. But among the tree-canary, on top the quadruped-wheels that carried them on, stood families storing fat inside the cattle-drums. Inside of which they hid their children's bodies.

Trees were hollow on the outside. Many men had been lynches across the next section of the distant Silk-Man' Boat, that being the main meeting place that took the four-pointed crossing that faced the valley, the distant blue steppes on the other, the wild nimbus covered stray and the wild darkened place, from which no possible end nor beginning could be seen. Nor any forest, or civilization, or anything within its encompassing nature, leaving a feeling of the utmost bizarre nature. One should remain clueless as to what was going on there.

At least one of the bulls didn't make it, with the exception of his horns. Torn apart from whatever vestige had one pushed itself on top.

'We should try making it by summer, think you can keep up with me?'

'I think I can. Why won't you try me?'

'Tell you what, I'll race you past the green and into the orange. We should make it before sun-down.'

They strayed off the road. There was nothing more that needed to be said about them. As they were only a curfew of the small lot they stood in and could only deal with the trauma of waiting in the best way they could. Unlike their ears, they only spoke.

'I can see something out there.'

Said the first man, with a single palm on top of his forehead, that dragged the sky along. It was cold and it was pale. He refrained from speaking of what he saw or the dark shapes that turned around the sun. No one bothered too much with it, for the obvious reason, their hearts weren't there any longer. They rode on mules, not on horses, not as courageous as their ancestors were, no longer aware of whom might look after there by the time they reached the spot where head drew on.

‘I seem to recall you once asking me whether or not I had had home.’

‘You thought of that yet?’

‘I have, but I couldn’t come up with much.’

‘It’s understandable. I feel like that sometimes. They don’t tell you that much when you first pick up a ride.’

And they weren’t seen in their town since the day they rode on distantly set. It wasn’t worth considering what life may have been with them staying as they were. Lost.

Broken submarine

‘Can we stay here, dad?’

‘We can, for a little while, what would you like to do Anna?’

‘I’d like to pull a I’d like to pull a I’d like to pull a.’

‘There, we should find her if we search around, don’t make too much noise now.’

She was as silent as engines. Broke, but unable to work themselves back to life, twenty feet, below the rims of the shaft, a drop of an anchor would break a portion of space, if someone dropped it.

‘We are definitely blessed in more than one way and you should be grateful for it?’

From the back of his head, the fog machines pushed through the bars in what seemed to be an immaculately clean haze smaller bubble-like people walked through them. The bigger ones made out of strange skin appeared on the back. They were blocky and bulky and walked with bones legs that extended in their caterpillar-fat like headings, right beneath the ankles. Whereas, they also bore, heads and legs between each hole that erupted from around their backs, allowing them to connected the cartilage pouring out as a substance would before solidifying in a moment. Allowing them to levitate at will, distracting from the spinning stretched of men that were pushed out of flat spinning round roofs in the form of multiple bat-like winged creatures, all of which tried stretching their faces even longer, until they became almost cylindrically drawn. Their limbs were left hanging out of their cheeks and sockets. But there were also the long legs keeping them in flight. Wings were reunited between legs, arms and cordial substances, many of them being largely at fault for feeding the growing almost curtain-flat parasite that formed in the air. As their energy was only thrown around and spread between the strange aphrodisiac-like haze.

And he rejoice and asked for more.

‘How come I haven’t seen them before? And how may I see them again when the fog ends?’

‘You cannot see them when the fog ends, as I am the dog of this place. The fog remains and stays with me. Leave as you please but follow me.’

He said with a pair of gritty teeth, many of which were pushing out of his neck on every side, every direction, even his chest. From which, open key-like figures started drawing out solid iron throwing stars-like little pantheons that spun. Upon their want, many others started running about in fear. All men had to fear it in order to survive, no matter the costs, one could not handle the pain which embed their tried. Attempts might not please one like him.

‘I, the great Rhuno, shall make it through the misty-haze, and see that hold towards the invisible world you stand guide and guard towards better days.’

‘Know that I ask for a fare spell, that you may throw me in as well. I wish I could sell you a piece of my worthless soul but I cannot tell you, for the sake of missing it, where it might hide.’

Again, he started pushing away whichever amount of doubt might be. It went missing but he had his chance, it pushed away, and almost withdrew as the cold amount of stored meat started appearing in the sky. Painted, but never erected, one could see no hue. Only the dark waited in a small corner, with all of them, connected, humans, creatures, animals and being all chained by holds that could not be seen. Twisted around this fallen tower, constantly rotated and drawn down, chained. With their lot being somewhat deprave. Chit-chatter in their guts, where they wore their mouth, it was how they wore they wonder and how they traded between one another, never minding their disgust. And least of all they would distrust each other after that.

It crept out, it shook, they didn’t look at it, they wore glasses made of ivory trunk.

They watched the elephants running in circles together, seeing other mammal runners go around, unable to catch of their tiny tails, whatever flies pushed out and crept. They were made out of large kite-foundations, buildings that were kept in the air, with eye-sockets that were blank, hollow on the inside, wearing the small tents on every shape that appeared out of nowhere, deeper inside, until there remained nothing but the half-cut reanimated bodies of the workers and the engineers who were granted eternal life, but were kept by umbilical-like tar-colored cords that were clearly made out of some metallic plaster. Through which they were being fed the punished for immoral crimes, who had been taken from the nearest village and were being fed through one of the small immortal holes that threw them out with strange hot airs, as the ones that kept the long-balloons up in the air.

‘Fealty, fealty, fealthy, to whom?’

‘I’m giving you but a chance now, don’t misunderstand what I’m trying to do.’

Neither of them could survive for long. They weren’t looking, some of the tapes that were being shoved in his face recorded what appeared to be the footage that happened two nights ago.

‘Anything can be prevented if you wait for a long enough period of time.’

‘What if it’s too late to stop something that’s already in motion?’

‘But there’s no need to prevent it in that case since it was meant to be.’

‘I don’t understand.

‘Of course you don’t, at least not yet. But you will. Look at that cart. It’s being driven into the wall, pushed by someone with no arms attached to his body. Think he would do it if he waited for long enough to starve.’

And then he stopped existing, only to appeared again, with a split body, barely attached. Though that was barely visible about the rims of his head, where all the power started running out and pushing out of him.

He couldn’t see a good enough reason to die, hence he waited.

‘Giving people the wrong impression, I suppose.’

‘You need to stop, now.’

‘I don’t think so, it’s a tad too late for me to stop now.’

‘Both of you need to shut up your mouths, immediately.’

They were not into it. They weren’t showing signs, all of whom were caught between the blinds, never showing more than it was needed. Thence they came on a drift of horse-shoes, left behind but never touched by a single horse, near their long-houses. Could not made the space between the air, where was the spider?

‘I’ve seen one of its cobwebs in the air.’

Out there where the postman came out of the petrified horse, where he remained in part, like a centaur in attunement. Though as opposed to him, his ribs were steel traps, hooks for every nail-bed polished on top his voracious giant back. From the looks of it, a sleeper bled and through the holes behind his head, there pushed a single heavy leash.

Couldn’t stay for long, bastardized, terrorized or not, they walked around him, dancing across the span. Right into the faced walls, with the harlequin strung, his dark face set apart by the colors of his suit. They paled.

‘I don’t think.’

A man is a submarine, or at least his head is. That way, it seemed like the upper portion of the sky, extending to the clouds was the outer space as well as the weird torsion pushed out of the way. Whereas all the water was solidly frozen yet unlike ice, it still continued the stream as it began flowing again. With little in the way, and out of it, moving slowly in every direction, like giants they came.

From each submarine head, a few of the crewmen fell. But they only got crushed on the giant shoulders and the rash comers from the other ends, attaching themselves like rat-trap formed, as a collar would, with each plopping metal bit keeping their undignified tiny legs from pushing out of their smaller gut-wombs.

‘It isn’t simply walking.’

‘What would that be?’

‘What they’re doing, they’re not simply walking. I don’t know, it’s different in some way.

They’re stomping the ground in their way, pushing the ground down with some kind of power, shaping their tendons and toe muscles until they can finally rest.’

‘And I suppose you know that because?’

‘I’ve been following them for a while now, every since I saw the forge of stone push deeper into the ground, right until everything got replaced by the stream of water.

That’s why I’m still here, because I’m a good observer.’

Charles said, with a doubt hanging around his neck, dragging him down like an affectionate chained, riddled by no other emotion, everything being said. He chose to finally bow, bending just a knee instead. Pushing himself further in just to get a better look at what seemed to be the end of the neck, in each of their cases.

‘Those submarines are not really their heads. I don’t think they have heads to begin with. And I think only one of those submarines is real as well.’

‘How are you able to tell all of that only from observing? For how long have you been sitting here, with your feet in the water, brow bent and neck stretched?’

‘Not for long, more likely I’ve been spending the last few weeks only walking into the citadels that come and go. Sometimes I see a cloud of snow rising from afar, only to disappear, which, as far as I’m concerned, belong to the omens.’

‘There are omens as well? SO you’ve spent more than a few weeks here.’

‘Try years for starters.’

‘Does it ever get boring?’

‘Not from what I’m concerned, no, I suppose I’m not.’

They were definitely not going to acknowledge it, but both Charles and Blue had only seen the worst possible break-point inside the house. It felt like they simply opened a door to another side of his watch, where the outpost only started drooling, through the falling of the gloved-formed mountain-paths through which they crawled out of. And they appeared to be lost, in some way, unnecessary, as well, as it was for them to admit any kind of impunity, to the one with no feet.

A jousting knight who crippled himself with a knife appeared. In his back, fifty-one sockets but the cocked eyes of peacocks inside of them, making all the smaller wings, all of whom would be unable to carry his weight in the sight of his ribs; those formed out of the outer looming rust-like substance that fell from the fake submarines. But that might as well be believed to have come from the inside of the real one. No one mourned answering or trying to defile and asked.

Who was he?’

‘Enciloph, as your command, watch what I have learned.’

Though he had nothing in mind, to spare himself of marks beastly carved to mind, it was in his desire, that one colonel Rapscott who was there with the two of them stepped in and recognized it as nothing but a threat. To their lives and no one else instead, he swore allegiance. Only through the body language, pushed out through the movement of his eyebrows from the upward region, nearing the deep-set eyes he bore, the one hundred and eighty degree rotation of his eyes to the right direction and the strange movement of his tongue around the upper region of his lip and below it, done so while still having his mouth shut in front of them. He didn’t speak a word, then he started.

‘I wish to kill you all.’

He darted for a few minutes in front of them, got one of the smaller men, pulled him down by the scruff of his neck, the drowned him down.

‘I thought we could never touch the water.’

‘Oh but you were certainly wrong, not only we can do that, but we can also live through it.’

‘You mean I may not be able to drown him?’

They all shook, then moved out of the way, as the bodies of the submarines threw tantrums everywhere, with little heed and no credence to what went on around them. It was tempting, touching some, leaving the place, returning as disgraced as they had once been. But that man who tried to have at us could still be back there, waiting for the right opportunity to ambush us. He thought of that as well as he could. It never stood with him but for some reason, he shook himself with all the power he could muster, Charles knowing better than to allow himself to be mastered by the most inadmissible implosions of the mind. He smiled with blood and pudge, pouring out of it, his teeth were out. Then back in to the other way. He walked desperately as he saw himself a few millimeters above the water, into the fray.

Shaken by them, as they were uncontrollable, even by what appeared to be a single emotionless appeal. They will drown me, they will drown me, they will drown me, if I look away. And they smiled at him knowingly, that they were unable to die, either way. Drowning was by no means deadly, as he could not suffocate either. Yet they had been made heavy and kept below the edges of the morrow, without a hope to push the sorrow off. It could not be, his smile was off, he chose to be. Out of his way, he prayed that there might yet be a direction there.

Animals

We were not as easily shaken by them when the march darted amongst everyone else who lost their sleep in the infantry of feet, from which spikes held each house rotating in the air, as the bridges holding them would not suture their losses. First of the infantry were the children of some mad diseased animal which was floating above the concubine. She passed out the message from the animal which appeared to be only the embodiment and nothing more. Different each passing day and in desire of a symbol that may speak of the gore that came out of it each day. Through a coming dark they tried to intercept the unspoken messages only to be lost on them the following night.

They were destroying it, despots, all of them. And every night, they went to the concubine, two at a time and asked for the divine animal, taking from the gut moon in the sky, which floated around. They were unable to take that into consideration any longer out of the fear of appearing abhorrent. This applied for everyone else who struggled to set it forth. It was as dangerous as it seemed, but they got it.

A body of a divine dolphin had been given, taken from the Concubine, with the surprising aspect of the worn-out worms, many of which were too hard to approach in that case.

Remorseless in wont, they heeded, and spread his body in disgrace, all the way back to their home.

Back in their small hut, once the rotation momentarily stopped and they returned to their doings.

‘Where were we dear?’

‘Before we went to the concubine, I believe we were discussing something about differences.’

‘Care to be more specific about them? My memory seems dull.’

‘Very well then, I’ll start again. I believe we were talking about the difference where men draw their limits.’

‘And you are, once again assuming it is only us at fault, when you’re just as responsible as us.’

‘Will you let me finish first?’

‘Go on then, I’ll wait.’

‘I was not referring to men from that standpoint, but it doesn’t matter. My point stands, there is a clear difference between us, in what we justify and what either of us get away with.

And for that I think we are highly incompatible, unequal in thought and remorselessly unfit to be called anything but what we are. We can’t work, we don’t work, we’re not the same, we’re.’

‘Stagnating now, and that’s something we should address sooner or later.

I don’t think so.

I.’

Soon enough they were joined by the brain damaged dolphin’s corpse.

For its heart spoke only the truth.'

'There's only one difference which needs be addressed. A few days ago you both killed your children and ate their heads. Yet it is unknown who ate the son and who ate the daughter.

We shall settle on that one after another and mess with the filth once it's done for.'

Then the rules of agreement were set.

'What is the main difference between a man and her kind then?'

'It's simple, a woman may not create, but she may belittle a man and may conquer him. It's simply in her nature to do so, just as it is in his nature to be claimed.'

'That sound rightfully so. We are blessed to have one such you in the confines of our home.'

He opened his head and revealed the level of abuse divinity seemed to lay on top of. 'You know what? I think you're wrong, dolphin.

I think they're simply dull-minded and.'

They returned him, with little to no way for it to come back.

A few steps too far.

'I wanted them.' Said the Concubine. It was too dangerous for any living being to be left alone with it. Especially during the night after each lantern broke the light into shimmers of disappearing slits. Both had their heads missing.

She wore the dolphin's head, he wore the rest of the body. They moved back into their home, while the originals got thrown off the rotating platform. Being very much unable to keep their conversation going, they wondered at it no less.

'I suppose this was always going to be the outcome, wasn't it?'

He asked himself while rubbing their bellies, children still there. A strange epoch-form, made out of large completely un-touching convex walls held the body as his feet, although the one that came was largely shaped by them as he revealed the heads around the trimmed collar that pushed his spiked hips through the conical pair that shaped the cage a long pair of legs, eight arms and eight long bipedal legs pushed out of. Yet they were all attached, as even the walls were as gray as eyes, almost transparent as they glided over, segments of his many tails grinded through. He appeared not as one of the divine animals but a driven beast in need of wont, wonder and of desire to eat around, as much as it could in a matter of hours before being caught by the Concubine who scoured the place.

'I shall have you, sickly-looking runts, I shall devour you if I can and meagerly push your bodies into dirt where you'll lay about until you rot.'

With which, the top of their house fell; into it he leaped as well, pushing the outer-rims, spinning with it as his entire body mass could not be properly anchored any longer, elevating him to a state of desperation, breathing through small packets of his largely fat-stored contraptions that pumped in and out of his body. First taste followed and finally he could breathe in reprise. He had tasted no longer out of fornicated tongues and could wish nothing more but the desire to eat about their headless spans, in the quiet of the lambs which followed, they flew in and started sacrificing themselves to him, as deathless as their glare. Only to appease him so he could finally stop from eating all the humans and blowing up their pea-shapes off. He had taken a certainty, as to why he was elated. He knew them better during a march of dead roses, buildings stopped from their rotation.

This castration of movement suddenly pushed them out, drawn to the sight of flight, unable to fight back, they only tried escaping as far as they could go. And they were too busy and docile to know what went on and what might cross their minds. Unable to loom and groom the clouds, they leaped and fell to their deaths, only to avoid being picked up.

‘What have you done to the city?’

‘I’ve taken what’s mine, and I still hunger.’

With a leap, to the farthest edges and the farther still in front, he leaped on top of the Concubine and pushed her down, stripped as well as decay. More so she was humiliated before an end was put to her as well. Thence the feeding started, with all of the long tubes pushing out, like mosquito-bulbs, rolled and twisted, sharp as incisors, drawing from inside of her. It was a helpless struggle she could do without, dead only when it ended and her body had been left to rot. And after, in this hollow city, he spared, nothing more than it would end his gaze. Worn out and eating what was left, devouring the animals as they pushed themselves deeper to his worthless yell.

‘Now I am one, and I shall be the last one who lives here, growing through this malady.’

The floors were his, the walls had thinned as they were planted underneath him. And every house had become his shell, his outer body as well as the light that came out of them. Ever-so humble, barely visible, it marked, the sight of dimness which was lost of them as that. A night passed, twenty more followed. After feeding on all his dear divine pets, one followed.

On the body of a man and a woman, the head of the dolphin and the body as well, had finally shown up.

They were there.

In the dark, they started rejoicing, as the night fell again, and they approached him in a most opportune moment, whence he came from the farthest reach, when his head split itself and from the insides there came the flattened mirrors, features that were there, no insides anywhere to be seen. But mirrors of the prison he laid in. And thence he asked of no wont, nor stronger, as his desire may have been, could he ask. Even more peculiar as one had to be watched over a long enough period of time. All those eyes which were contorted and corroded themselves during the time of apathy, when reality started pouring out of him through the small holes being made in his body; out of which came he, a human just as the ones in front of him. Though he was not unlike them, more so, they were defect, a deadlier thing which could not be told about. It writhed itself and almost sutured whatever else there was left.

It deformed that well to do anatomy which belonged to man, instead, leaving to itself nothing else but the twisted image, dolphin strings, as thin and reeds coming from his back, forming well-overlapped wings which set the creature yet in trance. But at first it had been barely formed, out of the unmade need, the heed of being reformed from the most peculiar materials that had been worn-out, through the age. They started singing, condescending, the voices were emerging and in a second, it showed up again. He opened up his chest and threw a river's worth, that spilled out of the platform while finding its way back, through the wasted below, where clouds were flat.

There, in those puffy things, something had been stored, even though it had been momentarily. Less than that, they brought it after, only for some point. And they opened their mouth, dolphin-like forms only came so far, as fake things that would distract the eye. After that, there was nothing more needed and nothing worth to pull away. For what came out of him had nothing in but eighty meters, pointing right ahead. A bulk that stretched beyond the girth of barrels and more structured than a piece of a large gargoyle-statue, as all around it, from every possible angle, the presence could not be dictated for. Least of the worth, for every amount of fat was stored at the top. Once it was done shooting ahead, one could see that the mass was only a small spherical transparent field of battle. Largely represented in the forms that not only swam inside of it as if they were alive, but those who continuously fought for their needs and wants to survive, otherwise, it would not do. Most of the pain was felt, as it flew. Small explosions of blood inside, clots hardened and became their off-shot breathing-gulps.

That only came back to the living as they changed in the colors of their wont. This creature whose form was known, name was not, brought in front, had addressed the dolphin.

Above them there was only a small glowing thing, barely above the one who killed the human beings. Another divine animal rested there. He would not be taken yet, he would stay, and it would not make a difference any either way that inside the animal there was the mind of a man. For that reason it could not be anything but a punishment to be taken by them. And for that reason as well, they would start it again.

'May we begin our dance then?'

The body of the woman stepped forward, embracing the Wrongly Deformed Organic. The Organic and the Dolphin-head joined one another and they shed no tears, but the change. It could not be accounted for, who had eaten the boy? Who had eaten the woman?

Not even the dolphin knew. Whom had he been on top off now? He had forgotten and worst of all was the fact that he could not check, for the likes of him had destroyed even the most unfathomable details that entered his dead-brain. Yet he wasted no second and joined it.

'May you direct me towards the corner stone? I wish there was a reason for me to be there and make my point.'

'What point would that be?'

'I've got a rope and I considered the following. Those who chose to fall by their own choice somehow survived. I know they had, somehow I know that.'

'And if you're wrong, what then? What might befell upon you then?'

‘You shall cut the rope and settle with the body afterwards. How does that sound?’

Or I might make you a much better deal, in the case of which.’ He paused, then looked for a reason, a good one to follow with a slight remark.

‘What goes down the rope?’

‘A man of the world, someone who has the mind to do it and the courage to carry it through, that’s what I think it is.’

With as much he settled it. He was wearing the body of the man, not that of his wife. He claimed it as being rightfully his and that alone could not be denied. Not a single moment in reality that might go on that side, not to mention that there was no other reason to look around.

Some houses did not make it so they would bode well on their own. Something Welsh lay to them, more than needed, excruciatingly non-bland. And blandness was needed in order for no family to stand out. Not that it mattered any longer since most of them were dead. But it was necessary to say as much and paint everything in the ultra-violet shade their blood left behind them. A trail for every wench that fell, beds were unkempt and children had been set to flight with wings made out of the hay inside their room-lounges. Leaving him and his mind untouched. It mattered for as long as they would believe it to be theirs as well as they were never there.

For that reason, from the depths of the square abyss, from the round bubbles of oxygen and carbon came triangular pieces of guts-shape larger tendon-like abrasive spherical at the top, longer-bodied, many-legged, units that appeared to have shaped themselves into existence from the insides of largely masked bodies.

Sleough Cephyr

‘Then leave, if you don’t like staring us while.’

‘Just like them, right?’

‘Right, just like them.’

A sigh of relief came soon after him. He could not be seen from any angle any longer, split in many strides, walked through as his body thinned, pushed on the sides by the on-coming tide, the pushover being taken along by the crowd on their way out. And they were least of all surprised to hear what was happening around the room, with so many people busy, they shook all over, distraught by the fact that someone might see the corpse pick upon a life of its own as it would grow even fatter than it ought to be. Such as it appeared to be, behind every camera which recorded the strange thin man, he was finally dragged from the air and pushed down until finally, after being walked upon and being a general bothersome thing to the passing people, he had finally replaced the carpet.

And the room was eighty five by eight three, and it could only be encompassed by him as some sort of pseudo check board pattern, placing him in some way in the utter most peculiar spot a man could find himself in. Twenty meters from a block of skin on the right, ten feet in the front facing the repertoire-like area where the stairs were being placed in, then five more millimeters above the carpet lay another spot where the part of the face which held the tongue stood. And in an asymmetrical position, on the second row beyond the head-zone where a skull tip lay, beyond which there lay, on the ceiling, a pair of carefully placed yet movable lights, there shone one bright yellow spark leading to another part of the fragmented tongue. Despite the fact that the giant thin sheets may have been as carefully strewn as curtains or as pseudo-walls, there had been a sudden laceration which caused this sudden placement of the weird check-boarded pattern that kept them all below the side of the waist belonging to the room in question.

Regardless of which, eight other sides of the tongue lay splattered and placed around the room. Most importantly, rather than their placement had been the fact that everywhere around them, an intolerable act had occurred, one that would not fancy anyone who stumbled upon it. Merely looking at it would be enough for a man to generate an unaccountable amount of disgust at it. For those tongues acted together and only came to life momentarily as well as occasionally when the most hospitable women happened to become stationary on top of them. That, as much as it seemed to be peculiar, yet ungrateful, didn't mean a thing. It was repulsive, disgusting, yet it knew when to act and when to move itself past the rims and back into the living.

Its fragmented yes kept searching for the right moments when no one looked in that peculiar direction, then they swallowed the women whole, deeper below the next floor where they had already taken the rightful amount of time to bleed in and grow the bowels of urges. Whence they ended up there and who remained, unspeakable acts upon one might refrain to think upon, appeared to follow through. And thence they were forgotten as their mouths were sealed like the incessant cuts they suffered, the suture motions and the screams in the fashion of prying through. Dreadfully they split below the waist, kept alive by an embrace that was pure. Lower bodies were being kept, and in them, one might direct only the next step of their dreadful instinct. To carry on through, a growth unlike no other that would carry on through to touch the ground.

Hanging like giant sacks, many of the women ended up like that. And between them, almost chains there pulled, slightly looking long-won out. Between them the fat poured in and out, before it got expelled and it disappeared as well. Then the taking quieted as well. They could not suffer no amount of distrust between them.

Each fragment of the brain developed, a shallow cognition that would waste away.

‘Teach her some manners before you sent her further in to take care of our new body. We’re still yet to have created a proper archetype for us to push in.’

‘Patience, patience, it’s the least of all the aspect we’ve yet to learn, as soon as we’re done with it, we shall finally push through and get away.’

‘With what?’

‘With all the murders we’ve committed, as they have not found us yet.’

They were more than aware of it, the men were too busy to care as they pushed on the elevators in droves, or took the stairs with the land-doves in order to get in time. While the others were way too busy pissy-prisying around whilst doing nothing. Incompetent as well, they said. Most were all worn-out and would never be used by whichever else in any case.

A door opened below, then there entered four hazmat suited troglodytes, of whose suits were hardly pointed like the clan, yet purple and yellow, blue and one who wore traditional crests. Two of them appeared to wear strange helmets made for conjoined twins whilst the others had trunk-opening of the most elephantite-kind. Between their backs and inside their large packs, filled with an utmost repulsive irresistible filth-gas, they drove on, there lay a single fuzzy-looking overly grown mushroom of fat, the lumps of which were split between the large tubes which connected them in the back.

Their suits were only pushed deeper in and could only drive deeper through, as it happened of them to be not only connected at the splits inside their anatomically deformed necks, but also as their inconsistently sized tops around their waists. They moved like schizophrenics searching for bones, but none opened their suits out of the fear that contamination might throw them off it. None the matter, no scent emerged inside the room. Whoever they were grooming there shook in an infantile matter. But it drove itself farther near a corner as soon as they approached.

‘What are they planning to do to us?’

‘Leave them be, this Is the perfect opportunity for us to consistently work out the endurance our skin and shade ought to receive. Otherwise, we shall be perceived as traitors.’

‘Nothing more and nothing less, I think that should cover it. I agree.’

‘In that case, make note of the amount of abuse they’ll force it to endure and remember. Whatever kind of punishment they might enable it to suffer of, we shall face it eighteen times worse.’

At least than what it was perceived, they were only starting slowly as they crushed its bowels past the point where there was no peace.

A scream had been heard across a lower level. There, more puerile-bodies half-wits started bashing themselves against the bars. One of the Agamemnons finally stopped waiting around for anyone to returned and went on to observe, as there was no need to wait. He had been there for far too long and it crept back into his mind, the wardens had left the room and they prized themselves no longer.

Past another fifty miles, they took turns in their private room and with the help of sharp axe-like pins they began scalping their heads and as vile trails of blood pushed out of their necks, he followed in their direction. Mournful in stare, he doubted nothing and only dreaded himself as he pushed on and away.

‘I see that you’ve taken the liberty to start without me.’

He spoke with filth between his nostrils, through his mouth, into the darkness and into the bile which poured out of the room. Only as he appeared in front of them, those missionaries had turned, and they mourned no longer as they were torn apart, from inside out, levitating, limb by limb, as they were stretched out of their own, then thrown around, waiting for something to fill them. Giant in look, like turned-around cans they shook no longer and poured out, below the small area they were confined in, and through their private, they finally froze the malignant substance in an infected mixture that stood as an example. Out of it and further yonder, touched by toes that weren’t of man. They belonged to him and served as no reminded. The Colossus was out there. Still, in this place, where nothing had spoken of his desire to follow or what might happen after, if he rose and came to life. He, whom had no business being here only appeared as time neared for his return.

Call on me as you want, but I shall slaughter you all if I have to, without question and without any kind of hesitation, I shall proceed. Mind in the making, or not, he tirelessly waited and ripped a cord, from the crowd a gut was worth as much.

‘Tables are turned in the sky, upside-down. Then they started slowly pushing away their legs do reveal that inside of them, there were human organs that grew only to become their own parasitical beings, thin but tender, strong and long, purple colored with a dark hue of gray.’

That was as far as he went to look at it. Before it popped again, this time from the thin-squared prison on top of which it, he spoke less but thought of it as well.

‘We’re limited, are we not?’

Below, on the grand view of the asphalt streets, it was only someone, a wrongly formed, a barely functional creature. And it spoke to itself as if both of its minds were separated and it could only be heard by itself during times. Of waging, it understood, and shook no longer, though the push could only matter less.

He wasn’t going to forget what he saw, no matter how deep inside the spot in time he threaded on.

For this was not the past any longer, nor was he in the normal dimension, in which the skin had been preserved. The being inside the table was still there, part of the walls, which weren’t straight but dulled out and slightly deformed everywhere around the spot.

It could work, for a moment, before someone might intervene, but that was miserable, they were miserably so. It could be quantified on the devices, for every pastor that came after, during the cross, there was a metallic-figure looming above of them, tied to them like the strings of kites. Most of them were unaware.

‘Shall we go on then?’

‘I thought we were, maybe I should’ve made myself clear before. I’m not the one trying to shove the roads deeper into the.’

Hard to describe it, largely rounded up above the ceiling while pushing eighteen hundred miles ahead, in the right and in the left while depressing even deeper with each adjacent road which was adjacent to the main line. And from above it, excluding the main straight stretch, one could see that each other line had square holes in them, leading to even deeper levels that lay beneath them. Each bearing stairs that pushed deeper below, not the normal straight ones but twisted around a thick metallic bar that was constantly pumping, melting then hardening again, as if it secretly bore muscle or heart-matter inside of it. Not that it was consistently seen as a threat, yet everyone kept their distance away from it.

‘It was dull, waiting then, seeing how they couldn’t mind their own place, there.’

‘I see it, still moving, isn’t it?’

‘Aye, it’s been doing that for the last few hours at least. I still wouldn’t mind getting half-way through.’

They shut their mouths and walked through without listening any longer. It was all too obvious, all too quiet, nothing moving with purpose in one of the closed areas, hidden beneath the side-road. In one of them they hid, and they only appeared as if they had been a little less likely to be slacking, for all the worth in the world meant nothing to them. It did not work that way, the songs they were listening to were gray.

Below the closest level beyond their heads, Natasha waited for them. She was shallowly lean, partly because her function was only being controlled by a set of tubes attached to the back of her legs, pumping whatever came from the modified fridge in the back. Not likely told, she would not be opposed to what was going on there, not for the same reason they were there, trying to peer where they didn’t belong, playing with her mind instead.

‘How long have you been here for?’

‘Twenty years, at least, well unless you count the previous models.’

Bodies, nothing mechanical about there, not copies either, her predecessors were still referred to as such. Yet she had no joy and no dignity that was being taken away from it while she was doing so. It was only a matter of perspiration and what shot through her every since she turned. They were still there, but sometimes they were not.

‘Would you mind if we sat down for a while?’

‘Go ahead, I’m certainly not one to stop you.’

After the mark, they were at least trying to set a word in. All too obvious and all too inconspicuous, they were hiding something, it was all too clear, either guns, false identification shots which by now should be, at least impossible to detect any longer and worst of all, the heir of their cognition, kept in their back-roundly squared overly bloated cans. They grew them with the help of the symbiosis of dead-cells.

‘If you cut my finger off you’ll understand it.’

‘Do what you have to, I’m not in the mood of waiting, not here.’

For a good reason as well, as the hole changed from being placed on the road, going right through the ceiling, there was something wrong about the way of looking through it. Clouds were gray, they pushed through what appeared to be similar to the filter effect of an old black and white movie. It was a perpetual thing, a motion she had no control over, nor would she pretend she had. That was, somehow, enough to make a man reconsider what was going on, why she asked that or what was the hidden intention behind her strange request. So much so that it was out of question from here on out, they did it. They went ahead with it and started cutting, disregarding the fact that, for a being made of flesh, she showed no signs of any pain. None whatsoever, to the point where they both considered the following:

Point of foremost interest so far, she could be somehow lying about her status as a human. In that case, immediate termination would have to be carried on with. Completely and out of order as well, until she would not, for her sake alone, remain in the same spot as she was before. That lead to the second point.

She isn’t lying, something’s a mock, there’s something seriously strange going on inside of her, that bring only the supreme disregard of her entire being as well as everyone else involved. That meant both his partner and Natasha would have to be off-shot into the back-wall with nothing of it being document or registered through the office. He obtained nothing so far, not that he was in doubt by any means but they were looked upon by the fiend which hid inside the fridge.

‘Is there someone hiding in there?’

‘Of course not, don’t be a paranoid dult, there’s no way someone could resist being attached to the protocol and somehow live the enclosure.’

‘Is it tightly locked then?’

‘I wouldn’t be here otherwise.’

‘Mind if I take a look inside?’

‘There’s no need to, unless you were given an order to put me down, but in that case I’m uncertain why we’re still talking. Haven’t they told you as much?’

‘Ma’am, I have no idea whom you think we are, but, we ought to establish something before things progress in the wrong direction.

We do not belong to any known federal organization, in-so far as for you to be concerned with.’

But that was a blatant lie. One with little to no consideration for what happened there, twenty minutes ago, and a bad step lead to them losing their necks, to the entirety of their throat that were not there to begin with. They were taken after they fell, dragged alone and attached to the resolute form of the modified fridge, there they would live with her for some time.

Of course they wouldn’t approach her after, since they grew the fat which replicated their lost throats. After that, they started crawling along like slugs, only to push on farther in, and creep inside their larger circles. From which they started drawing out while pushing the hole deeper out, rightly so until it became a hill. The woman had lied about her name, as this Na'Sha turned her hip inside her back, from there on out she took the stand upon a knee, there on out, until she became a stranger effigy, turned upon the star-of solstice, which shone with a light of gray upon them.

She opened three protruding faces, all of which faced one of the poles, pushing themselves until they had become even winder, thrusting until they had become whole again, never to be touched, it appeared like they all crawled together, mounted the hill and started singing through one of the approaching long-thin communicatory shafts that was lowered from the out-reaches of space. One of them pushed through her head, producing a spine-like shaking rod out of her dead children, those being the two liars that had accompanied her, leading to them being called.

Ordered to proceed with the plan, they started communicating back. And they spoke weirdly as they were surrounded, phantoms, projections, who appeared out of nowhere and would touch nothing until waited for. And they were waited out, seeing how they would not disappear, looking at through eyes that elongated with what seemed to be the drip out of their largely excavated corneas, never wanted or being longed for in the same place.

Bloody thing bit them in red. It started sparring with itself. From one side of the room to the other, from one side, there loomed eight limbs, aggravated by their initial growth, turning on their own while eating. And they ate, like small clusters of broken egg-shaped small containers, all of whom hid them away, as they formed inside the room, uncannily forlorn, there stood the men-of hay. Most of them were all too worn out to be pushed out of the way. First they crawled and approached, then they apprehended one another only to push and eat out of the space-horn. Various signals spoke of filthy fragments that belonged to them.

Then they loomed longer and could not convey, nothing they saw made any sense. As they bloodied their fingers even further, abandoning them in walls of gray.

'They shall make our world of no pigmentation, the allure of sub-humanity, the lure being set. Worming out from below the ground, let us eat from the fish-basket.'

In the name of Ssastett, they longed for something that was yet to come. Dreadful in appearance, they took no moment, as they settled on eating, but only from behind their backs could they leave the crackle, the mightily forlorn, defiled. They soothed one another during the recently deceased. Carrying over their feet with the unfathomable watcher, seething. There was a limit to the amount of stress and abuse they could take. Especially after doing something as shameful as they did after they were done emerging, eating less.

Both, all thrice, many others that followed out of the living organs started proselytize one another like pagans in search of no divine organ to worship. Instead they appeared to take no heed for those around it.

'Shall we start the sermon then?

I blocked the signals, we shall not be heard ever again, at least not from this time, as much as needed, yes Madame, yes Madman. As long as the three of you shall live, the bridge will stay and not a single man might stray from the road.

We'll listen instead.'

Thence they spoke no longer, for the time being at least, when they started pushing through and listening to nothing else but the voices and of what they spoke in the coming of the boldness, fort in which they hid them all. Most of the uncannily stricken down, some others came from on top the hole. But they were grayed out as well and they could not over react, not that way. They were taking too much now, revealing their non-human, or any fraction that might even remotely be interpreted as human-like, both in the matter of bone and the way in which it exposed itself, which had shown itself out there.

Pushed as little drops of water fell through the open rounded moon-like curve, from all the drops, and in the reflection upon which they bore their hands, came a single reflection of the worn out tube that fell on top of it. Least of all would it suffice, to throw a dice of skin in it and see it bounce, for all the water in the world, glorified in its mournful world could not be united with that single basket-like circle in which tadpole-like fragments swam through. Each was corroded, a disgrace that had shown itself too soon to be defiled. It could not be contained any longer, not tried for, in glances that would never rise.

For the part she bore, as she would look forth, around from the corner she stood in, there was little to no chance for it to swim. Out of it, and then within, twin around the heads, necked and robed of no fealty she spoke.

'Call upon him not longer, as he will be angered by the fact you ate. From inside his horn he bled and infested the waters.

And none of you might swim in his lakes.'

For all living beings would be drowned in there, only to be pushed in the bodies of the long-thin amphitheater-stretched bodies they would digest themselves in and stack. Water was water but the strands made out of the repurposed bodies of their gloriously filth-endowed. It was pitiful, as they ought to know.

It is for that reason that they started forming their own false-hiding spots in the same room they had lain in ever since the start. They were so mad at one another, screaming and tearing each other's skin off like hyenas that they had to do something before they could rip each other's throats in the process.

Viler sounds could be heard, they were unnerved by one another's perilous words, yet they could do nothing about it. All stood within their own partaken in play, within small surfaces upon which they hid and stayed.

They feared it, for it approached, from their disgusting pillar, from the point where the small circular pint of water broke, there came the light, and whence it shone, from the insides of it, the moon was torn apart in a fell swoop. And everyone inside the small celestial body looked back. From all those dead and those that cracked their bodies into that, there stood one who knew, who recognized them in the filthy swoon that broke through their world. It was not likely that they saw it, not from the distance, definitely not from the area they had all gathered in, finally having understood that they could not ignore the blank point that shot the sky. Unknown reasons, most of which predated thought. There had simply been no power in that pillar of light, only the short stacked ants-like needlessly pushed out curved ants-like shrieking desperate hangings that occurred inside their microscopic sights. Within each of their grasps, claws grabbed their smaller bodies, from the insides of their receivers, malignantly looking back, to their long slimy bodies that moved like tendrils in disguise. From the eyes of which no organ-hue, but some peculiar gut produced it through, from their backs. Coated in it they pushed around until they stacked and reach the rims of outer space. Indistinguishable from sparks of light, they moved in their surrounding unisons only in doubt of whom was and whom wasn't alive.

Checked inside their sparkling guts, they brought themselves down. An exchange had taken everything from them, through and through, they stopped past the brute.

He came along as well, leaping through.

'He's going to tear it down, stop him.'

They all leaped to their feet, right out of their wild tents, barely able to stand. The brute came, with both feet struck down.

Tenderness was vague

Mongol's head squirmed, it lost the throat and came forth, shaking itself until it could not push away from the little hole it dragged itself in.

It walked slowly. Cat-eyed, he peered at what seemed to be benign forms that were rubbing little sticks in the darkling dark, trying to start a skin-fire. So much joy, so much joy, he thought about. It was ecstatic.

Take one of the breaches and cover it up. There came as an almost disgraceful voice, pointing at the opening from which they stared out of their home. It was frustrating in some way, seeing how they faced an alternative that would be much worse than the one before it, they relented, and stopped. It poured in with little pops all along the way.

As long as no one was peering in, he walked in circles, his neck was thin.

Somehow the chains shook.

And when it happened, not a single boat shook. Out of a long pile, of many who stroke forth, who shook upon the coined drop, from the chains upon which they walked, one arose and made it so. Past the depths below, they rose forth with fat between the snow, the mast. It was crooked out of itself as it only pushed past and never came, towards the area where in remained, the strange mast-like figure pushed the lamps, the loathsome creatures torn apart, disintegrating some of the most repulsive of their touches, until they drowned in the most endowed wretched, perils of clots, some fell other stood apart. Most were punished for what they looked like for no other reason than the fact, that the human bodies, perhaps, kept something of their old minds. In the brittle state they were in, they could not fathom pouring out for long, thence they rose and pushed past them, in the depths of a circular hellish-storage. Where they crept and stood, just like Mongol. In his place, a crook now replaced him, after he had made it past the ground. He was similar to him, with the sole exception that he was dead, rounded about and pushed below.

Regret was something he was feasible prevented from feeling, out of the bottom of his sickened mouth, where crooked teeth loomed around false-crowns, iron-cut gums, lost about the place. Surmising no emotion from the disgrace he felt around, it faded.

Vestigial-trotty

He shook within each room he used to walk around into. This was before he achieved, the bent of knees which pushed them in, four legged, all bent now. With his hands being rather curved, and curled inside them with each stride of the palm pushing deeper in his face, where rested. Through the open spaces like the ones inside an autopsy-dissected fully developed adult, crooked little insect-fat, where stored, even more, the poison brought to their nostrils, at last. It was necessary to somehow keep up with everything that was going through him. Wasted upon his brow there lay an open hollow spot that was unoccupied. Through it spoke his friend.

‘I’m waiting for you past five and ten, I can only hope you shall come here in time, otherwise, I could not fathom being alive for long.’

‘I shall do my best not to anger nor to harm you. And I will attend our communion if it’s absolutely necessary for me to lay.’

With hope along its way, he wanted, to the least of all his chants would warn him that there was someone on his track. Bloated like a diseased rat, he came along. His features were too flat, his eyes were brought to a spot where they could not go deeper in than they were before. A lower half of a body was kept above the floor, wrapped around by a metal rope which was held by metal clasps that were only pushed around the back of his strange legged mass, turning him into a strange caterpillar with no segmented body, other than the illusion that made it appear so, given by the legs clustered in various shapes of crisscrossed wedges upon the top of which stood a single long harpoon-thin rope. From it came the danger.

He presents himself as it is.

‘I am Malborr.’

‘Clint, shall we proceed now?’

‘I haven’t even asked whether or not I may join you still.’

‘It’s irrelevant to me whether you may follow me or not. I seem to have forgotten where I am.’

There were no rooms around, but they were somewhere in some vestigial cage-like cavernoid-formed wedge that somehow stood between the crossings of a wild ancient building that had been submerged for a vast period of time, to the point where it had been completely encrusted by the various urchins of sand and the hardened surface of a mobile mass of liquor-alloy that was kept near the planet's core, where it drove itself into the solid until it rested more than it ought to have been allowed, slowly melting then cooling down until the sea-pillars looked like the jolted melted teeth of in-bred crows, a thing that made Clint even more confused than he was. Desperate even, to find something or someone to take in what he wanted, the warning started before his fingers departed from the long-standing spots.

‘Shall we attend the communion together in that case?’

‘It’s only fair that I may lead the way since I have killed the last man who tried pushing me away.’

‘Then I will make it so it’s worth my time. I’ll find more about you, Malborr.’

‘Very well, the lime fades, I see its colors everywhere.’

‘I suppose that means that your eyes are not working properly any longer, are they?’

Found out a part of him that did not fit, it blew the bottom side of his body apart and shot in both direction of his feet. The god didn’t speak any longer, busying himself with other things.

On the other side of the cavernoid wedge, the outside part, out of their reach, ahead.

There was a reason no record from the past age made it through. And that paled with the brunt force with which the rams came forth, butchering everything in their path. Wont had nothing to do with it since they were only trying their hands. Armed even while convulsing on the floors, as if seizure was a common house-held occurrence in the outside world; though that was an irresponsible view of the matter, since they were still connected to the ramming-devices they held dearly around their stricken arms. It was, in some way, the only redeemable way they could pursue this assault, this battery, this constant flow of blows that followed. Thoroughly set in place and joined, the rams had arms of their own, bolted in place by largely rounded tight nickel eyes, melting through the skin as they held everything in place.

Satisfaction could be derived from their faces, this being the main asset of their mental disorder from which they suffered from. Through and in-between them, it varied, but the pain could still be satisfyingly be thrown about. Shared between them as they chanted, there was no point in lying through and past their lot.

The most disturbing aspect of this ordeal was the fact that there were no winners. Everyone there had suffered of some kind of expiration date, drawing itself only farther until it could no longer be pushed out of the way or ignored.

‘We can still make it in time if we keep pushing through.’

‘I don’t think it would be fair that way, for any of us, especially those in the back.’

A darting depression pushed down. It loomed even longer than it should’ve been acceptable, and without the doubt of a single mind, they were pushing towards trying to abandon their weaker kin behind. Then they only pushed themselves around for reason, crushing their joints and those of the likened fissures around the ground, where they had previously buried their young. Not likely, or under no circumstance could they complain any longer, of no sacrifice that would do. It was too deranged and too obvious, even to the point where they estranged one another past their betters, in the walls. Where they hid and what they trusted themselves with once the wall was down.

What had they left behind, if not a sky of polluted mountains, from fire-brim, whence they would be born out of, many of the previous generations still pushing on and fighting for a better chance at this survival, but what they were not aware of, as it appeared to be, was the fact that neither of them could account for the battery of bricks, the repairs they did and the reinforcement of alloy, just so they could assume none might follow.

‘You’d doom another generation than share what we have?’

‘Is there another way? If there is, in that case I’ll listen and make do. If there isn’t, then so be it. There would be no loss and no desire for me to continue forth. I shall await termination from both you and all of our old.’

‘And there it is, the spirit fading and no attempt to fight back.’

‘Why should I do it? We were not made to destroy each other. The possibility of pain and exhaustion is finite. Thence there’s only this I shall be listening to, my heart is in a bit, pierced and cracked, pumping through my body, something’s wrong.’

‘This guilt for not pursuing, for not fighting when needed forth; I witnessed this happening time and time again, eight generations before, from which I can say, do not depart and I shall go my way and ask you nonetheless.’

What do you choose? Shall you fight for this right to take away whatever food you can from the young or will you simply lower your arms from bashing? They will be doomed either way. It’s half-way build along with your say. I know you’ve got no intention of putting off the differences between our people as well as forgetting what might make due.’

‘Then forgive me for saying this, but am I no danger and I may sooth the time?’

May I not lower my arms in prayer, for you to understand that we cannot allow them to come? I cannot fight you, I can’t torment you but I may never reach this epoch-of heaven you promised us all. You are as frail as I am.’

A corpse-like cripple attached to a ram, with many arms, no legs and a tail that seemed to be part of the body. With a giant head which had only one eye on the side that did not touch the floor, only a part of the mouth, half the teeth and everything else wrongly-touched. Scorched around the flayer’s pouch, many needle-marks racked all around him, in the making, he only bled when asked to; that being caused by the extraction of organs, half of them to be even more precise, suffered at the time of their births. Not a single one could be called on that or travel forth, more than a few feet away at a time, when their many arms tired and the bolts wore them out.

And the rams were of giant bones, pulverized in half, then attached to devices that allowed the arms as well as the suitors to be kept alive.

But of no saying, this passed through. Of course they would not say anything more, but they refused to give in for a chance, they were of no truce and of no disquiet that may last. It was hard, harnessing what power they had. One of them came near. He tried living the ram against another, as a mother would raise her palm to punish her child. That was the peril, maker of what wasn't due. And they could not fathom rising, nor getting through it, past the cue. It was likened and pushed less, then lowered as he found out that it was relentlessly hard.

'Everything was done for you, and no one else. I swear it, I'm nothing to be ashamed of. I've done absolutely nothing to deserve this kind of treatment.'

He said, while then and only then he drafted twenty men from around the place, pushed them in and saw them die after trying to crack their steely organic rams. It was a crude sight, but there was no reason to be ashamed of it. They were so naïve in a way. Thinking they could do all this by themselves, forcing others to obey when they themselves had been unable to respect their limits, decency being considered somewhat vile. Off with them, they turned and came to enter ever hardened part, and every raised wall that went into each direction. Deranged in thought, they brought nothing with them on their way. Through one of the roofs that fell they found as much but never came to ask when needed, heeding the call, they were undefeated.

'We shall falter there, but it is still time to return and do something about our young who are on their way.'

They felt out of place, and as soon as the realization came as soon as they darted around and saw that there was, in no way possible for life to have been curved here. Dismissing every notion they leaped, from side to side as they whirled around each possible way, conveying little to no emotion as well as there was something yet to say. Words fell to death hearers, walking in pastures of cement, or it would've been so if the material that encompassed everything was even so remotely achievable. On their way there, they seem to have sacrificed something along their way. But they had no means of finding out.

He wretched himself forth, Orn'Hras, listening to nothing else, not even while knowing what they lost on their way out. How miserable they all felt without spreading any amount of doubt and anger, shared between their headless toes, still dragged along they vowed that a change would be on its way, whether or it was even remotely feasible for either of them to try for there on out. They were null, drilled in the head, left to rot and play with themselves despite looking as uncanny and out of place as they were.

'I see another one coming, prepare yourselves for their onslaught. Remember that there's certainly no possible way to prevent it, henceforth we must do what it takes to prevent their suffering from drawing on more than it is necessary for them to survive through it.'

'I think I hear the light fading, and I see no reason to stay. Stray yourselves and never meet them, for I have seen the way out.'

Through a hole that was reddened, more so than a piece of molten ford, there stood a single man contorted who ventured forth and carved the way. He would serve as their illumination and make it so there's a way back. For who was he to refuse yonder, and listen to them, most in fright.

'General announcement.'

Came that voice from the past, it had been listened to before the pointer and could only imitate something when needed after that. Worse of all, they were malnourished creatures in the making, never ready to understand. Where to direct and where their feet ended or why was this agony of their accepted instead of being directed out of its way; thence their blisters started bearing a meaning, even though it may be lost on them. Pushing yonder had no call. Cherished by their own, they only dreaded to come forth and listlessly nudge through in the wrong order. Of their woes nothing was said. They would have to settle with that.

That was only one of the buildings.

There were no more excuses any longer, at least none that would suffice. Dreaded for what they looked like, they wreathed in and out, reality sparked no wonder, and the streets were left just as found. In the worst possible way, what they lacked in gratitude they pushed through in disguise. Disgusting bodies that never died no matter the abuse they suffered. One of them pulled himself apart, only to wake up with the end of a rotating saw attached to a stick he used, perplex of the fact that it writhed in and tore apart whatever was left of him, in peril.

No loyalty either, to them, or to him. Whom he butchered the head of, broken in the knees, dragged along, torn in the back of the head. Tugging from one corner to the other resulted into nothing, at least from their either side, not being confronted either, dead-men, walked past them, drowned in a river where bullets swam inside the fish. Though they were just as wide as the buildings in which they lived.

Water turned solid after a while, especially after the deluge took that away from it. And what appeared to be commonly placed and accepted was the fact that mot buildings had not been properly aligned. Instead they pushed out of one another, turning on themselves, pushing out like hornet-shafts, rounded everywhere around so they could fathom the currents coming out of the solid air. Moisture was never felt, felled upon most of the lifted drones that came from just about everywhere as they started their wild ascent. Some wild reigned-over smaller men were strung about and lynched from on top the closely pushed out of their bodies statues, many of whom appeared to be floating in the air. Holding them like whips of stone and whiff of born-out predecessors fell into the solid river, breaking in part.

But their pain was internal as their blood hardened in the most obtrusive and painful needles, most of which had been used to cut through them and make them lose, any kind of decency would not refrain. They could not prevent themselves from feeling pain. Even what appeared to be a mist in the distance had been nothing more but a wild reconfiguration of the giants that merged with the buildings, in features and in part. Some arms were taken and placed forth, foaming at the boat-like curves that appeared in the distance. Another lot was brought forth, spun around as they were shown from the distance. Large and thin, giant, as the statues or the buildings, but only as the iron skeleton placed before the cast had thinned. And they wore their features in their backs, carrying them in sacks that grew on to live lives on their own, even though they were dependant on trying themselves time and time again, forlorn, as no one wanted.

One of the Thins came so.

‘I wish there was a reason we were here for. But I don’t think there’s a way to see.’

‘Stay away and stray your hands, you know there’s nothing else to see around this place.’

We came by chance, we shall stay by chance.'

'And If I die here, where will I be taken to?'

'You'll be taken to nothing but the deathless world, the one behind the clouds where no one knows.'

Grown out of it, at last, he spoke, rising out of the quiet hole, the other Thins came forth. And they were just as surprised as he was, of the strange architecture which combined the limbs and better whims of those around them. Many citizens refused to show even the slightest hints of there being any contempt felt towards anyone else. Especially those who shaped the clouds and winds and mist into what appeared to be the other side of the city, the one that was beyond them; climbed upon a ladder of molecules employed by the Thin, which looked like dark stands of grass-blades, most of which were stacked upon one another, as they formed the way towards the hole inside the sky. In it, he looked even deeper, even farther until he saw what appeared to be the deep-concave shooter-wedge in which not even the holders of the headless men looked upon in doubt.

'It's an obsession at this point.'

Came a voice from one of the smaller parlors.

'I cannot and will not be able to defeat it by any means.'

They weren't paying attention, that being their most obtuse flaw.

It looked like a bad paint-blob on top of her wants. Can't prolong something a living being doesn't want. At least not if she wants to make it out alive.

'We have to talk about something.'

'Shoot it.'

'It's the thematic I kept looking into, I don't know whether or not this is something. It was extremely unfair since this was a house of blue and the woman was drenched in her period. It could not be stressed for long enough that she would get no amount of sympathy from anyone else, since their customers were defects, known as such and marked at the back of their heads, or whichever limb wasn't completely dysfunctional or relentlessly missing. It was the right thing to do, In order to separate the normal population from them. Cripples, the inbreds, the severely deformed and whichever other affliction of the mind had to be dealt with as swiftly as possible. What came after that was not only a method of solving this nuisance in its entirety, but it also seemed like it would last. They were done for, thoroughly misplaced, dragged along and chained with chains fashioned out of their own. There they dripped aside, torn apart, from the guts of the makers, there in the sky no one would ask questions.

And they came in trains, not out of them and not real trains, but in the form they bore, with their largely flattened tops having contorted, coming, pushed around and wrapped until they managed to achieve it in some form, one which definitely made them feel less exasperated and more compassionate towards one another, since it would not do otherwise. But beneath them, one could see a small frame, like the few inches of free spaces underneath a door that was actioned upon by a few hinges that were well-placed in every corner. If one were to drag his eyes under that hole, under the frame, he could take a good look at what happened in the innards, the inner-working of depression as they shared what they could without being able to fall asleep, mindlessly droning about as their cognition devices turned in an out.

Because they were worked upon by machines, they could not be called human beings, or even replicate the common tool-worship seen in similar simians to them. And for such a thing, this train-façade was a lie. It wasn't real, it was only a crude attempt to mask their nakedness into something familiar, which everyone else appeared to plainly ignore. The matter of that fact being, they were distorted in shape, disorientated in sight and disgraced to be peered at.

‘Well what shall it be?’

Asked the Woman of Command, she had darted everywhere around but had refused to realize that it was long since her husband left. It should be noted that one of the higher dents, in which the wasp-like tendon-holes, shaped like the strangely arched stones of strings made out of the skinned string-lamps, those being the native-like invaders that had taken those wild forms as armors in order to protect their largely more plastic degenerate bodies. Torn apart at least every few second, spread about a field of mold, that floated in the air. With the help of the molecules and their miniscule hands they managed to eat the previous degenerate flying group. Largely because they were repulsed by them, halvened heads that threatened to tear apart reality with their tendril-like tubes. They had to be completely exterminated in their entirety before the entirety of the world shook in their fast charge. No remarks could be drawn any longer, out of the quiet, there being someone passing through.

They ignored this wildness of form, darting through, in need to buy a blue lamp.

He asked the Blue lady, that being the other part of her mind. The Woman of Command agreed, she looked around and found one. Given for free, without there being a choice, without being given something that might rip off her voice, she chose the termination following her thirst for orange. Gruesome though she may seem, it was just about everywhere, in the place, symbols within broken clocks, all striking at the same hour. She would watch the sun when passing through, but that was not a sphere, but a wild hill that rotated in its place. Of fire she could see not naught but she wondered who lived there.

A Livern-potter, one who had been employed, with the Liver-potter to create a fake one, as well as they could push their skills, creating but one liver within the confines of a single fat lamb that was grown until it almost bloated its belly out. It needed to hear something, to be worshipped and made to look for something that might turn it into some rational being. But that was not the case any longer, since the lamb wanted just as much. It was dead and in need of asking no question.

A field along them, all across the bases of the moon, upon the plains, along the turns, where, all the failed attempts were strung and left there to float in spaces that may never be gotten. Forgotten in the gut, he took a knife and slit it up. Driven to do this out of boredom, he wondered if there was a life. If ever after there might be one, coming after his life was done. All too tiresome, he believed, all too similar, from bottom licker to the thin-quiet shell they were pushed into, feeling no remorse as well.

‘I am the Captain of the four blocked-rows, my ships are plenty, they’ve been brought from no uncanny world.’

He made it all up. He was one of the Liver-potters who were driven to boredom and when it happened they had been completely overwhelmed by an urge to harm as many youths as possible, since there was no personal interest involved, they settled as much. Parts of his thighs were missing. In place stood nails that had been as well, dull enough to shatter. Hence they spoke of it no less. Desperate moves, always, no one pointed at it while dreading to come forth while asking question. Crackling around the fence, they were tenderly eating and could not discern the difference between reality and what they were making.

So many fakes had been made that they were starting to believe that they were all real, too finely crafted and shaped.

‘I ought to have known better. And I shall see no other way than needed. I want to eat, after all.’

He thought, but he could not, for the likes of him have another spoon handed to him during the time. It never got easier.

‘Lepers are cowards, they refuse to die.’

‘How would you possibly know that when you’ve never met one in your life?’

‘That is something, isn’t it? I suppose it would be fair to say that.’ He shook the upper side of his lip, from the side of his mouth, making a motion that would resemble something close to a nervous tick. He was envious of him and how easily he trusted strangers that had come from yet to come. It was a different time, a loop that ripped the barrier from the future and ripped apart it had. Their teeth had shattered immediately before they reached the epoch of making it through stars.

A single limb became another, replicating itself until a bridge had been made, leading to the town below them, on the planet, where they would otherwise be met by pain and agony, ascending.

Entry of wax

‘The only treatment to death is disease. It putrefies me so to think that someone would waste all these corpses, readying them for cremation, when they could still be put to use.’

‘What are you intending then? Perhaps we could work something out if you’d be willing to let me try something.’

‘Not yet, I’m still thinking, there’s still something I could take from it. I could make a small cut and enter one of them. From there on out, I could make my home and live inside of them as I keep pushing their bones in form of pillars and make sure that none of them would fall on top of me.’

‘What if they fight back?’

‘I shall meet them with less distraught and see to it that I ate well.’

He considered doing as much, even devouring his way through like the mole-looking decrepit creature he was. It was not what he intended to do, since they were underneath a house of mental illnesses, many of the short-dwarfed murderers being somewhat shabby enough to be repelled by the most daring practices, though that was not something that should be called to. Or veered, steered and pushed into each direction. No, for he knew better than to mix the oil and blood, with his caretakers, that still managed to keep the bodies still somewhat alive, since that would work the best. No one would perform an act of theft any longer, at least not under his guise and under his word.

‘I see no worth into hearing about it now. I think I got the main idea already. They come out of nowhere, they replace one of my bodies with a copy of wax, then they leave with it and refuse to step in line when confronted outside.’

‘You know who the culprits are then?’

‘Of course I do, why wouldn’t I? I’ve spent too much time looking into it to waste nights spreading regrets. I’m far too gone to take a break and for that reason I found one of their faces, pressed on top one of the wax-bodies which were left by there as in a cast. How could they have missed such an important detail?’

Forbid me If you can, but that’s one of them most laughable offenses I could ever think of. I can’t even wrap my head around it without causing myself a migraine.’

Folksom

Hlyiellohth, of deranged lot, stumbled onto her, his body naught. In dreams, partaken, looked upon her broken on the bed, ripped apart and then remade, as he spared not a second, yet. Like a Sheppard, looking over his flock, he could not look away, he did not. Even choose to endure, let alone do as such as to lie and say that he was pure. With every lack of agony fading, making off the door he left. Never seeing her again, instead, he returned back to find her standing in the frame. As no layman would get or touch her pains. He was but a congre-brained, dominating over congre’s fate. He was only forced to look upon them as he turned, most of which were too deranged to lift themselves off spot. Shot down by the illumination coming from the ground they wasted not a second more.

He shared her with them, a fealty to the guilt towards her which fed them more than they would spare themselves to know. With each bite of filth, he saw to it that he did not miss. For this was degrading, immortal, damaging to his pride. They were tearing her apart, yet he had done this, and he had also been the reason she returned. A soul like Hlyiellohth’s could not fathom living without this emotion dreaded, pushing him forth until he would not do. Unfathomably-like in pleasure and in sinew. Least of all would he appease, of no illness from within, he waited. Until there was nothing left, he faded, then he returned.

There she was again, without a piece of her missing. Born without the hate, but pleasure in her eyes instead; whereas he was largely disgusted by his own acts, to even think that he would let her go that way drove him mad. Yet every time his guilt returned, with her in front, and ever-more closer to his broken filthy organ which pulsed and turned. Decrepit teeth, in hair fell through his gums, he could not fathom letting go of her knowing that she would do it again, each and every time. A mad satisfaction and a cackle held him down. He was beaten by her, pushed into the ground. Though there would be no greater pleasure he felt, he knew of this point in his head, the dread which came with it, the guilt and remorse that came with his obsession drew him ahead.

With her below her, only a piece of his lower side, dragged along as his wings spread, not from the back but from the extension of an arm that came out of another arms that came out of another arm that grew out of his palms. Largely twisted everywhere around, uncannily torn to shreds yet flight was achievable. Let alone his sight, pulsating in chests. Both of their improperly aligned, though he could not digest these feeling, the agony that sipped through. Better hidden away from the famine that was being exposed.

For he desired a sole place where he would be punished by her, alone, where none may see the sight, of him being overpowered, burdened by her might, unseen in the disgust he felt for himself when asked what ought to be. He swore of nothing more, delighted to have seen none while making in the flight. Elated by it, even to the least disturbing light, he never wondered, not to want for more. His body shook, as he had knelt and could not help it, but beg for more.

Hlyiellohtha was of the same breed, and of the same kin and of no farther leap off the branch. After all, she had only been part of the share. It could not be even more repulsive, yet he ripped his wings away and asked of her to be beaten and dragged into the ground. Irresponsibly shouting and screaming as he was only dragged down and rubbed around. Crushed and beaten, worse than she had ever endured, only to wake up underneath her, unable to resist, unable to be lure her out of the hole. Out there, where he might hope he could finally escape while she's distracted.

Way too late, for such a loathsome creature that turned him away from the bloated points spread through the night, where skin-like little sockets would appear in a fashion utmost benign; which only took him from his dreams. Nightmares were felt within, for he could only force himself to suffer more. It was wanted, it was needed, enacted like fealty, but poorly prone, without a back-bone, he swore himself to her again. Obsessed and under much distress, he was a lout with none too far to come, impressing none. He fell and far, as his mind went during moments of agony, his body writhed like a dumbbell infantile cobra, whose heads were yet hers to do as she pleased, as no one would tell their better what had occurred in this small chamber between the hidden Mars.

The part of it that was subjugating, a servant with little doubt, knelt like a pitiful dog, repulsed, unable to face himself in the mirrors that were made of crystal in this hold. Hers was a grasp and tear, of which he yearned some more. All of what's he'd done prior, was paid for in the least remorseful tone that went through his mind.

Hlyiellohth had begged.

‘Spare me of this treatment and I shall to whatever’s needed for me to be perceived. As none the making, in the quiet, I shall do it, and take my life unless you drop beneath my feet and bring this to a stop.’

To the request, as thoroughly put as it had been pressed upon her, Hlyiellohtha broke into a laugh. She could not fathom being asked that, it was the least remorseful glance after, was followed by her pushing him through dirt, dragging him along as thoroughly as she could before she'd start again to mourn. And they were unwatched, he felt, despite all the abuse he had taken, untouched.

Till one day, he finally woke up.

It felt strange, seeing his bone grow through his hand until it looked like the giant piece of a trunk made out of eighty bones barely struck together, pouring out blood like a fountain. She faced the other way and in a sudden swoop, half of her head blew off against the glass-walls. He walked on. Hlyiellohtha would not get up from where she stood.

Slowly he started descending, pushing on stones, twenty more miles away.

'Look back.'

Her body follow, bobbling with a broken neck, torn even further as rocks started pushing her innards, forth, most of which being too lost to be recuperated from where they stood, worthlessly overthrown.

Another shot followed from his bone-throat, which took her out of it, for good this time.

She was a dropped stone along a valley of lost desires. And it was only then that she lay upon the stones, suffering of a woe that could not be conveyed, when he left her to whatever misery a rotting corpse would feel under a broken sun. Was he not gentle with her now? Had he not been that way before? It was pitiful, trying to contemplate on what he did wrong, as he already passed the alcove and made it into the first tram, a pseudo-body of a lam. From it there protruded, eight bodies that were convoluted, and pushed out of themselves, uncannily they dragged him on. A few greenish boned-armored, with long faces, dragging onward raised from their seats. There was little time to retreat and go around the place. It was even harder looking at them as no disgraceful creature yet might do. No remorse appeared on his face, disgrace could be smelled as well as his pointer raised the pint of bone, pointing at them.

'Pointing at them, you're pointing at them.'

'Who said that?'

'I did, I said it.'

He could see the long-primitive long-tunnel, from which a mechanical-spider contorted its peculiarly stricken arachnid body, fat and shaped like a bobbling kettle, of which hollow insides held the children of the meddlers that fell from their flying pores, inside the bubbly-trees that stretched along the ford, forming a concave blocked sight, taking away from the slight of the natural tributaries that lay on the other side. And the village which was seemingly lost, he could not care for them, his paleness gone.

They were there, but hiding, trying to decipher the messages they were receiving from the higher-altitude snatchers, with their in-built head-throngs, where they carried them on top of their flying conveyer-belts, pushing through what appeared to be sharp angled rose-plowing machines. Engines kept exploding, then reappearing and from those illusionary puffs of smokes, the trails hardened, keeping the rotating machines in air when the time where they could eat was gone.

Given a free pass in some way, he walked past them, simply because they showed signs of fear. They could not withhold it either. Not that they were prone to violence, by either means, yet they showed it so.

‘We cannot allow that kind of behavior here by no means, especially since it may not be built upon any kind of acceptable parasitism that may ruin our desires and the push that’s keeping us in doubt, for that, we may feel no illness in thought towards you and shall keep no further intended harmful touch. Though it may appear to be so in either case, as we shall only follow through when needed to pierce the gaze, I feel like I have met thee.’

‘I’ve never seen you in my life before this very moment. And I could they even stare at me while I’m only dreading to touch you with my falchion and the bearded gloves I wear to this day?’

‘I do not know, that’s still yet to be what we’re after and what we ought to ask of you. Reveal your soul to us so we may peer in and it shall be said, accustomed to and judged in the manner of which we ourselves judge our own.’

‘And if I wish no ill, my hands beneath these industrial gloves, taken from the factory in which I worked, would they not be proof enough of my past? Is there something my heart hides then that might body naught betray to your cast?’

‘Nonsense, we’re living things, we haven’t been fashioned like your tiny idea of statuettes. I think you’ve wronged us yet again, of which harm may not lay nor bode well with either of us. You’re a fluke that doesn’t belong to this world and the marks on your body are the least of your concerns.’

‘What of them then?’

‘Degenerate marks, you’ve been used. No wonder most of our men look upon you with pity, as you’ve both shown yourself in body and in mind, you’re a fool, a glutton of tools made to be abused in sight.’

Thence forth they surrounded him, before they started. Beating him with tiny sticks until his knuckles darted everywhere around his face, unable to confess or impress any of his own, he looked around and saw no reason to prolong this.

‘If that be so, I shall take no liberty before I decide to punish you. And I shall cast you, of no glance and to no pity of word into the side of the road from whence I came. There, you shall remain for long, until I am done and never touched a slim thin spick of a blade.’

But they disgraced him even further, as they stopped, yet in doubt. Waiting for him to reveal that the bones inside his arm receded, without proof of ever prodding, of ever-farther from their hiding, each root-like bone, being fashioned like their own, unable to cull their brittle-prowl.

They saw the strands, as they were thing. And couldn’t believe how little of them were they displaying in. Shattered or not, he had been brought to a knee, alone, in desperation that he may see.

‘You won’t do anything any longer, for a good reason as well. I seem to have believed you better than this, but now I feel pity for you.’

‘As I feel, too, I knew we would feel just the same.’ Said the other bone-armored standing, pushing one of his crackling sticks against his back, though he knew better than this, he saw no worth in asking, nor would he make an exception for this distaste. Disastrous though it may be, it would save no one to continue, here.

He walked in shame, not hinder, yet of yore he pushed on. A while ascending with little of him shown, emotionless though he had been, if anything off-thrown, by what changed outside. A world that was being dragged upon a much lighter shade, little doubt of whom remained, lesser spoke, more than few. They tried to drag themselves over and listen to the words of hue.

Lights were lost, in words of gray, whom lightly, if not dictated, they darted around to pay. He heeded naught and bowed his head, looked upon a beard, he lay there. Defeated and unable to think of something that may make him bear, of what he knew little, and little more would he say. To them, he’d anchor but a beast and throw and thaw what remained of cold winds that pushed him home. For he knew no better, no other direction, to the least of his kin, neither of them expected him. All had left the place upon hearing what he’s done.

A laughing stock, a miserable thing, he was, unable to contain himself, no matter how hard he tried. Worse, little remained of his home by the time he returned. It was ravaged, savage fiends playing on his lot, taking everything he worked against, leaving naught behind. He was desperate now, for the slightest touch, unable to look no further than the contemplation he’s done across his arm.

It wasn’t supposed to be that much of an awful turn of events.

It’s cold, he thought.

You’re incomplete, it followed, thence he made his way past his house and made it to the city, way before anyone could make up their minds about him in the most peculiar fashion. It wasn’t clear, he tried remembering, but the name of the town was anything but on his mind. Least of all, this would be something he’d have to set aside and hide from them. Not that he had any other idea in mind, but the blue lady was there. First row of errands had to be. It crossed his mind that he would have to rebuild his den somewhere and the best if not the only way to do it was to kill one of the slumlords, whomever that might be. And whenever, if it was destined to happened, crossed ways with him between the sea, he crossed it, hardened, finally enough guts to make it into her store.

The Lady of Command was delighted by this stranger, exotic in appearance, although a bit on the dull side. He had dragged along the common vow a chrysalis, broken in one of the chandeliers she held around, but that didn’t matter much, no longer would she be surprised by any. Even lesser, more than a few, seemed to creep along and see each other, past the brute in the making, other customers came and left. Only he remained there, staring at her, waiting for the right time that he might be as inclined to approach her.

‘I do not think the sky is orange, despite what you may think of it.’

Ever-so clear, as it were, he was only as spiteful as any man would be in his place. Denied of pleasure, he only searched for some to hurt. Harm he would, cast against many, destined to push through and make himself less than aware. He was there, in the very span of a few seconds, then left as if he never existed.

Promoting the touch, he was cold, alarmed, he snatched what appeared to be, a few strands off one of the few barely made wardrobe-stunts, those who looked like mannequin-ruts, grunting as if hurt, shaking but unable to say a word to the act of theft. The Lady looked in another direction, searching for something her hands may grasp. She thought he asked her to bring him something but hadn't intended anything after that. No telling would do, as she could not symbolize the greatness he held of her, as he pushed through. And he suffered just as much as them, in waiting he could not wait.

Yet again, he imagined, he envision and desire as much. Couldn't do too much harm, walking around and touching the bad places. All of which were only a hole in the gabber near the jaw, he was being torn apart and then retouched, cut at the back of the neck where a single mark, deeply pushed down like a melting iron bite with eighteen holes perfectly symmetrical, pushed around and worn out.

'Sold to the highest bidder.'

'But I barely just arrived.'

'I haven't even set down a price.'

'Doesn't matter any longer.'

Spoke the lady in blue, as he had already had it, with all the luggage which pushed from the wing of bleeding threw. 'Now I got it, I shall claim you as my trophy wife. And I shall lock you inside a small glass box, with holes in it for you to breathe, tubes of glass coming from on-top the ceiling. I shall feed you my dear, I shall also breed with you from the small door I will have implanted in it.

Utmost responsible as I shall be, you will be my trophy, never touched by anyone, never allowed to leave, as well as you shall stay in there forever, or how long I shall dictate it.'

He had plans for more, which included, less or more so, a way for her to get rid of her bodily pollution, beneath her in small marks, cut across the floor, beneath her, holes through which she'll carry on. She would not suffer of boredom, but only this should be known. This trophy wife will be one of many, all locked within the confines of his home.

Hlyiellohth considered this, all of them in part, put next to one another, not allowed to leave. Bird in a cage, readying herself for him to rummage in, he was rummaging through the window.

Half-a golden two dimensional bird, as fat as one, on the body of a fish fell from on top the world, from the depths from inside a crack, where each piece had fallen through and wasted in the grim surroundings, and never caught by whichever Thinner giant came to hold it. Let alone would its fall be prevented from achieving beauty. All of them were way too determined, even more, spoken for. Barely touched upon, blue lady presented herself and wished the others well.

No one would look after her store, as it happened for her to be out of the way. Thinking of the past, she pursued nothing any longer. Instead, she grabbed a hold on whatever she could, as blue as they were gray, going out of her way to follow, then stopped along, to convey the lack of emotion that turned her into what she was.

There was something about him that she refused to let go of, as much as she had been charmed by the insolence, the loss of her grip followed. It could not be that she pursued this kind of act by whatever other means, other than that. She desired it, more than anything her soul could go through. A gluttony of thoughts, lamps that were eaten in part yet floated in the air, chains that were torn around them and pulled through deeply set, hive-like spades, from which the forms, that entered their throngs and small spaces in which the small triangular colors without outlines came. Frozen in place momentarily, as they looked like portals where dead-men walked along the way. Imitating them they were, as few as would do, twenty in sight, no line formed but in their minds there was this sudden block, chalking along all the fat stored.

A spring trap, with the body of the ashes, formed around the spherical, elongated canine-teeth, crossed in the back of one of the distrusting dead-men, which set him into flight. Unlike wings, all of those long teeth shot from him like spears, making use of their buoyancy as well as the effect that threw and directed them to the closest walls, instead of prying away, they reach and bounced, and climbed upon them until he finally came out of the colored triangle. He was lynched in an instant as a color rope strung him in the back.

A malignantly black voice came from inside the depths.

‘You are not allowed.’

And he was there ever since, ignored by the Blue lady and her Spouse. Neither of them could be bothered to look forth as they could barely trust one another with what was going. Never mind the fact that he had given himself a chance to choose. And they would go through with it and slay the landowner, as well as he could prize himself to push past it, in his misaligned house.

Many of the buildings were not only set on different levels, not just raised by the ground but they seemed to be set in place, pushing through the very land, in themselves and everywhere. From on top one there came the disaster, as one of the head-pioneer construction workers was unfit to connect the pieces of what had passed through the folly along his feet.

‘I’ve seen enough of this place I made. Of the plans to understand that we were worked to death for nothing.’

‘Why is that, oh Pioneer?’

‘Simple, it’s way too simple, and how could I have not thought of that before?’

‘Were you not given a chance then?’

‘I should’ve been given no more. I ought to have known my limits but I have failed then and I know that I will fail again.’

But I had plans, great plans to bring ruin to everything I helped create.’

‘Why such malice?’

‘Because I realized that it was all in vein. I was so caught working that I failed to understand that what I looked at, by the time I was done was something way too deranged for anyone to live in.’

It is something that governs their lives. This place speaks for itself but I can hear nothing coming around. My ears are shut and I cannot believe myself when I think about the foundation.'

'What made the foundation what it is?'

'Nothing, and that is the point. A lack of a soul, ugliness, a mockery of form, nothing that may touch the likes, and I dread to think of those that may follow me around and seethe.

As I have known the truth and pushed myself out of this loop they're trapped in.

Where they see a reflection of deformed beauty, I see the ugly I have helped create. And what is there left to do for the Pioneer if not bring everything down as soon as he was dead?'

'Could you not live and help correct this mistake without tearing it down?'

'By far, and far, I know of this, you're a stranger, an outsider, you would not understand. For what I've done had my mind set on it and I will not be able to create such likes no more.

It's a sea of hopelessness I may not yet rise out of. Horses of spears, sea no less, they came upon it and dragged it no less than expected, a few feet away.

He still could not believe it, even after all this time, to have come and stumbled upon these words had put him, even less, in stride. He pushed on and came to know naught and even less than what he wanted, he could not taste his own blood for the likes of it, moon be endowed. But beaten as he was out there, the couple left in doubt, thinking of no less than wanted.

'We should've done something to help the poor creature. After everything he's done, it's the least of all what he deserves. Should he not at least get it, past no worth, a land of pride, though this may not be, I think.'

'You need to shut your mouth and listen to me. I will not have you talking while you're in your box. That much you should know.

I will keep you locked and I may even go as far as to throw a wardrobe's worth of cloth on top of it if that means I won't have to listen to you wince.

And I shall take away your light and keep it pressed, never in distress as I will have never asked of you proof, in the making or of worth. With that, I say.

He was a lost cause, in doubt and disobedience, he proved himself as no more than a pathetic creature and a spineless coward.'

'But he realized he was wrong, should that not be enough for him to be redeemed?'

'That is why you're not worth listening to, my Lady in blue. You simply don't understand me, you cannot fathom simple things, as one may know.

If you were to look around you now, you will have noted that he built all this. Although he may not have built it all by himself, there's nothing one may come to do as to antagonize him in all he went through, past the point, for what he's done. Was nothing but an act of cowardice in the fact that he had second thoughts.'

'But he's realized that he was in the wrong.'

'You poor-minded lady, you don't understand it. Why is it so hard for a lady such as yourself to wrap your head around it?

He's gone through it already. He's build everything, it's done. There's no more time left for him to feel shame and regret after everything has been laid down. If you were to see everything for what is was, then you'd understand.'

'Then make me understand, husband.'

'I can't. I've tried but your mind isn't working properly for that kind of inner-working to bear some threads on you.

He is a murderer of beauty. And once beauty has been put to rest, once it died, there's nothing one could do about it but put the shame away and accept what he's done.

Tearing down this creation would yield nothing but an unfathomable guild of trust. He would not know what to do after.'

'Rebuild it, maybe?' Lady of blue intervened, but she could see it on his face that he would not have it.'

'No, you don't understand it, you frustrate me to no end. He's gone through it already, it's done. His mind is already there, during the time he had laid the bricks upon the foundation and made everything the way it is in sound. And in the making, I know that his hands may never know beauty.

Only this, for he had not only been a part of the construction, but he's seen the plans and seen through it; too much had been revealed, can't you at least get that?

He's shown himself for what he is and how he's got here, and now?'

He had put him to rest, where he belonged. And the two of them had only went through one of the cordial places where they would never sit around, no less than needed. They seem to meet familiar figures, though they may not be acquainted yet, they seem way too similar to be plainly ignored. For what was worth, there was no point in admitting he was in the wrong. They were docilely present there for no other purpose other than to stir trouble. One of them came out of his way and asked for nothing.

'Billt, I think we met outside, during that uncomfortable ride. You may not have seen me there, but I have. I've seen you plenty.'

'Why are you here Billt? And who are those friends of yours?'

Bodies of enforcers, tall and brutish, it was more than settled that they wanted something from him, and he could only thrust around at every corner before picking on a bush. Some were burning, and they would burn forever because the leaves started growing back. He wondered at that, but refused to make a noise out of the fact that he could be tripped around and made do on the floor. Beaten again after he moved on, although this would be anything but pleasurable, this was the exact confrontation he had hoped to press beyond.

‘Thought you could surround me here, in a closed space?’

‘It was never our intention and let me assure you that we have none. We don’t mean to harm you or your lady.’

‘Then why are you here?’

‘I had to approach you about something.’

‘Spill it then, Billt, I won’t listen for long and I won’t stay any longer unless my interest is peaked.’

‘My daughter has been taken away from me, someone kidnapped her during a moment of weakness when I wasn’t present to protect her. And I know you have some sort of connection with the man responsible for her disappearance.’

‘Think again.’

‘It matches his description, and the man he’s been around ever-so often, which can be confirmed by various people, matches yours.’

‘What do you want from me then? If I were to tell you that I hadn’t spoken or met anyone for months, other than.’

He took a moment to recollect himself. This was not the time, not the place and, despite being somewhat closely related, he could not divulge the whereabouts of his previous woman to her either. He chose the murmur. He said enough.

‘I think he left the town and the area, some good months ago.’

‘He’s been seen around town a few days at least, and that says a lot.’

‘But I haven’t been in this town for over a few weeks at the very least. If anything, I don’t think.’

‘With my daughter.’

Both of them stopped for a moment. Now it made sense to him, he was nothing more than a concerned father, nothing to lose either. He doubted their interests, but not his. He relented nonetheless.

‘There’s nothing I can do about it. He never had a set address, always leaping from one place to another, never in the same building twice.’

Not that it would help itself in any either case since the buildings appeared to switch places despite not showing any signs of changing along the way. It was all too tiresome, trying to catch and follow him around. But they were getting desperate.

‘Come with us then, we could use the extra hands.’

Billt looked at the Lady in Blue, pointing at her, making sure I understood. Of course I would not ask that of her, that would be too much.'

'I think we can get somewhere with this.'

He pointed at a large, almost tip of glass that came from below the wreckage they were in. This den had been one of the fallen-over houses, lain-out because of a quake or because someone planted a mole inside the structural pillars. It was all too tiresome at this point. He could do nothing to have himself placed in.

'Make a few holes in it. Put her in there afterwards and we'll have a deal.'

'You heard him, do as he says. Make sure there's enough space in the back for her to sleep in as well.'

'I suppose I have no say in this?'

'Not any longer. You agreed to this, Lady, now you're going to have to wait until I'm done.'

They acted in an extreme fashion and were done by the time he had blinked again. Large brutish tubes of sealing, all wrapped around iron-spiked chains. And the tubes were pipe-lined around them, ruddy-brown, hardened around each worm-ring. It was a wonder how they managed to shape everything and batter them like tiny pebble-crushers in the same way. But he had not condemned himself any longer. Only Billt's daughter mattered for him.

Any other way he looked, there would be no reason to shake off the sad feeling and wait for the doubt to be plain. He was shaken, outpaced, saw her being taken away by force, then thrown inside her crystal hold. Her cage only reflected her beauty, but it was time to leave.

'I need to know more about Discalmo if we are to find out where he is.'

'I'm afraid you wouldn't enjoy hearing about what kind of man he was.'

'But I would, especially since my daughter's life is at stake.'

'Has he requested anything as of yet? Perhaps, left something of a ransom along the way? A note, a paper, a small trail, a poster or?'

'Nothing, he was only seen with her by eight-lookers. Most of whom reported the same thing. I don't know whether or not he's accompanied by someone else but I'm about to find out.'

He left just as much to be thought. He knew better than to walk around when not seen. The four of us came to his car. It was a wild-vehicle, arranged in the postmoneau-fashion that was often associated with crawling men, who never repented at the time they were dead. Someone was present there, in the hood of the car. He was already molded into it and appeared to have two arms un-jointed, holstered along the wheels and around each passing rim of his limbs.

His face was disfigured, as was the rest of his body. With this in mind, he made the vehicle work faster than before since he put on more strength lifting it. But even the general thing wasn't easy to look at. Too many lights and too many metallic-junkyard bits had been placed on top. Way too many repairs for a fashionable fellow to put on, meaning that Billt was anything of the kind; he also wore dead pets below our feet, barely sutured against the parcel carpets.

It was all the mind he needed from there on now. Since he had no concern over his own well being, it was all too obvious that he had no concern over any of their well beings and could do well without them. After a while, his sight was bizarre. It's gone too long now, obsessed with sights, he saw no light but the inverse. In their sockets, there was neither a spark, nor a rock, nor signs that they owed their sights to what was going on there. He alone could feel no arm pumping inside of him and that he often felt since it had been implanted inside of him by the time of his youth, making sure his heart was getting enough action to make it through in time. That made him question in.

Who else might've abused this sight? And where was his delightful lady now? Would they lay hidden? He had had to make sure of it, that no one might stumble by accident upon her, especially the low-lives that decided this would be a great time to become stationary and act utmost suspiciously, that she would be properly made do with and obscured from any possible intruder. By his own words of choice.

'I think we can understand one another as from a man to another man. I think that is the sole reason I decided to follow you in the first place. But I feel as if she would be much safer if she stood there, somehow, in the same spot, in the same place, in her cage, but covered up so no one might kidnap her away.'

He understood too well and even acted nonchalantly about this whole conundrum. But I could not live knowing that my dear was in such a danger as to be prescribed or taken away from my sight.

Not that this was a matter that should be discussed here. I felt solemnly well, caught in my own antics, thinking of her that I refused to acknowledge that we passed her blue shop on our way to find the Billt's daughter, in guise.

I could see only awe in his face as I simply wondered whether or not she was still there. Perhaps she could make it in time to witness her replacement in action, and to think that I almost missed that. Paler, and younger, Hlyiellohth already considered acquiring a new spouse.

There were some unspoken things that got the chance to be exchanged as well. They didn't jolt into it immediately, but made the first turn down the intersection and came into a private joint. Only the two of them entered, as dissatisfied as they seemed. It did not bode well with him. His chest was heaving, but he was hearing just enough to take away.

'What's that, again?'

'My daughter, she's fifteen.'

'Think something happened between the two of them.'

'It most certainly did.'

That man is a fool, he walks alone now, he cannot understand what's going on in the swoon. He has no disregard for no one and for no tool which makes the city rise up to the higher levels where they're waiting for him with little cuts and wonder. Who's the strongest? Who might lose the least compassion?

‘How does this happen?’

‘How can this happen to him?’

With each step, his limping legs could only be seen like a deformed line from which his face melted on the side, in the form of melting paint on top of a bone fence his features melted on. And he kept himself together with the help of his unnaturally elongated bone arms. A Grim man of disease came forth, and followed him around. The Grim man wore clothes of human-skin tapestry of greenish-olive skin, and a conical extremely yellow hat. Fencing around him, he wanted to show teeth, but they were cockroaches that moved inside. His eyes were two small dots, that were by no means anatomically functional. He also had only one arm which held a peculiar evil wand, bearing the head of dirt-ivory crest with many miniature peg-legs pushing out of a shrunken head.

‘This is my new home and I will make sure I will get the chance to pick you on from where I left you.’

The Grim man introduced himself, P’piroth.

‘I am P’piroth, and I am an arsonist-criminal who enjoys setting small animals of fire. Especially cats and dogs and other plain pets, I want them dead and I want them set on fire.’

He proved his point, then never looked back at them. Knowing he’s proven his point, he started and darted, and went to the Olive-Melt. He’s done something and went ahead.

‘We shall be, from now on forth, friends, going on plains of colors, I see red and blue combined with yellow hues of ochre-purple, barely touched. We shall walk on them and see something that patches the cold-touched of bulls that go around.’

‘I see no bull.’

Said Olive-Melt, but he looked around and he could see the most abstracted forms of bulls that rushed from corner to corner. And they rode them, because their insides were those of the pets that had been completely eaten and burned. Crisp inside and coal-urged to end themselves, they spoke no less, they were impressed.

‘That Grim man is great. The Grim man P’piroth accepted, dared all around and wasted no less than needed in time.’

Laughter was the only impartial factor in the whole affair. Since it was not there, moot points, sipped along, the louts drank around and could not stay for long.

Firefly-bulbs, with no glow but a trail made out of dissipating stacked caterpillar insides scum were just about the place. Wingless but in flight, no distinct insect feature but the same noise was made at that. And they would settle even there for less.

The Grim man looked sad in some way. Neither of the drunks were shocked by it either, but it was plain that he felt off. They were dreadful, in any feasible way. He ignored them, all along the way.

‘Grim man, oh Grim man, tell me why am I like this?’

And while he walked, instead of pressing steps, another line of distorted fences formed around each trim of the false lake-platform beneath them upon which they walked. Though it was a lake of stone that kept only the slightest tormented hints of a texture that would be forlorn.

‘I set bull-cat on fire.’

‘Don’t set the bull-cat on fire, we won’t be able to stop the arson.’

‘Then I’ll go with that sea-gull bog, I will set its wings and he will erupt when I say it.’

He had no inhibitions there.

Each hear-trim from on top his wand blew a small load of liquid fire. Eight broken ribs at least, he would otherwise show some signs of being longed for, in all that ruckus going on, with all the while all the while he could not take his eyes from the grand prize and green surroundings, walls painted with the blood of grass. There was nothing he had asked for, there on out, being vague.

‘I shall spread the flames wherever needed if I have to.’

Another one remained with him. He was bloated, in one eye, termite-handler-like in terms of his body being as tall as one might have it. Even further than what appeared to be a rabid-shaped tendon of muscles, one which attempted to push out. He dreaded recalling what went on, yet asking all the while.

‘I shall take you to the nearest Partage, there we shall sail in one of the cars and make it as far as eighteen miles in whichever direction you’d like to make it to.’

Regardless of how he looked at it, there was plainly no clear direction. He was only made for this disaster in terms of making I half-way through. But he could not, for the likes of him fit in a car, being too wide, hips compensating, after being pushed around and asking for the other one to come all way through.

‘I am but a living thesaurus, I hold all the guts inside, don’t ask of it, for I am way too dull to be counted through. I’ll see to it.’

But he spoke nothing more and saw the hue and asked of less. They were only tying themselves as they would cope with what they could. So many unfashionable choices presented themselves to every single one. No man would ever wrap himself or his needs amongst them, being closer to anyone but them. It was an act of desperation, that which made the man in front of them look as deprave as he seemed to be. Crushed around for every needle was a spear of agony that poured out of him, a fountain appearing in his back, pushing him out of the way but only in part, until it shot back and everywhere around. He would not be allowed to grow.

‘I shall know it when I’ll see it.’

‘And what would that be?’

‘You know what it is, that spinning disc, I think.’

There was no reason, beating hearts ran dry without their life-support being attached. Hers was but a phantom's calling and tears, a ransom for every stolen child that never met the one. One could not ignore the couple. Since they were walking backwardly on purpose.

It never made sense. Not by much. Their lives were underwhelming, to say the least. 'I can't seem to find it either. Do you remember where you placed it?'

'No, but it's nowhere near the place, is it?'

'The one, oh, I see.'

He looked away in shame. No, it could not be shame. It was hard to describe.

But he realized it nonetheless.

'I suppose this is it then, isn't it? I'm responsible for all the trouble they've been through throughout the years, through the epoch, their lives and nearing the end of their lives, I was to be their executioner.'

He looked away from a moment, barely realizing what had been. Forced to act when he didn't want to resulted into him thinking of nothing at all, his arms lame, his bloody telling head only a wreckage.

'Wreckage-tattletale, wreckage under way, I see one of them rowing onward, no one said. And no one ever knows what's coming, since the winds are hard. And my teeth are crawling, they see around and see none.'

'He knows a lot, we ought to follow his Grim man and see where he might lead us to.'

Another one of them joined soon after, as they could not even focus on the lighter he had on him. The madman emerged victorious and had little to no emotion as he'd done it. He was wildly set and could not deter the others from following him ahead. Yet mightily, he told them.

'Careful now, if you want to come. If you follow through, I'm sure to let you know that there won't be any way back. I'll see to it that we might suffer a stroke, let alone an attack.'

And the others paled, citizens who would not remained could not face the on-coming squabble that came forth. They were, if anything made out of a yolk unlike not other, whitened in dust, some wearing dark-skinned figures on top of them as well as their finely shined white-bellies and they dragon-boxes, pained at such. Pained by their termite-launchers, shaped, again, but by no means loaded with anything else but their vicious-looking fat guts, they came. Many of them wearing larger hats, painted red, and their missing arms were on the wrong sides. And all the while, it seemed that, with their disappearance, other missing gaps were left, they bled because of them. Some just died.

'I think there's something we can still do. I'll address their infantry-leader and see what I can do to get us under-way. I don't think he's a complete savage, if you understand the likes, as I will have known better than it.'

Today he'd talk, tomorrow he'd be struggling to tell right from left. Erected upon a pillar that held no direction, he only wanted to be done.

'I've come to suggest you an armistice, if you don't mind me paining you with such a thing, a jibber-jabber like that would only drag you down with the rest of us.'

'It's late for that, we know.'

'Shall we take the other side and settle this like gentlemen then?'

'I see no gentle creature, you're followed by brutes, but I suppose that so am I, for that I can not think of anything that might set this as being right. We're both, if anything, unable to make it through. It's all, so petty, you know?'

This squabble has been formed because we wanted to have your head and it shone.'

'Had it?'

'Of course it had, Grim man. You're just one of many, look behind you.'

Other Grim mans came. And they were even more deranged, as they appeared to wear other hats, mostly spherical, others mostly tainted and bent, though in the wrong positions they remained and spared no one from looking ahead and knowing, least of all what they would deal with. Many bearing other fire-tools, just like him. Though they mastered many of them and could not deal with the kin, they only trashed the place, uncannily destined to whim. Once the terms were set, before he could have himself pointed, at what he heard.

'I think we could resolve this if we try a little bit harder.'

'I'm all ears but shall not do without any kind of compensation. I want something in exchange for this armistice or no one shall remain standing, not while I'm still breathing, definitely not while there's still a chance.'

And I shall drag you forth and throw and thaw.'

'What was that?'

He didn't need to, as he saw. Many of his ill-men started melting, from their sticks. They were not his people but mere bits he had employed, trickery which would foil every kind of malignant ploy he could set himself to. It was all too senseless.

The man in front of him was too deformed, his face torn, eyes pushed through his mouth, teeth overgrown, his arms part of them, spine contorted, a part of everyone in the crowd connected to his back. They were his, enslaved, dragging along as they could only feed him so he would remain there. Slowly he melted in the marking of a wild-disease which had been shared by the Grim man. Torn between his wild reaction, the walls were drawing out, strung in action. Some were set aside, and drew from their long-nostril taps, twisted and yearned for as more blood emerged.

'We have to live through this eternally, do you not understand that?'

'I do, but I think it's pointless trying to show you any kind of sympathy since you will have died by the time I'll be through with you.'

‘Then allow me to do this.’

He pointed, pulled, like the bullet of a heart, from his he drew on and pushed on. He could not help it, as wild as it seemed, too many things didn’t make sense, he was deterred from it yet again.

‘I cannot harm you.’

‘I knew that. Perhaps that’s why I’m the only one still standing here, in wait.’

The supreme leader of the squabble failed to notice how only the two of them were standing. To be certain, the two of them and the rest which were leashed and fed upon, although they could not matter by any means since they were sucked upon and could only be used when needed and worn out. He relented with such things, trying to catch the slight hinges that were keeping him still. Dead-inside and rotten by the fact that he ate a child twenty minutes prior to this meeting of theirs; though most importantly had been the fact that he was not to be touched. He was wrongly distraught.

Everyone else left when he faced him, the Grim thing, he was no man.

‘Only a cowardly creature would.

But.

I.’

‘You’ve been defeated, haven’t you? While I was distracting you with the armistice, I knew that everyone else would cower and run away.

They would not risk a confrontation.’

Also there was the bloated creature of which fence became bones still and his features melting, pushed out and only melted inches as they were unnerved. He had been observed by neither of them, since the way he bled and the features that remained had been obscured by a disease of perspective. The way he stood appeared to be in the mid-way point of the pool made out of their bleeding bodies, the fence and the wild filth-dysphasia in its utmost ill-inclined state. With that in mind, they feared less, not to confess to the fact that he was in distress as well.

A mouth lay shut, both in and out as some things were not meant to be spoken as plainly as they were. Pain was a disgraced merely because it was not a physical thing he felt, but rather one of mild-distress. Mentally he was inert. Through his teeth his lip melted, and through it, his heart sunk forth, compressing the bobbling of his head, away.

‘I shall do my best, my lords, mighty ones who want me to serve. I shall stab him when I can.’

But at last, he decided to swerve.

It was not meant to be, a pity, a pity, a pity.

‘I’ll make you a deal that way. If you allow me to eat your ear, I shall give you the chance to pass through without being touched by any of my men, upon which I have complete control, thrown forth and exchanged when no one might make it.’

And he was born on a rock, which was the womb of a wombat-fat, creature of celestial grace, of which unfathomable black-wings were sea-creatures which were cut and put together, rotten in the one string that pierced through them. And from each angle there shot another string, made out of the mad-rotten wind that was fat and made out of thin-skinned lumps, of gray fumes of green songs, which bloated the mammal-mother, until from the side there came the pillars of heads. Bearing her young children, each head had been a womb. Worn and torn apart, they only shook. And many creatures appeared to have encased themselves, deeper in.

As the wombs were rather disemboweled on their insides and appeared to have torn apart the umbilical-cord until it had become a large pea-like spherical thing which ate the fetuses inside their heads, making it seem like they were fat-lumped spines inside the transparent bellies that were tearing them apart and pushing them away from the other heads.

Most intrusively, the head-pillars only appeared to come from the lower side of the mammal’s back, being encrusted on a skin-torsion, that had been attached to a fake-torso on the lower side. From the lowest of their barely-ample set thing compressor of fat, deranged in its appearance, a head was brought.

Cut from the likes, smashed inside, then put on top a torso that was also painted white. Thence his pseudo-birth attained; the being now remained in the sludge coming from the sky-pollution, in the wreckage of a filthy poise, dreaded along, and pushed along the dreadful throng. He had only took his time now to recall.

The beauty of his almost twice-conjoined moth-mammal progenitor that had finally released the pheromones, coming out of its titanic flat head, through which her neurons faded until the malignant creature finally surrendered to the dumb-struck spell she wore. For what was worth, none could lay even less than it was desired, forth. In desperation, he achieved the battery of his insides, trading and treating them as no one would, desperate in sight.

‘I wish I could have only a bite, please, I need it, I cannot explain why. But I feel as if I could have you, it’s something close to my arousal.’

‘Then I will not partake in such a disgusting ritual as there is. I’ll have nothing to do with it and would rather keep away.’

He had no certainty and would not catch himself past them. He was desperate to do it and would only kill if necessary, if he wanted to pull an ear, take heed or draw ahead. This was his chance to reach forth and pull the insides from his guts, well-torn. Apart and from the sides, he’d wage, and hinge around each bitter-cut. Disturbed and even less than needed, he got close but reeled back on.

‘I’ve given you my final answer.’ With as much certainty as his body provided. ‘And I have no intention of repeating myself, otherwise, I would get extremely mad.’

That alone was something he wanted to draw on and leave it as it may, never to take it for granted and push it out, as much, as he said.

‘I will lay on you no word of pride, but you need to listen and abide.’

‘What to and what might you tell me?’

‘My plans and my pains, since I found out your weakness, I suppose that we might stay.’

He had it lain out to him, in every detail and for every reason, something being given to him. Though he could not contemplate or give him any reason, this was pointless to argue with.’

It was unwell. As long as no one tried pushing them out and crying for as long as they could tell, no one would make trouble. Worn out, at least from the looks of it, the Grim man came forth, he found himself sniffing him only to feel a slight scent of a cologne made out of the disemboweled refuge-seekers from the lower sides of town, the ones that had been forced inside the variously concave spherical holes that had been hardened through the soil. Though they looked like air-tightened foam, there was nothing in them wearing them down. Instead, they bore no lesser feet, of which formed adorned the walkers who had their elongated legs reach small bottle-like rockets. Inside of them air-support kept the lives of old folk still going. Worn out by the looks of it, those were the lives that should’ve been spared of living since they were so sleazily forlorn.

Growing inside their tight spaces as they received, upon a given time, a giant cargo filled with the weaklings kidnapped from town. Fed by them, they would not be disgraced to charge and crawl from their distant corners, like wild arachnids on a web. Attaching their wild openings from their rockets, slowly eating what they could instead. It was painful, watching but hearing this go, a harrowing mass being taken and lo’, they were done. Everyone has been fed and they looked the part. Unrecognizable as humans from the side of the glass dome, from behind their rounded throne, in it they waited and lest of all would they inquired. To come closer to it, they admired one another after, spending the time as they could do.

But they were not fashioned for that kind of activity, nor would they relent by any means. They prized themselves as much as they could do, even sharpening their long disease. What else could their long-legs be called? Or the infantile creatures they pushed even deeper, for each spherical depth only got darker, until it pushed them to be blind? Light was stolen, their cries were heard, but echoes died in the distance, waiting, for no savior came forth. Restless nights were spent by them, as they would torture and dissect, though that could be called, if anything at all, nothing but the filth and practice, something of their inability to leave the place, unless they were to be banished even farther away from town. Leaving them as outcasts here, better to be done with it now.

‘I think we should put this tinier one out of its misery. I would hate to see it suffer more.’

‘Then who’s stopping you exactly? The council already established that their lives not worth.’

Neither could there be called out. There was no council, it was a lie. But they could create, abolish and undertake any kind of law or notion, out of the bottom of their hearts, their organs of drowning, of bitter remotely crowning during times of pain. After them nothing could remain as it had been, as they were too destructive, far too often they had ended up ruining everything when never seen. Friction marks lay against their machines. Rockets that were duds, nothing within only the gluttony that pushed out of them, yet as harmlessly caught as they were, there was no reason to wait for an attempt to escape. They were far too useless and vapid for such a thing, hence they would be ignored.

As well as they ought to be. The Grim man waited, his legacy of thoughts tainted, pained as he were by what was going on around him.

Dulled around, he continued. Without the charms, he only wanted this done. With and forth, he whipped his wand around, the shrunken teeth danced with the gore of liquid fire, erupting with flames that were not read but of skin and of moving filth. They looked like a polluted river, through which small parts of men fell. Those were his liquid and his normal fire, made to be bred and to grow inside the animals he had set them on. Somewhere out there, his servants would require less, they wouldn't ask nor would they be impressed.

He failed to realize it, like every man before him. Every living being in this universe, no matter how weak or frail, how innocent they looked, instead, wore a heart of worms, a rotten core, a soulless thing, of no worth, as a trinket of rust, a filthy cast.

'You don't want to do that.'

'Why not?'

'It's slippery down there.'

'I can still make it half-way through it without falling over. That and you can always pick me up.'

'I can't pick all of you up.'

'I believe you can, don't worry about it. We'll see eye to eye on the other side.'

'But how will pick you up if I make it before you?'

They walked at the same pace.

They would be well.

His mind in the matter would not tell of it, especially since it could not go as far as it would strain itself.

Yes, yes, he thought, you're smart fellow, are you not? I could make great use of you if only you stood here long enough. If only I could get you on my side, then I'd, I'd. A simple crooked slide waited ahead.

Can't always make the difference on what's going on and what's about to happen, focusing on the road is way too distracting for a single person to look into. Also, there's someone who joined along the way. Couldn't think of him right now, but it will come on some day. He was desperate to get a word in, he was bloated in some way. He didn't say a thing but merely acted as if he was one of us.

Both of us looked at him, then, he was joined by others. All of them, cuts, small cuts of the same cloth as well as wider ones and some whom were winded because they were pushed on ahead. On the spiked bone-flat substance which hardened as much as a fence would.

They spoke about something else.

‘Hey, have you ever thought about how the language system may have been invented?’

‘Why are you mentioning this?’

‘It’s simple, that’s why. I don’t know which linguist said it, perhaps it was Guerthie or D’schon, perhaps a French linguist of some kind, but if I remember correctly.

I think he proposed the idea that the written language may have been caused by a natural selection, forced by environmental pressure.’

Though this was not the right time to think about it, he remembered something. He started putting things together.

‘First of all, we know that artists, painters and architects are supposed to train their eyes, aren’t they? In order to interpret what they’re seeing, in order to transfer that tridimensional form on a two dimensional surface, they have to use their trained eyes and minds.’

‘That’s fair enough, but how does that translate into a written language?’

‘That’s simple, they were the same descendants of the ancient peoples, directly or indirectly whom have made all those primitive cave-drawings during the time man had still yet to fully come out of his dark hidings.’

He went on ahead to look around. His mind dictated every sound and every move and every point he thought about.

‘Artists are the key, or were the key of understanding it. Did you know that the Aboriginal people had hundreds of spoken language yet they never, if they ever had, a primitive hidden written system, felt the pressure of creating a complex one? Why do you think that is?’

‘I don’t know.’

The Grim man was confused. He had not the slightest knowledge of what any of this meant. Yet he continued to look into it.

‘Not every tribe that every existed needed to develop a written language system, that much is clear. It was pressure, the environmental pressure, the society, the civilization, the increase in intelligence which made the primitive man create it. That, linked with curiosity and intelligence made his time worth investing into.’

He thought about it for a moment more.

Some things didn’t make a lot of sense. Why was that?

‘Are you aware that, well, there are studies that say that reading from one of those fancy screens is much slower than reading traditionally?’

‘You mean from the pseudo-mechanical devices? I suppose.’

‘That’s because those are projections, small dots on a screen that get represented on it, projected, fashioned, but they’re flat, like the screen.

They’re not forms, man cannot train on it, the eye can make the difference between the flat and the bump, the slightly raised and everything else. But that’s only adding to the fact that the written records and the language system has been forced by our minds, who started interpreting the sings, which started recording everything and putting it down.’

‘But I don’t understand why that happened to begin with.’

‘I, suppose. Well, since those buffaloes may have been the first written language system, it may have been developed as a means to stimulate cooperation.

That’s the most humane thing I have managed to find while looking through the insides of our human ancestors.

Since not everyone would have the chance to leave their caves out of their ancestral fear that they might be killed, humans learned cooperation. Humans learned a means of teaching themselves as well as their fellow tribesmen of what they might look into and what they might fear. What they might hunt and what to look for when they near maturity.

A way to teach their young, a way to earn their trust and allegiance, since sounds would not be enough to describe what to look for, they had to develop something in order to search for means of survival. It’s what’s driven advancement in the first place, what guided man through his errands.

Over a long period of time he must’ve learned something, along the way. He must’ve borrowed, developed, forced into something new. There came the need of advancement, the need to improve, to innovate, all because human beings were curious and were inherently cooperative because they shared common ground.

That means that language is the bare-backbone of man, it’s what gave him an advantage over every other kind of creature out there.’

‘But how?’

‘Scratches, it must’ve started with scratches on the wall. First he must’ve done it from a primitive manner, testing tools. Build tools, use tools. Hit object with tool, hit animal with tool. Tool leaves mark. Mark means bleeding, animal dies.

Scratch and hit means result.’

‘And why would this mean anything for the language.’

‘Because humans had to adapt their eyes, they had to record things and leave something behind for the next generation.’

‘And the artists and screens?’

‘Everything, don’t you get it? Every single thing has been built upon something. It’s how we got here. Primitive Aborigines had nothing to build upon, thenceforth their language may not have been complex at all. They were not pressured into it.

Pressure, intelligence, curiosity, prior knowledge, mistakes, it was on the bare backbone of them that humanity created language. It’s been a tool for them ever since. And with it, they created just about everything.’

Sings were there, scratches, noises, recognition, some of it did not fit. They tried putting them together but could not see it. But it all clicked when humans started looking at one another and distinguishing themselves. That force which made them all so different is the back-bone upon which they made the language, the written tools.

‘If a man may distinguish between himself and another man, he may distinguish between an animal and another man. It is imperative for him to create, by any means necessary.

Once the process started, it could not be stopped by any means possible. This pressure made man. This pressure gave him the tools necessary to build upon everything he has and everything he’s ever had.

He could make the difference between the slightest hints of color, shade, he could put in on display and because of it.’

‘You’re side-tracked again.’

‘Right, right.

Animals, they were animals who had to build something.

But.’

The thing he pointed at were the abstract objects, the shapes, as sterile as they were, have been nothing but the result of a superior race, the creation which was pushed upon the selection made by breeding, choosing, the derangement.

‘Hatred for those who looked different, who had an affinity for similar looks and despised those who looked different, that had been part of it. That’s what drove humans to push deeper and create. Not the inner conflict, but that against others who pushed against them.

If it were not for it, they would not have been made, it could not have been as complex a system as it is. Language had always been a tool of war, a tool of superiority, a tool of destruction, which was employed based on the pressure caused by others, internal struggle and cooperation between kinsmen.

It's been nothing more but a huge curve, a charge of some kind, a moving power, wealth that leaped around and forced it to develop into something. Recording every living thing, giving an advantage of knowledge which was given by the ones in power, known as the elite.

For the elite was god, and god was mighty, and they ruled upon the filthy and the insurmountable, unkindly.'

He could not see the words for what they were. Shapes, a result of the trained eye, for that reason any man who would stare for too long at them would strain his eyes, up to the point where he could maim his sight. Though he could not be dumbfounded, focusing for too long made everything go wrong. Out of focus, the mad-man said. Out with it, through all the mindlessness he could not push himself, nor look away.

'It came from them, it was developed, preserved.

That's another important tool, preservation. In order to build upon the signs, first men had to be exposed to them in order to understand and get curious about those findings.

Afterwards, they would have to live long enough for them to make sure everything was carried over, preserved and taken over.'

'But what of other parts of the world which had been completely sealed away and could not have taken in the message? How did they develop language?'

'Too much information, it could just be that there was too much information to be recorded.

Fright drove them as well, fright might've been the power that pushed them to develop.

If a man fears a predator of nature, creatures that were wide-spread across the world, he might fear for his life and that of his child, his nearest of kin, it must be the natural thing. But they cannot understand noise. Noise alone might not be enough to warn someone.

And once a tribe would be developed enough, they would find whatever means necessary to alarm the others of the threat. Survival depended on it, henceforth they started it.'

'Could be the eyes and what the shapes look from the distance.'

'Could be. Suppose there's a small panther leaping around. If you were to distinguish it from everything else, especially from the distance, that would save your life. And with that in mind, think of this. Read and destroy your eyes. You'll understand, once the panther will be out of focus, once you'll lose contact with its face, you'll see it as a shape, a moving shape and nothing more.

It's must've been that, a reason, our eyes, their specialization, intelligence, breeding.

We've specialized into looking, into interpreting things from the distance. And the most intelligent survived. The fittest managed to leave their marks because they must've been so-so excited about their superiority, about their mental prowess, that they must've shown off by leaving their marks across the caves.

Hence they would impress the rest of the tribe, and thence he would impress whichever female he wanted, and then he would claim her as her own. Since she would see something that put him up there, standing out not by means of fitness but that of his eye, by the satisfaction that he created something and he put it forth against everyone else.

And that's how language must've been created in the first place. He was chosen, he survived. He was intelligent enough, for a primitive man to warn the others and represent the arts. The arts is the language, the signs and the paintings, it is what put some races above the others in the past. IT was this superiority of creation which made them gods.'

'But they were not treated as such.'

'I wouldn't expect as much. But you're putting hierarchy over nature. And it was nature who put everything together.'

And thence he started pushing through. So many words were selected but the sinew.

He thought about words and almost croaked. He was filthy, of no worth.

'I think I'll have to look into it.'

'Look and you will understand.'

'That means that some races were superior to others.'

'Of course that is, but only because they were pressured by their hatred for the others. It is not a petty thing to admit that their might is what pushed them to create, within their enclosed world, one could see it happen again and again, as the wheel's worth of a carver. Who's done everything that's out there to be done.'

And then he spoke of Ancient Greeks, of the race of Hellenic wisdom that created everything within their kin.

'They distinguished themselves from outsiders, whom they have called barbarians through and through. If it weren't for this distinction in the making, for the pressure for them to create, there would be no symbol and no art of the highest kind. They carried what they could, against everyone who stood in doubt against them, from distance.

And from everywhere around, it was their sexual selection and the outside pressure which helped them create their systems, their written tongues and everything that put them up to where they were in part.'

For the system was made, time and time again, replicated and conveyed, first spoken through animalistic noises. Then through the illustration and all the voices.

'It's way too clear now, is it not?

Why was there such a need for so many people in the past to express themselves through art? And through literature? It's because of the sexual selection, which forced their brains to develop and be chosen for it.

Though most would be unable to train themselves to reach that point, it is far too obvious that they were impressed by it and could not help themselves but enjoy the process. In whichever stature and whichever symbol it could be illustrated in.

Is the visual language not a language after a point? Are the words not present there in some way or another even if it so?

Why has the filthy and the ugly, the abstract repelled so many people?

‘Because of its subterfuge and how they were being told they should like it. Although their eyes knew better and their eyes were accustomed to looking at something?’

‘Why?’

‘If I looked a man, I’d know what a man is. And I would recognize any man in a painting.’

‘That’s the visual aspect of it.’

‘Even if I were an animal with no language I’d still recognize it.’

‘A naked man, that is.’

‘What’s that?’

‘You’d know a man anatomically. But how would a man know how to make the clothes, where to find the materials, what of the oils? How about the canvas?’

How about everything else? Everything we acquired from our ancestors, whether you like it or not.’

But something was missing and he could not point at it yet.

He thought of the plainest thing, the nastiest of things as well.

How could he use the language to exterminate some people he didn’t like? It almost crooked his tongue, the plan. He wanted to find out some way he could kill them, if he could, only in doubt. His teeth were almost pulsating with blood, as they only pushed through his lip, he wanted to survive.

It is the one sad truth humanity refused to accept. That language had been created as a tool of superiority, domination, a result of specific races, of which capabilities were superior to others.

For that reason primitive creatures who had no prior contact with such tools, that were out of pressure, like the filthy ugly sub-human looking Aborigines were incapable of creating a complex language. And their similarity only forced them to in-fight and degrade over time, hundreds of attempts, yet no great results. In hindsight, for this reason, man had recognized the sub-humanity of the Negroes and the other races which drove from the South, of the Asiatic invaders and the others which in stead, forced the races to push back and keep to themselves.

‘Animals bad, humans good, animals bad, humans good, animals bad, humans good. Uncivillized.’

It looped around and went to placed, so many complex tools against all the other races. Sub-human, inferior, predator, barbarian, pressure, invader, primitive, all belonging to the same branch, all representing the threat, the thing that distinguishes everything, the impure, but most importantly the force that drives a man to create. The striking point of intelligence.

‘Why would a member of some inferior species breed with a superior specimen? It’s simple, he ought not do it, for language had become a tool of warning, a sign of dominance, a strike of culture, a force to strive upon.’

But so many things fell not in place, they were too filthy and could not be disgraced any longer, for the force in making, the arms were weak. Animal makes noises, intelligence means tools.

‘No, no, no, no, it’s not intelligence. It’s abstraction, creativity, that’s what’s been developed. That’s the striking force. This creativity created something, everyone copied it afterwards, then the same creative species developed onto it.

And for that race, the famed ancient European race was ethnically superior over everyone else. For that reason they forced themselves to develop and draw on over the pressure and distinction they felt while comparing themselves to their neighbors.’

It made sense then. Looking at the past occurrences and over so many missing links, everything clicked together.

‘Creativity created the language where brute force failed to get the primitive man a woman of his choice. Since making noises were but brutish, crafting tools were of his wont.’

‘But that can’t be clicking either.’

By then it made oh so much sense. These were not the voices of the Grim man and the other, they had belonged to the cancerous creatures that were spilling their blood and were looked down upon, exploited and abused.

It made so much sense, looking how bloating they’ve become, how those deranged mongrels had to paint themselves in white-pale colors, out of fear of tomorrow.

‘So what you’re saying.’

‘Indeed, after so many patterns, which couldn’t have based themselves on nothing is that, in order to reach a level as complex as that one, you must first add more pressure to an already existing superior specimen in order to achieve might.

After all, what are those written symbols if not simply drawing, scratches, nothing more but abstract patterns that share something in common and yield different interpretations?

And how could they have not been built upon without the prior knowledge to already existent mental features?

Mental stimuli, meanings. Adding meaning to sight, as, does the sun not look like a glowing dot? What noise would you make for it and what noise would you make for a predator of some kind from the lot?

What of food and barriers, those that may be gathered? Or those we may breed with? Do they not yield different noises?

Why would noises not evolve, just like tools in their stead, why would a man keep fighting with his fists and not make tools instead?’

‘Then why would noises be put down?’

‘They’re not enough for other generations.’

‘No, you’re not getting it. How does one get from making tools to somehow putting color on walls?’

‘Hands, look at the ancient hands, dirty hands put on walls. Trial and error set in their minds, that’s the simplest way to achieve something.

You get your hand dirty, you clean your hands, you see a pattern you enjoy looking at, then you repeat it again and again. First it could be footprints, you could distinguish the foot-prints left behind by an animal, could you not?

If you were to look at foot-prints, at yours, at another man’s, then at a wild animals’, would you not make the noise specific to its kind to alarm it?

Is a foot-print not a symbol? What of the hand-print? Is a line not a spear? Is a paw not an animal? Is a figure of sticks not a man?

Perhaps it was no mistake but the recognition of patterns which forced the man to distinguish motions, colors and everything else.’

‘Could be the filthy talking from your mind, it’s all nonsense, and meaningless, who cares about how the language was made?’

‘Because only that way it may be preserved, you filthy ingratiated simian melted cancer.

If a part of its creation is the sexual selection and the hatred from the alien races, the only means to preserve it is by exterminating the other sub-human creatures that might threaten its evolution and movement through age.

They are filthy.’

And their minds were already infested. They saw themselves in the past, bickering at one another in fear of migration and the filthy sub-human sides of humanity that pushed from below their kinds.

‘Wait, wait, wait.

SO what you’re saying is that you need to be aware of the outside pressure in order to evolve and fear its miscegenation in order to evolve. But if they’re too close, then it’s yet to become counterproductive.’

‘As one would have to put more effort into either accommodating them or pushing them farther way. But if one were aware of their existence and of the threat they represent, they would properly document them and would better prepare against them.

It’s something that’s biologically set, it’s all too clear that it’s a result of us pushing ahead, this distinction, this realization, this pride drove advancement. From the language came the art.

Or art is language, they’re interconnect by whatever means there are. Without them, one could not live without the other. And in order for them to grow further.’

‘One must be aware of the threat, of the pressure, of the outside force, the existence of which drives the abstraction to grab a form and evolve, out of fear.’

‘Thence the leopard became the nigger, the barbarian and the other races. Of which filth and sub-humanity drove the creation of better tools, out of the paranoia of which humanity threw itself onto higher plains.

And of which acceptance.’

‘Means defeat. Sub-humanity, destruction of art, the destruction of the language, that of which may be afflicted by their inferiority, expressed through their incapability to speak and further communicate properly. As they had not suffered the pressure of their environment combined with that of the outside threat, the industrialization, the wide-spread wealth and civilization that yielded such a result.’

‘And we know, of everything through which had been shown that the sub-human Negroid races were incapable of preserving their languages beneath their plains. And because of it they had degenerated in the primitive creature of which filth was reflected in their forms as well their heads.’

For most had become, as shrunken as their heads had been as primitive and deformed like the simians within their ranks. Many on the plains, with their heads over-growth and their bodies thrown like filthy-snail-like yearning bloated trunks in the backs of their smaller bobbling doubt; dumb like a disease, unable to focus and release. They’ve been enslaved again, for their own sake, they had to be completely forced on their knees and suffer, just so the others could live in this matter.

‘They disliked them for the cause, for the same reason language and art evolved. Out of fear that the inferior specimens would do as expected, they would destroy beauty, as it is and they would end it. And that force which preserved beauty was the same force that forced it to evolve.

Look at them now, how filthy they are and how primate-like they have become.’

In the most disgusting thrones, upon which the Negroes were only stacking themselves on, from their more-primeval state, the simian-feature that remained only revealed that little nigger-bodies had sunken in their sockets, bloated as they fattened themselves, mindless now, unable to speak or to create anything at all. They had stolen what they could from north, but they had refused to learn and could only fight within themselves until their filth had taken everything from their wont. Worthless creatures, darks and strung, lynched in forests for their own good, skinned alive, cut and chopped around their small necks. Darting from inside their evil-looks instead, it had to be.

‘For this reason, we have decided it would be worth to punish all of you. In this nest of creation no nigger may be welcome, as he can only destroy.

His admixture would only drag the language down and force it to decay, as it is not a good enough example that they’re unable to communicate properly as well as that?

They’re forcing themselves to copy yet may never understand the full blunt force of the abstraction as well as that purity humans have?’

‘Their species needs to be cleansed. It needs not be allowed to remain. For monkeys will never attain that force needed to illustrate the predator, to make notes of it. Instead they’d claim.

They’ll try to bargain with the wild animal and claim that the animal had tried to maim them.’

‘Thence they feared the European tiger, of whose might claimed all within its path. Though other tools of filth corrupted it, and took the tiger from inside-out.’

‘Was it the kikes then? Filthy bloated bird-people, whose hooked noses planted themselves within its fur. Could it be that they enacted war within the tiger.’

‘Until the tiger ate itself from inside out and almost died within an hour of its full birth.’

For what seemed to be, its superiority could not be denied, as it could not be enable, not embed in its pride. All those whom suffered underneath their wings, exploits and skinned through and pushed through a wall of flimsy filth could only turn back against them.

‘While they would eat each other alive, as they’re incapable of taking care and civilizing themselves. They lack the language and the art, the forced which drove the man, in its genetic might to get there he is today.’

There would be no other explanation, other than, what was worth to say, they were simply better than the others and found a way to convey the noises through their hands. And through marks and what remained they saved themselves from the filth of the sub-human races which almost drove them to extinction.

Thence they rose, and they survived and made it past the uncanny tide, and they lived through peril, through the woe, and made it past, to the unknown.

Something to be noted, in what seemed to have become out of their Negroe-mouths, and their in-born need of destruction, since their mouth pragmatism only devolved ever so much, a fraction of their jaw started pushing in, like an ingrown toe. From the insides of which, a few mouth open sores started growing, like the evil-looking wasp-nests, that were being used to break what they could eat from beneath them. Without any need for any kind of continuation or disease, they were way too distressed to talk about it, or to be stressed by what they crushed beneath them.

It was something to be laughed at. How much they degenerated, to have become so sterile and yet, living since the ever-present man was there to take care of the darkest, primeval races there were out there.

One last point.

‘Then we shall be done with it.’

‘Language at its most basic core is footprints.

Language is footprints, I think.’

‘That doesn’t make any sense.’

‘No, I think it kind of does. It means that at its very core, language is an animalistic thing, or in-part, animal.

Humans tracking animals by their prints, animals that were mindless still pushing away on their feet, you know what? You’re right.

Our mind decays, it’s irrelevant where it sprouted from.’

‘No, but what if that’s where the connection started?

If looking at footprints meant buffalos, then using hands to leave imprints on the walls lead to the association of symbols with living things. Which eventually lead to the creation of a written language.

It could be as easily as that.

Leaving foot-prints on the ground is natural, then that’s followed by leaving imprints on the walls with your hands, which in turn leads to the placing of meaning to the things.’

A side step

All the mirrors were hidden, all reflections and all sights, only to prevent that narcissism which inhabited his veins and seethed through him as soon as they came to light. The tendencies were insufferable.

‘Many faced liar, scum, criminal, stop hiding.’

‘If anything, I think it’s the women is Sicily, I swear, it’s the women, they have that spark about them that.’

He stopped talking. Both standing at the table, looking around, a pickpocket, seventeen just made it with his small wallet. During the daylight as well, he wrapped himself and almost knocked down the waiter on his way out.

The manager was there but he didn’t say a thing either. Most men tanned and looking, thinking about it for a second.

Right on the streets.

‘I told you, it’s just a bunch of foreigners, easy pocketing, I swear. You should’ve taught me how to do it earlier, Vilino.’

‘No, no, that would’ve been too easy, too easy, no. You needed something more difficult to learn and keep yourself out of trouble.

Otherwise, you know, they could’ve got you and thrown you in chains, you don’t believe me? Look around you, I know it’s so.

I think there’s something brewing, come.’

Streets empty now, back in the locale.

‘Did you see that kid? Do you know him?

What about you, do you know that kid? ‘

‘Course I don’t, who do you take me as, his parent?’

‘He stole my wallet.’

A few other men almost joined in. They were laughing as well, pointing, panting, almost choking in laughter. It was all too pitiful, how hard the foreigner was trying to get it back. They shared a laughter and a dance while thinking about it, since their neighborhood was small they all knew who the kid was, his family and his mother, down there, around the road, going up a hill of stone-plates and into one of the orange roofs. There was almost a sight of marble left by the Romans but they spoke no less.

‘I think you should leave now, eh?

You got nothing to pay for it?’

‘I can pay for both of us.

As soon as we finish with this, of course.’

‘There’s nothing to say. He’s gone, I don’t think you’ll find him, you know? Leave, pay and leave.’

‘Not until I’m at least being pointed in the right direction.’

‘What do you want already?

I told you what I know. ‘

‘But you haven’t told me anything.’

The man smiled. Both of them were on their way from the locale. The punches were stale, and one of them was flat-ironed at the ankle, they asked for trouble.

Earlier in the day they took a weird turn and almost fell into a dark chasm which swallowed the world. And before they missed another step they found themselves at the bottom, gambling on a fight.

‘Yes, yes, pull his spinal cord out you diamond-skeleton, rip his head-off.’

He said. It was hard to conceit to it but they were both entertained by this display. For some reason it was too much to watch. It wasn't matched by anything they entertained themselves with. Merely admitting that they were wrong about it was somewhat out of place. Since they truly enjoyed what they were seeing. It was off their caps, they even took their bets when it wasn't their time and round. So much harder, so petty to look at her, but she was somewhat incontestable. A petite, something sixteen or younger came in. She was followed around, fair to look at, the type that would drop a jaw around the trolley. And there was no one accompanying her either.

There she was, a face that was fairly painted, again, she joined the rows. She's been here, docile, but she's been here before, several times. It wasn't something to smirk at but they both considered.

'You know it's just around the limit. It wouldn't be against.'

'Don't act like a pig now, we have to focus onto something else, it's more important.'

A hint and a nudge was enough for him to put him back in line. And it was less than what was pained to be, and less than more and ever-closer to see. They were unsure about what was going on. Too tender, around her waist, her measurements were. Well to do, and touched around.

They came here for the match, not for her. Despite that, there were other admirers that seemed to have taken a liking to it. This was wrong, perhaps too much so.

In order to avoid being stared at, they took a few rows off, distancing themselves as soon as they could free a spot and resumed to watching the match.

'The Aggravator smashes another head.'

Who can take the man in ring? Who'll join the wing and the span of death and take down the champion?'

Instead of there being any cheer, they were silent. It was too eerie, though that feeling did not belong in here. It was betokened for and bargained for what was worth, until no one else made another song. For he came, he was expected. Another being joined the ring. At first they thought he was a human but he only wore his skin and his body like a suit.

And the thing coming out of it was flat, tall and wide, like some giant rattish-bat, bearing the mane of a lion, which was made completely out of long pins and a head that looked more like a lopsided, four point stretched face. That was exactly put in the same way a drawing put in perspective looked like, even more deformed as the focus was placed in the wrong spots.

Something uncanny about him being the fact that his arms were twice the size of his biceps that were being bloated as they looked and spoke, mouths inside of them and chains dragged them off into the ground. To be more than honest, it was hard. This battle was disjointed, it was something that could not be perceived as being fair any longer, since both sides only added to its weighted rides. As soon as the main body was left behind and from the made there he pulled, out of the slit of a cut, where he finally out-did himself, he came out, as a pair of malignantly deformed bones. They were damaged, even more than it should be possible for one like him, forlorn.

It was hard to focus on the scene with her around, and even the entertainers near the flaccidly put-out thorn-out two-faced, eight tongued, Piaccasoesque-eyed booth seemed to mind it. Near them there stood an angry, angry skin-defiler. Of whose neck was flayed, while he himself only pried where he didn't belong, he noticed the desperation driven by the avarice of their train-backs. Although there was barely any room for anything else to be placed there, it was more than obvious that they minded little.

Part of the booth was completely shoved-back, openly slit as if a giant butcher's cleaver had went through it with the least amount of fight being instilled. And thought they seemed too humane, their backs were stretched and pushed until the train-like extensions of their meat-wagons could be seen, adorned by the most outlandish looking things. Trinkets that were sharpened and rounded about rings that appeared to be crafted out of junk than cartilage, only drawing when it wasn't needed for the muscle extended and the cartilage receded, until it left such a transparency as the likes of which were never seen. Bloating as the filthy pit underneath where they stood pushed in. And a head loped around, in the back, it spat a single piece of some long-straw that entered their bodies, bouncing around between the two of them.

They were bleeding inside but it could not be seen as their insides only pushed out and floated against ceiling and against ceiling they were brought and caught and eaten by the mad servants of delight. Whom had been hired and corrupted as to pleasure there for no reason. It was deceitful and disgusting and distrusting, to even think that such a thing could be enabled to this day. Though through the cartilage, the color that was being conveyed being a see-through smock of dirt, it cracked, slightly if not blindly until a sand-like substance fell out; meaning that, what they produced, was only a result of them losing on what they had. For the audience turned around from the match and looked upon the young lady.

'She's a plant, isn't she? I think she's distracting them on purpose and we cannot have that. WE definitely cannot have that.'

'Then do something about it. Can you not see that I'm perhaps too fattened and too lump to do something myself and on my own?

I won't repeat that thrice a loud and I will not be caught unless it's absolutely necessary for me to intervene as well as I can.'

'No, don't look at her, don't do it. You're just as absorbed like the rest of them. Can you not hold your senses for the time being?

Is it truly so hard for you to at least curb your suffering and do as you please?'

'I will cut you.'

'No you won't, I heard that threat before.'

'If it means I get to stay with her, if it means I get to spend the rest of my life in her arms, being caressed until the time a younger one comes along, I will do it. And I will feel no shame for it.

Don't force my hand.'

‘You’re cowardly, to no end. And I think we should stop talking about this. It makes me uncomfortable. You’ve never seemed as serious as you are now. I don’t know what went through you but I cannot stand it.’

‘Well what did you expect? It’s all business at the end of the day, how have you not known that before? I thought we’ve already established it prior to setting up this business.’

‘But I never imagined we would go this far.

I’m starting to regret everything I said before.’

‘Good, great and good riddance; but while you go and bleed to death as you take the steps needed to sap your body of your so-called bodily-living fluids, remember this. And make do with your memory because I shall not accommodate with your wishes as to hold an eulogy for what’s worth.

Do not intervene with my plans, as I will make her mine.’

‘You’re vile.’

But the mere thought of the lady was arousing. And he could not help but peer and imagine and delight himself like everyone else. Of course it was narrowly harder to focus on anything else than her vivacious curves and her youthful appearance, but as it happened for everyone there, they were men. And I was something men had to do deal with, the young lady’s company being so delightful. It was nothing either of them could be held accountable for. It was just how men were and how they ought to react.

Though another hit was dealt, it did not bode well with either of them, the dark surrounding and curtains painted in a color of awe. And the delightful touch of a fall-through seeing light that came about then faded; it was night after all and the match hadn’t even started, that was enough, it was deranged, it held them at a pace that was between steadily-push through and still. Of course even the skeleton bodies, as brainless as they looked appeared to have been dewy eyed for a beauty such as hers, though neither of them came out of the ring and their interaction only came with as little satisfaction as could. Each blow missing then pushing back until they went back to it, missing, then using this excuse for another peak.

Youthful girl she was, there was something so delightful about her.

Anchor of dirt

‘There’s no reason to shout, there’s no reason to be alive for more than a few seconds.’

‘I see.’

As they only pushed and foamed upwardly, they couldn’t fathom pushing through. They were ill-of head, and better yet.

‘We shall kill your pet, dress in its skin and walk towards the blob-thinned anchor of dirt, through which we shall bend our heads and walk into our eyes.’

For the anchor of dirt deformed reality and curved it, so that every step would make a leg appear in their eyes, as fully formed as possible, while they remained in the same place.

‘Well, contrary to general belief, I think you are supposed to chop the head around the trim of the axe, where the handle and part of the flat side of the blade itself had already been crushed in part, melted and faced a good deal of heat-abuse.’

‘Shall we proceed then and eat some of them?’

Aloud and in the taking, they tanked the surgeon with the release that came from his brain. A part of his skull erupted as well, but it could not be forced in place yet.’

He was not in doubt but looked apart and he could never see it yet, as far. Just as he would be concerned, there was no point in prodding, of no worth.

Too much sugar in the insulin-tube that pushed out of his wreathing shoulder, he was there in part after all. Like the filth-walker he was, one shoulder pad would push out. Too agile for the eye, he was barely ripped off it as he pushed down the flight of stairs where he would remain for seconds at a time. He was headless but only because someone cut a piece of the rope which had been wrapped around his neck when the time was off by; give or take, five minutes. There they missed it, right again. It flew, a wing, made out of a small bucket of guts, most of which were torn and ripped apart. Spread and shared, between them, only one looked ahead.

His armed shoulder, that extended to a part of his trunk was ripped with it and was pushed on the right a few meters away, kept by a system made out of five cartilage bars that were rotating as he would kept ajar, forced away from moving, as he discontinued eating. Drawing from his eight legs, four in the front, two in the back, curled like a hair-catcher, connected to a body that shot in the air, there stood a single head upon many others that were unblinkingly staring along their pole, in every direction of old. Seeing sights from the past, the future, but never the present, and for what other reason could that be, other than the fact that the time was off and madness could see? Through them and through the guts, repelled by one another, they embraced the fact that they were ripped apart. With every second chanting, mournfully over their dead father.

He who appeared to be flat on the floor, pushed into the anchor-of dirt, which was on the door that opened, leading him through one of the open eyes, until he appeared again and drew on. A copy of his body would remained, conjoined with the foot. But he would only look on as the Pilgrim of Oee.

‘I shall be the Pilgrim from this point on.’

And with that the fornication of humanity descended into the abyss which was. There, in the midst of a broken earth, of which plains and lain, and dirt and sand, the sea, the animals and men, the air, clouds, the sky and eve the sight of stars were curved as in the shape of caverns. All of whom would be molded and prevented from leaving, never able to continue, never to face fear. Death for them could not be near, nor would it wait for any in the horizon.

They were dry, resources were dry, and only pushing off, them.

Entry way to them, as it was only so important to know. What one dreaded going after, what he could not fathom being surrounded by, he'd look towards it and grab a hold before he'd die.

It was important to understand that he could not live without the language, for the likes of it had only pushed him to evolve from man.

Upon stumbling on the dumb-anthill upon which his humanity had been proclaimed, the Pilgrim stumbled upon the remains of a man, following the ends of his footprints from which tiny puddle-like human faces swam inside. All of those were failed attempts at his evolution, in which direction his neck was dried and faces melted. Inside of what appeared to be the remains of the destruction this tool had ended. Words were used to spread disease. And for each sentence his teeth were grit; inside the pit, where he had ended, standing still. He had only protruded from that point, mentally ill, unable to speak properly any more.

Under him there lay all the lynched mass, the bodies of the nigger-heads pushed deeper inside the dead ant-hill where they stood and wasted. With every mass and every diseased animal made in their nature. And every calm-standing pox retraction, where he stood upon them, looked upon as a tree which had been ebbd and enacted. Enticed by the disease he had created, he stood poised and looked as his he had bit too much, many mouths only standing out. In and through, seen through the tiny telescopic prism the Pilgrim's eyes encased it in.

He was too diseased, drunk on Negro-blood, foaming at its mouth. Horned from inside his gums, barely able to keep the tongues upon which he choked upon. For all that praying had over-pained him well, enough that he would open all those sockets from which the little chatters stood out, prolonged upon their bodies as the many limbs were wreathing in and out, like moles out of their disemboweled holes. Cripples yet struck out, unable to protrude no further, they spoke with him with broken tongues, lest of all.

Upon the he melted, only in part. Continuing the long crested pillar upon which he stood, and wreathed out.

'I have been waiting for someone to speak with. But you must understand that in my current condition I'm anything but less in doubt. I'm crippled within and out, and I may not rise unless I'm called.'

'What did you lean upon hearing them talk tongues from insides the earth?'

'I've learned enough.

For each step spoke for someone that was buried long before they came out. And I've seen them fight, in and out. Upon the shrouds, from which they started eating each other in doubt that one may step upon the body of an ancestors whom stays; my brothers who had fallen before I failed to understand. Decay had terminated their hearts.

They mixed, which decayed their minds.

What do you suppose was left of them, legacies be damned. I seem to think that one like you should know of such things, instead.'

He looked around with the bodies that were pulling in, most of the faces being obscured upon the protrusion that came out of the pillar upon which a swoon of blood dripped forth. And every giant Negro-head was bled upon, drowned in part.

A crimson steam came out of his eyes, it was long held until it became a gradient of shades, all of whom switched in color until they reached a blue-spare. In the space between their eyes, on that tree-like protrusion which looked more like the fattened effigy of a burning stake-man, they finally release. From their eyes, in times of peace, a single dolt of bloody screams, held within the light that shimmered upon being retrieved, as well as wild surroundings that came into place.

Walsow, always failing, he could only look through the mind of the Pilgrim in the same way a centipede would look out of its chrysalis upon the drawing moment of its release. He was too far gone already.

What he saw below the chasm, around the pillar made out of the Negro-heads, upon the rounded rims of the passages carved through their high cheeks and repulsive curled and twisted hornet-mouths, many Negro-fiends, all too weak to crawl outside their sockets, torn and twisted, pushed amongst them. Came out of their way and drew their burnt chalices to drink. From the blood within their lord, they sunk their teeth, broken, bloodied, ripped in shards. Some of which pushed through their faces and into their eyes, drawing to the point where they begged for more. And drawn outside, they drove in chores.

Many had eaten, kin and kin, through dark-meat alike. Many of them were too perturbed and haunted by the same cannibalism their ancestors bore in their hearts. Until neither of them could help it any longer, dumb-founded; they begged for it and skin retracted only forced them to proceed. Into the chasm some fell or leaped. Ripping themselves off the cord, begging for an end to their agony and gore. In contrast to it, some begged for more. As they could do anything but force themselves away.

‘It is only the only true fate a nigger might bear. He’s being punished for his bearings, the history reigns bitten in his overly inflated head.’

Yet none could have foreseen what was obviously within them, waiting all along. They were destined to go forth and bleed their hearts out on the plains. Ending one another as their tribal fighting emerged, only to end up here, on the peaks of many others, falling beneath them, into the large abyss, at the bottom of which, there was only a sea as black, as tar ignited itself with nothing but their disgusting skin that cracked. Deeper through, from the burnt hinges which kept their sinew and their innards growing, there stood the servants, knowing that many of their socket-children were to fall. Drowning, deeper, dark in tar.

It was enough for the Pilgrim to understand that he had no desire to listen to him and see how he fed them. Thence he turned around and fell, from step to step until he came, to the entry in the eye, turning, yearning for a simple release. He felt fealty to no one and simply left without saying a word or passing through the anchor of dirt, leaving the man of which eye he entered, lone in a world of uncanny worthy, pushing through the sea from which it had been taken and abandoned until left alone, rotten. Broken records on a ship of mutts, their bodies used instead of planks.

Many of them had been put together, none looked human but disturbingly put on. A façade that almost took away what seemed to be their only lot.

‘I see that the captain’s missing.’

He spoke to no one in particular and as expected, none had listened to him. He was by no means trying to prove a point, yet he only drove forth and asked again.

First mate appeared, but he was still part of the ship. Many sutures came through, crying and forced his body to rip the ship. Thence in half, the bodies were released. Part of the dirt ate them, and all of the sudden, the Pilgrim found himself standing at his feet. Unable to register what happened to him there, he only spared himself and would not try to make it, past what he was aware. Of many other urges he knew.

Hatred ran through his veins but so hard his anger missed with his perception of the land he simply walked long of. As his feet touched it, he found himself surprised. Despite all meaning, for a moment there he thought he might simply push deeper through and lose himself below the prime point where the ship broke.

The Pilgrim took a gramophone with him. From its squared surface there came a mouth that would not grin. It was too tainted, broken through, skull exposed, from which a small cog appeared to have been forced through a pumping cognitive organ that did not belong to man. He listened to it, trying himself every passing moment, until he almost collapsed. It was too hard, in some way, not listening to the creature speak of its plight. No longer, not likely, that he could point at it, did he care about his life. No signs were shown, no beat against the left side of his chest.

No major respiratory problem, only the lever being thrust against every now and then. He could not have himself breathe through it, nor would he spare anyone of what went through his mind. He thought of them being there, despite having made it past the broken ship. They would naturally be too far to even hear a single fall of a lead bullet, shot through the sky. Burning tonight, in the distance, many melted, others finally erected themselves out of the ground.

But the Pilgrim did not care. He only listened to the gramophone repair his need to hear talking.

It didn't speak, yet made them manifest themselves around him.

Though, in honesty, he could not tell it. Whether or not they were truly there or not, as he only looked with little in mind and more than his fair share of doubt, he finally relented and asked of it no more.

First there came a man who wore the gramophone-skull on top of his beheaded-marked throat. From it there pulled out an arm-like four-pointed, almost conniving string upon which they spared no doubt.

He had strangled the weak and made them suffer as he pissed through their hearts. They had to have been punished for some reason, yet none was given, none too far. It was way too important to admit, they were only dragging him in. Arms that reached around him, those who rose from below the dirt, they were no grave-diggers, not the twins, but others who refused to die. And seemed to bear the memory.

Further, past the shrouds, through realities, they walked. They shared a moment, obeyed the rules they master's shout. Through the bottom of the stage, during Beliee's rehearsal, then and only then it happened for them to come into contact.

It echoed but it was lost. They walked together, all four of them, after the two got pulled out of the ground.

‘Think I see a good place to stay for the night.’

Without a doubt, there was nothing to see around the place, nor would they be able to make it out.

From the gramophone another voice emerged.

‘We have to Annex another continent, otherwise, we’ll see it through no more, no longer, wait in doubt. They’ll sicken us and force us to drop on our knees and leap about like bulls in the making.’

Cried as they might’ve, they saw no shortage around, of no bodies of dirt or anything that might make them know what happened around. There were no pointers, nothing worked properly. Broken goods around them, whom appeared to meet them only as the settings of filth. Lust was being taken care, the maidens were only most appealing to look out, though the Pilgrim had to shake himself, the body that kept the piece of the trunk as it shook and the found rots still crippled the skin around it. His long-distanced shoulder moved, his arm mistook this motion and he drove it to a point where the dirt shook.

‘It’s hollow down there.’

‘What did you expect? There must be a whole lot of tunnels and homes down there, shouldn’t there be? Otherwise, I don’t think there’d be a reason to stay.’

‘Who’s going to stop me now? I’m indestructible, certainly I must be born out of the shell of God.’

A man should not be concerned with the minds of others, whether or not they come from a respectable background or some infantine racial group. He should be able to attain, manipulate and do as he pleases out of the bottom of his very soul. As it ought to be, for those are only tools for him to employ.

Thence he thought no further and looked in awe at the point where the anchor of dirt met the land.

A simple house of dirt stood there. From the depths there rose a man of dirt, who seemed to wave, appearing around the girth of the house. He entered upon a mark, eighteen footsteps after that. They were welcome. It was no dirt. If one were to tear it piece by piece, he would find blood and flowing organs hardened upon themselves as they became ruddier and harder to grasp. Without a reason to be put ahead, he only walked and saw himself knocking dead on wood.

A man with many termites around his throat emerged; they formed a lump in there where they stood and started prodding on, in which direction? None may know, it was too easy, unwrapping the skin off and eating, pushing through it like an infant being scolded in disgust.

Upon the forest there was a tree, a special one that could not be seen from the distance, could not be approached by any means alone, in quiet. Nor should it be held by its bark. Likely told, there was no reason for anyone to be there. Every now and then a man appeared, then fell, right from the dirt, into the hole, sunk within the charnel in the midst of a breath.

He wasn’t the type to hum a song in his head. But the Pilgrim could not help it either. He was almost obsessed with it.

They were not of the same cloth, him and they. Someone remained between the two of them, as they started counting the black-dots that entered their breathing clothed lungs. From which they spewed tiny spiked more formed, fermented diseased respiratory pouches that carried breathing tendons that attached themselves to their veins. With small lung-textured veins that held like strings before they started floating like tiny inflated creatures.

And they were kept in the air until their outsides started forming pores that looked like octopus-suckers all around them. With every breath they took, the air started looking like it was made out of transparent plastic, as the one used to suffocate women on the pass during various sessions of autoerotic asphyxiations. It only went to show as well, that not even the air was something to be grasped upon and taken from them. Too heavy for the touch, rancid during their filth watch.

‘Of course there are things we should be able to account for, especially since our dear supreme god made out of a piece had started pushing on hindered legs and other headless steps there.’

The area where he pointed wasn’t made out of dirt. Instead it was made out of beheaded corpses which formed a long line-bridge like pass upon which they stepped. And standing in front of them, there were rows of four to five bodies stacked in such a manner, holding against each other, as they could not contain one another any longer. Since the glutton’s touch was being felt.

‘Alphonse, what are you doing to those corpses?’

Asked Anxious, as he only looked at him diddling his fingers inside their necks, writhed in since they were wearing nothing but the lynching-ropes they wore on them instead. Of asking, they shared forth.

‘Dear friend Anxious, I wish you died in front of me today. I wish I could end your life and slaughter your family until they drove themselves into dead corners and rotten with all the filthy birds your family had the tendency of molesting.’

It was such a wild affront he had to suffer. It went all over, through his head. His teeth pushed deeper in, he was almost dead, out of shame.

‘Out with it, Alphonse, what do you want?’

The two of them constituted a separate group. Since they could not be held accountable for their actions, they shook, and danced, they diddled the insides of those necks instead, pushing even deeper down.

‘Is that a shade of orange in the sky I see? There must be something there, I’ll be damned, if I ever could believe it going.’

Thence Anxious an Alphonse approached a dilapidated structure from which there stood. Twenty long-pillared shaken, skinned-alive servants, who appeared to be missing, largely their faces, drawing off, from the insides of their malignant placed disgusting throngs. Upon which there stood only the sharpest-looking trumpet curved, made out of bone and skin, these objects replaced their skulls and mixed their unfathomable chatterers instead. One would have to look out of the way now in order to realize that they were hiding and biting and hitting hard. Trying their best not be gotten around. Since there was a punishment for the people who looked into the dark placed, the mazes not being real but made out of the solidified air veils.

‘I see that there’s a form in space.’

‘Which one Alphonse?’

‘That one.’

He pointed at a for squared, large body which pushed around the trimmed half-curved, of a small spherical object which drew around each side of the curve, like a semi-moon with circular spikes. Many of which looked like prolific eaters that were yet in doubt. From the main body this moon drooped, and from the main one some organic manifestation shook all the objects off, many being attached through the long clasping pointers that pushed out.

Giant eyes laid on top of the main surface, projected as they gave the illusion of not being attached to the main part of the body. A pair of unnatural contorted insides of men were there, spinning around akin to some gravitational belt, making it seem benign. Tried and eaten, pissing by them bloody selves, as this object only drew on and flew around the pyramid in term.

‘The termination of disease, we need to make sure we pay our needed respects, or else we shall be made to pay.

And then it will release a bloody virus which shall kill us where we stand.’

But Anxious looked at Alphonse with pitiful dreadful eyes. He had paint inside his pockets, in the same way someone would carry pocket sand. He couldn’t use it to paint walls, but he took it along everywhere he went. Of course.

It made sense that someone like would carry paint with him everywhere he went. Why wouldn’t he? After all, he was way too unfathomable to be looked upon. And pain would help him keep everything from falling apart, as it acted like the composition of a wild pocket watch, in terms of how it mixed with everything that twisted around inside his pockets. Cogs normally twist inside a pocket that way, but instead of cogs, he had his fingers kindling the key-chains, which was made out of bone-cartilage and painful-looking cretins-heads, shrunken in form, beaten and abused, then, from their insides, without or with little to no excuse, they would become firmly placed sharp-points, pushed into holes that could not work properly on themselves.

But his hand was an integral part of his pain-watch as it was the one and only activator which helped him keep the time. Though he could only keep time going by inserting a few fingers in his pocket at a time.

Alphonse wasn’t aware of it yet, but he was the keeper of time and his fingers were the inner-working that were only working upon themselves in need to activate the passing of the bloody crimes they were activating with each on-going second. He was not only controlling time but a specific passage of time where people were being tortured in. Some would be buried alive or left to rot, only to wake up in the same position, suffering the same thing again, with no explanation whatsoever, only to stop.

At specific times, that were set, when someone’s suffering had stopped, he would be erected upon a large statuesque scalper, slowly cutting his face and replacing it with the face of a child’s dog, only to have the lower side attached to a cube that was being slowly pulled on a conveyer’s belt on its way to the abattoir. He had to recognize the need of man to suffer for crimes he did not commit. It was an integral part of society, pulling the innards from inside a kid.

‘Yes, I see, I see, then I shall bow to it and see that there’s a way we could prevent this virus from spreading out of the commuting area of strokes.’

At which Anxious pointed at the ground, seeing how they were left behind with little to no explanation whatsoever.

It would make utmost perfect sense for him to, well, first and foremost.

His heart throbbed, as he came to no reason, to no other mind.

He looked down and called upon Alphonse.

After grabbing him by the wrist, pulling on the nick of his coat, he saddened his friend by pointing back at it.

Each stroke left behind a sight, that only got revealed once they plainly walked back, then at the stroke, a single stroke of light, whence the so-called smoke that almost obscured it fell out of the way.

Beyond the pyramid, the road and the belt, there finally rested the figure of Mary in her prime, beyond the desecrated land. Whence they moved ahead and almost missed the grime. Upon it fell, from whence a great shadow emerged and went out of its way.

They ran; then they had refused, not looking back at the obscure. In that point where their hands fell, where the images of filth died with the sight of the pure, whence they walked towards the opposite sight and saw the swoon. Then and only then did they find the way out. Through the anchor of dirt and through the carpet of dined-upon worth, finally they stumbled upon Alphonse’s home.

There and only there had his mind, upon taking gulps, from the least of kinds, followed through.

Without a knock, he realized that it wasn’t locked. Since there was no other way to check it, he didn’t get stomped around his head, he walked ahead and saw nothing, on the other side, only an empty bunk, whereas his eyes were being lead. Closer to his feet, where he stared, deeper below where the water ran, left there, with the wood rotting. A single stream left its mark, like the sight of a gargoyle wing’s shadow falling from below the cathedral of Notre Dame. It pointed him to the side of the house where stood a bed; there and only there could he wait and be placed back into his bed.

When finally his heart faded, where Alphonse faded, and there would be no light in his eyes.

It was there that Anxious turned and left the house, the same image wasting around the brims of his mind.

Farther in the hue

Hern saw a nasty lantern, not a normal kind of lantern but the type that would be painted in the impressionist style. Hands wrapped around like saddles, riding globes of painted stables from which white horses galloped right around the streets. And many riders, to their luck they wasted and listened to no one, let alone would please. There were too many of them bashing their long-skulls, against each pole and building their charged head-on. Leaving splats of paint of blue, royalty mares of bitter hues, as they came in place, they started chewing their simple reins before grabbing one another past the chains.

A bloody fight instilled below, as an orangutan without the hairs, its head was but a fossil, which marked the passage of time, a drag which pushed around his back. A skeleton dancing tool which pushed around a largely defined yet brokenly deformed spine.

Carpet

‘I enjoy looking at your carpet. It is a nice carpet I enjoy looking at.

Have I told you how much I enjoy looking at your carpet? It is nice.’

He looked at the carpet. Sometimes the carpet looks different, depending on how you look at it.

There is something wrong about the carpet. Sometimes half of the carpet’s face is god, while the other part is a neck, which starts overlapping and growing on top the god and the other side of the face. But most pleasantly, a part of man is always there, sometimes it is invisible.

The carpet speaks. During the time it is fed compliments it does not, for more than a few obvious reasons, various animal empires had evolved inside of it, only to die during the litany of asphyxiation.

‘Breathe no less,

Breathe no less,

Lungs are flat,

I confess.’

It wasn’t long, nor would it be worth pursuing.

The carpet was eighteen by eighteen but it did not cover the entire room. The first as well as the opposite wall were twenty meters away from it, standing at a length of one hundred meters, facing one another while they were the only walls. There was no way out. Outside there was nothing. A child died after being run over by a car.

That was part of the carpet.

And the carpet had various patterns on top of it. Sometimes it looked like there were various carpets stacked on top of one another, but the mere touch revealed as much. Nothing other than an illusion, the walkers beneath it were not. But before the on-going march could be prodded upon, there was still one important factor that had to be discussed. Hard of hearing, heart-of woe; some of the patterns had been worn-out no more.

‘It’s hard in some way, trying to argue your way out of this hole. It’s gone too far already, this jest of yours, I want out.’

‘No can do, it’s too deep of a drop, look at the quarters, look at the nickels, too many of them reached the floor already.’

‘I’m afraid that the severe distance and the size of them already started pushing too far in. They’re in your shoes, aren’t they?’

‘They are, I suppose. How do you reckon they came here in the first place?’

‘I suppose you put them in. ‘

‘Suppose no longer because I haven’t and I dare say something happened when I was asleep.’

There were eight other men in the hole. It was a pit, a nasty pit they all stood in, trying to get somewhere but with no result. Some of them shared ancestry, which made it all the wrong. Since they were humiliated and blatantly stripped naked and tipped for it.

He was the only one who had something on him, those being his shoes. And they were worn out as well, too many nickels being in them. Hard of hearing, way-thought. Intervention in the gut made it grow, and they would not know of it until they woke up.

‘Ever considered starting a business?’

‘With these?’

‘No, not with those you knuckle-head, I mean before you came here.’

‘I haven’t, why?’

‘You could’ve lived through an easy life with nothing to yearn for. Think that sounds well enough?’

‘I’d rather live a normal life in some quiet place than this. I’ll be honest, the alternative is not too great either.’

‘But this is not the alternative either. I think we both know that. But it’s plain to see that at least you tried and it’s been hard.’

Already with the weather and all.

The pit was merely a hole inside the carpet which was well-put and well crafted everywhere around them. Nothing sounded more thorough.

‘Hide us, hide us, hide us, hide us, hide us, hide us, evil man.’

Another one woke up and said.

‘I got a weapon, utmost inbred, an inbred weapon made out of the body of recycled organisms of the utmost inhumane matter.’

They breathed forth and could only add to the forth of the filth which pushed on, with their growths unable and never approaching full mass. Through this distress and bitterness expressed, alas.

‘We fear, mater, is it not obvious that we do?’

With each bite and each sinew, they could not release a hint, lost through. If they were caught, where they resided, but in an uncontrolled environment not even the most blessed would know how to receive it. Blamed as they may, never in doubt, but looking around.

There was something. A card stuck inside the edges of the pit. It fell just as soon as they were on their feet, ten of hearts fell. And with it, there was a failure of dirt-muscle, in-like moss. It fell with everything else and appeared to be, one peculiar torch-like device. Wooden yet metallic, a dome, caught by its own glow, yet, before it could be caught by hand, it suddenly pushed out, rightly, around the rims of the strange entry-hole from which it fell. A shadowy hand, the figure of a shadow pulled in it before it left.

Thence, at sight, immediately, as soon as it might, the card burnt before it could be grabbed by, just in the same way, the nickel might.

‘When might we be released?’

‘There’s no end and there shall be no peace.’

‘What do you want?’

‘I fear that my dear old child has suffered a laceration.’

And there were tinier shells that fell as well. Out of their way, he could not tell. Struck by the finger, in the worst places, wrong in the mind, blind to what appeared to be the only way around. He asked no more and appeared to worship gore. It was logical, it had to be done. He was filthy and would only reside in this carpet grotto.

A bulked man whose muscles were toned in the same way armor would be wrapped around him shook in place and didn’t ask.

A few marbles dropped as well, blood followed, couldn’t tell. Whether or not they were trying their hands in, that would make as much and no less, no difference during their time of stress, not enough, it was not enough to anger anyone. Cruel, little man came and stalled no longer.

His face was disastrously abstract. But he pointed it out.

‘Small feet you have there, buddy, do you think there’s something wrong with the nickels?’

Again, he tried sniffing about them, ugly man realized it first. Worsened by the head, he was eating his side of the neck. Then, from inside his face, the man of no race pulled out a knife and stabbed him. He bled on the nickels and they melted. Dreadful little things, they were worn out and eaten, as the liquid soaked the nickel-parcel; melting away. A thing of no beauty of his way, but he was not concerned with it either.

The carpet sealed itself off, allowing them to suffocate before their time. It came as no surprise either, as deranged as they would be.

That the concerned party in the room had nothing to look after or see.

There were other pint-worth, acreage deep drops which happened to be inside the carpet. But no one approached them since they could only stir it for so long. Guests who entered the room had a hard time standing in it, for obvious reasons. They were obfuscated, obstinate, yet drunk on absinthe. It made their conundrum no less than it ought to be, something bothersome and uncanny. Drawing straws of stone to drink from its hairs as the modo-default state of its being was the face, or the half-of it, driving itself even further down the edge, until it had become a drop of twenty centimeters around the room. It looked like it would melt with them and already they were met with difficulty, as to be unable to climb back up. Whereas they kept trying, it seemed likely that this was the reason.

It wasn't the walls, it wasn't the carpets, but they were being stretched instead, but at the same time they were locked in place, frozen. In such a case, if this was a table upon which their bodies were stretched upon, their lower part would be frozen on the ground while their mid-chests and upper side would slowly be pushed further up with the exception of their arms; that would lay frozen in the air, leaving something of the eyes to be stuck as well but only half of them in a vertical manner.

Their almost close sight-deformation was responsible for the impression they were given, as for their further inability to climb, their entire perception was made as if to fit the same sight a cracked prism would be left with, panned and worked upon at different heights only so the illusion would work in such a way that the man would look as if he lay unaffected. It made it so much easier for the dark-man in the back to snick it and stab them. Pain would take some while to reach the nerves, since they were most afflicted by this twist and the dark-man had worked only fast enough to be done for.

'I see that there's something in this corner, maybe this is where the carpet might break.'

But he could not say, not pry through, as his eye-socket popped at time, the intervals gone through and made for, lost, he'd see the ceiling, now lost. The pain had already kicked in and he bled to death, just like the other man, unable to react, move or make it so he was touched again. Painfully as this drag might be, they were pulled deeper into the carpet once they had been robed blind.

Since it had desired some compensation for the time it had been left there to dine upon them. Never matter, not the kind that would make this world inside the room go round. Since every way out was blocked, locked, strapped in and rubbed around in the same way a rube would action the cogs in a broken clock by relentlessly attempting to push his fingers in until they bled. It was water-proof, not bullet proof.

A shot broke through his fingers, cutting them in the shimmering light of a fraction of a second, with the clock and the device which pushed his arm to pump again.

Carpet-munchers would otherwise not be allowed on for obvious reason. The entry to the room where the carpet is was to be barred and beaten, as they ought to be. Munchers would be made to worship the rod before finally being sent straight into the wall and left on the sidewalk as the carpet drew on.

Little to no amount of flight could be seen or felt inside the room, as for every nod of the head only revealed as much, not a single man could be kept for long. It was too heavy, that would not do.

Couldn't think of any better way to abuse her, other than finally allowing her to come in through a strange device, plain-to see through, akin to some long-tube that looped around itself, crushing its own thighs, which was surrounded by metallic holding miniature cell towers that appeared to move as they were armed with real human-like feet. With the exception of the large cuts inside the feet in triangular, square, and spherical sore-empty bulbs, that only dreaded melting on as they pushed in. A cut was infest, necrosis demented her, as she dragged herself in a serpentine-made left-over, her punishment for being that way. Battered, nigh-to death and left to float slowly on her way to the carpet, after which she could finally search for release; uncannily so, she was a canine-whore.

Lips painted the crimson of her brow, where she's been beaten day in and day out.

'I took part in it as well. I admit it, I couldn't help myself, it's in my nature. I simply saw an opening and I considered feeling her up for my own good.

You too, didn't you have as much fun as I have?'

'Of course I have, but say, I was thinking of something. Wouldn't it be fun if.'

Side-note, must create a fake cemetery for "animals", dogs or cats, or house-pets in which members of the opposition as well as other tawny-skinned people should be buried alive in.

'But wouldn't it be fun if we designed, the two of us, only the two of us, a virus?

Think about it, wouldn't it be great if we finally got rid of those exemplars that lack in mental fortitude and even refuse to work their way up there.'

'I'm listening.'

'We shall start by simple, let's call them bites. We'll start by biting upon some distant alleles and start tearing them off, or, rather isolate them from the main organic unit from which they had been taken out of. Then, I think it's clear.

We will have chosen similar ones and force the virus onto the prudish infants before they're fully developed as well as fully formed.'

'That doesn't make as much sense as let's say, creating a deadly virus that would simply kill them.'

'No, but after enough generations, we should have some results. I suppose it's rather well, in some way. Making sure that they're completely dealt with in the worst possible manner.

Look at them, I can see some of the gathering up in the distance.'

No one will show up and they will only make too great of a filthy deal out of it.

The virus was already made, it was them and they walked like a symbiosis between one another, walking through and away. Like vine-walls connected through, of their skin pushed against one another, fertilized conjoined, sinew was in their eyes. Bones that didn't grow properly forced them blind.

And they begged for some kind of release, through which they might suffer and die out of pity, be killed. Each and every single one, of men of no doubt, tonight, refused to appease the fealty and the pain. Dreadful, little, petty creatures, they don't know what's going through their minds. It's pitiful how they're going around, they can't be felt, better than dead.

And fealty of dreams, only pushed away.

'And he would be filled with despair if he understood even a fraction of what was going on.'

And they were wed in the trophy chamber, where their guts were spilled in the walls.

'A room for another man, he needs to understand.'

This was yet another chamber, yet, farther than the rope that floated a few centimeters off the ground. Though it could not be plainer than it was, wronged, there, wronged, he thought so. It wasn't that far off entirely, yet he could not help it entirely. Most of all, a man would have to forget, as this was not in his best intention to remember.

'I see that there's a new neighbor who moved in.'

'Should we join him then?'

'Maybe, unless.'

There was no way to see him eye to eye, no reason for either of them to kill themselves right there, slain in their beds. A reason for either of them being the fact that they lived in the ancient gable, of rough protruding green-stone. Many apartments were not their own. It was plain to see now, how they were wrapped, in thought and anger, brought close to sitting down. Filthy in looks, shaken, unable to understand who did what, when no one could verify it. Clicks that were distant, clicks that were cut at least, shakes in their general mass and one man lay hanged a few meters away. Every thinking man ought to have known better than this. But in a way it was too late.

There was no return from the building, as it ate a part of them, transparently embed against the walls. Their minds and hearts were there. It had to be pleasant, thinking about yourself through the missing shingles that fell. Upon hit gluttony emerged.

Arraland was the first to become aware of what happened there. A memory unlike no other appeared to unfold itself for the same reason he was there with them. He could not distinguish stone from carpet, for no other reason than the bothersome fact that it had become part of it. He could not get away, he could not look against stone without seeing fur, a giant face, a second one, many necks which were broken and him, instead. His only friend being the epitome of lost. He was inside the wall, but only a quarter of him remained alive.

‘What happened when I wasn’t looking?’

Though he could not only stare, but he refused to answer instead of dictating his brain to act around when they were there. Not the neighbors, but the slits that had been part of them, all which only moved like waves of schools of bats that flickered their wings against the reflection of the carpet side.

He thought himself as nothing else but the God’s once chosen, twice removed from the sky. Though he was no normal God himself as he had no name but only doubt, doubt of his existence, the mark of a gut, he feared thinking and even worse, laying in awe for what appeared to be the seconds his mind shook. He understood that he spent too much time off, dreadingly confused that he missed the moment the carpet released his friend, the mentor, instead chose to bleed on the floor. With the second half having its insides almost pushed through, a few centimeters if any at all, which were marked in the way a piece of meat would be cut around each side of it, each edge belonging to them.

‘Why must I not know what’s going on there?’

‘What’s going on through your mind now?’

‘A single small part of shrapnel-shaped comb, you can see it, I know. Would you mind removing it if you can? It’s hurting me.’

‘Instead he dreadingly stood there, my brother in arms.

He stood there when you refused to pull the plugs that kept him starved.

For that I shall return the favor.’

Advancing he almost crushed his head into the pile, stumping him before he got the chance.’

‘I can’t help myself, my dear friend. I have to tell you of this, of my dreams and the things I fear they might catch me with, instead.

I don’t know what’s going on now, but I failed to adjust my mind to my surroundings. I wish I understood why we lived in here for so long.’

Though he was stricken down like everyone in his turn. No explanation could’ve emerged from it. Neither of them understood, nor would they try their hands, since they knew their place already, in the match. Both of them were being watched.

It was enough, that was all they needed, a few moments to set everything where it had to be.

As he chose to do it, on his own terms, he pulled out a switch blade and started cutting a quarter of his face, throat, proceeding downwardly until he finally accepted his friend and joined him as they walked forth and left the room. On the steps and outside, where they shook, fell and never met a single sight the living that might verge upon them.

Though a few steps away, the crowd had cleared and there would be no trick of hands, no elongated limb, nothing that might yell of what fell. Somewhere, along the way, in the distance, or farther away, there was a single plume, a fume that only cross his mind. Dreadful, in their agony, they embraced the one who was gone.

Though the carpet remained in the same place, it wasn't there, but back in its room, where all of those who had been disgraced stood. Never shaking themselves of sin, never understanding what pushed through the field.

Outside, they discussed the mass of rolling smartly rounded headless wonders that were inserted inside the long bloody creeps, who stood against the walls like pigeons, impaled by their own sawed off feet, held against the flatness, bleeding. Fed by the dogs they had eaten, peeling off their eyes, nothing in the room was dyed. But it was still blue with long strips of greenish-red, the rashes of meat on top of them, and a single part of this centipede-like foundation kept the structure from falling down. When seen from outside, through the empty quarry in which the carpet room was hidden, down, underneath it, a smaller two-by-two, or a wider stretch pushed through, leading to the empty stairs. Down, upon them, if they were to be abated, there was a perfectly set replica of the room with the carpet in it, with the headless corpses who would be fed by the bodies of the dogs through the left head-holes.

Below them, after many other unspoken-off primitively squared construction, would lay the centipede-like foundation, rounded, yet curved, holding themselves with longer legs, the girth of which melted under the great rears that grew naturally and prolapsed themselves from beneath the rocks. And they would be admired no longer, for eighteen graves lay there in rock. Impaled by giant feet-spears.

A body appeared to be out one of its coffins.

It crawled a few feet away.

From on top the original mark, there were footprint who spoke of him and all the men he killed in life. Although he was somewhere along the way, he was nigh-floating in a vacuum, and only a few limbs remains. Most of the others growing, with little prolapsed bags of meat-organs of their own that kept them alive; unable to think or admire what went on, instead they would provoke one another by making sounds. The shimmer of unnatural fortitude a mind would lack, although somehow they thought.

It was unexplainable, as much as their duress might be.

He was left with something sticking out of what he had remained with. Looking at a common occurrence, insects communicating with one another, since the fragments of his brain being split around the room, shaken as they were unable to replicate the cancer-broken tools they shared. Nastily pushing themselves as if they were fed. From one side to the other, they look and saw another one of their brothers. A heathen who would not embrace, the alter he carried on his back now pierced through his face. Stone grew yet he still paced around in circles.

Many of his eighteen legs served him as an anchor as they only dreaded to be held by him, pushing through, unable to look after the distance where he forced his face. To fall off and leave the stone, allowing it to grow. In utmost unfashionable way, beauty was not elegant. But he was touched, instead. By worse appraisers, the murderers of woe, whom caught themselves and never watched as moons have carried on, he latched.

Upon one of the great quarry sides, of which, attachment was but a single pair of legs that threw themselves out from the foundation, allowing him but a moment of blunder. Once in a while he would bash his own face only to allow more birth, of every inch and every stone from the altar which came forth. Through his shoulder there came an almost ankh-like akin in length, barely in shape formation. Whose edges rounded afterwards, from all four square ends, until they pointed rounded horizontal trident-heads, the sharpness of which only pushed across the tips where four flaccid chewers came out of, barely melted but coming out instead of eating themselves out. It was a pity that he knew, that this was only a branch of eight. Many instead only pushed as far across his back as they would come to show themselves around each ledge that wrapped around him. As every part of the foundation wanted to keep him in place, disgraced by the cancer eating him, he would come to almost shove his neck.

But no sharp angle, came out of his mouth. Although it was split off in a similar manner a woman chopped, for cheating her husband, in half, left alive and wailing; seen by those who would question her short-coming. They knew who she was. Blasted this, we both know it. She looked displeased, but the man also thought of seeing her with joy, that filled his heart, wanting more.

Yet enough of what he delighted himself with during a time where he could chase desired. He was forced open, through the split out of which it grew and never left it catch on fire. Dreadful after every woe, he wanted to hang himself and be done. Next one to the row, but he had not the power, nor the time. He could not do it, for the likes of him in time. Over the span of a few moments, he considered as much. There was no reason to watch, nor to know, there was no desire to show it.

But it felt like the sharp point that came out of his face was unacceptably fat, filled with lumps that squeezed his forehead and would latch on top of the walls. Eating what they could only to devour the known part of the quarry. The small shards of the uncanny left behind, remnants of the grave; insects spoke again.

‘Liturgy shall come upon our march and when we need to hear it we shall feel it latch upon no doubt, the maker, any ender that shall prohibit our kiss, shall be benign and pried for us to eat him.’

Couldn’t understand why would anyone want to live down there, and one could say just about the same about the many parties whom found themselves heading along. As this was no mere expedition and they were merely the same men who entered the quarry as they had once been, though their countenance would be wasted. And they would be not taken for whom they were while painted in red-pinkish clothes from the weird way in which the ceiling shaded its surrounding. Weirder as they had been, dragged along the way, they seemed to have come from a pair of stone graves, through which they were pulled through. With their clothes and all the combined hues of people who lost not only their humane-colors, but whom also were completely eaten and spat out. On their knees and wretched about each corner of the roundness that was their sight. It all dawned too soon, they shook and hadn’t seem to have gathered the swoon yet, yet cold was felt as they were pulled towards the man carrying his altar.

During their considerable time they were there, as each member could only put it as bluntly as possible, they were rounded up by one another’s surmountable amount of waste, that gathered around their bodies just as they began manifesting their faceless wonder and disgraced left out grit-teeth, that there was no reason to worship another, one of their last servitude, be it of an Abrahamic past or not. Since they seemed to be called towards him, the towards the one in flight and the one who was pulled and droned about the place, eternally pacing now that he was freed.

In what appeared to be a desperate yell, a thinner veil that dragged them even closer to him, he lacked the proper manners of introduction. Yet he appeared, nonetheless to be the, on whom would serve, the other side, the bodies which had formed from the limbs, they seemed to grow as tall as they would seem. Men of their own, yet mindlessly serving that one, in flight, whom, he himself had grown them off, though they were tender and had non-simian shapes, as they were wider and bore, deep in their skin, words akin to manuscripts which rolled some of the dead inside of them to keep them warm.

Many a coffin would lay as shallow. And it would be, seemingly caught inside and better wallow, as it would be swallowed by him in time of need. Holding as little and little more than a litany for them to fear, as if to hear and know the rest. And they had wagered no war, confessed.

‘I have betrayed, and long stayed my arms in wonder. Wont of naught but dead, I call her in my dreams, my child. Whom I have snuffed dead as any man would in my time, but I am sorry, I need to heed and know of it, just so I might regain my mind and latch upon your better judgment.

What am I to do in that case?’

Though the lout expected just as much.

‘But I am joined by brothers and I shall listen to what I need, if I have to, I shall produce time from my arms with every spill in order to prove my devotion.’

Regardless of it, there was never any doubt that there was something seriously wrong about the carpet. Ever since one of the heathens made it to it and establishing direct contact, it started peering in. Burning oils inside his shin before he was given a chance to take a bite off his ankle; no, there was no explanation to the depression he kept staring at below him. Nor how easily he found himself standing in a room of carpets, plainly set and accursed, where there lay a single noose he almost came to do it, rather, he understood that trying to set his throat a few inches higher was pointless.

The carpet, the carpet had a will of its own. If it willed itself in a different place, it would be so. For it was no carpet but kind of like moss, which explained why it found a way to drag itself out of the worst possible spots.

It was just as well something to be proud of. A dumb Negro stumbled past the door one day, little by little, the animal started sniffing around. It’s to be noted that the animals has little to nothing in its small head, especially when carefully analyzed and closely observed, as its prefrontal cortex appeared to be somewhat lackluster in size. There’s an uncomfortable approach that can be wrapped around its mental instability, which can only be explained by the fact that part of its ancestry as well as derogation comes from two distinct branches which interbred. Those two branches being represented, as well as might be split into ancient primates as well as simians of which shared ancestry seems likely to have stumped their mental development upon many generations alike. That being reflected as well into their superficial, or what might be considered superficial at first, appearances, yet upon a much closer inspection as well as a simple autopsy, one might come to the understanding that their similarities to their neighboring primates is nigh-uncanny.

It could as well approach the almost ritualistic, if not completely desultory-view that furthermore confirms the previously thought analysis, they're not human.

And with that type of behavior being inclined to show up from time to time, it's rather obvious that the creature was punished, lured closer to the carpet with nothing other than the desire to be punished. To have the animal whipped further and beaten, to have it marked and crippled since its existence is nothing other than an affront to the other races that inhabit the world.

Some marks could indeed be seen around its throat, as to signal the use of a rope that was used over a couple of failed attempts at lynching the animals; only to represent nothing other than subsequent failures. And failure was something that wasn't to be taken lightly, for those responsible of the act decided to allow the beast to walk freely for some time. As it was previously observed, from the various analysis over their behavior, these animals of filth delight into the belittlement and mockery of others. Their kind knows nothing of loyalty, as it seems, like any other animal, that they would resolve to the lowest of denominators possible. Forced copulation is in their blood, being a part of their loathsome nature. It cannot be disregarded by any means.

There's no doubt therefore that this animals, or what could more likely be called the bootleg of primitiveness serves as the prime example of the dangers associated with the hybridization between other organically degenerate material which poisons everything it touches.

For that reason as well as the mere fact that they were incompatible with other peoples, the Negro which shall be referred to as Simian has been castrated.

Simian being a name he had received for his acts during the war, against what appeared to be a well-to do family of Vietnamese people of whose near-feudal lifestyle had meant nothing to his nature. And it some way, it may as well be seen as nothing more but an act of well-earned laceration that can be perceived as just in some way. Wouldn't it be so?

To be certain of it now, he did end up being beaten on his way to the room. Not only so, but the man was not warned by any means. It was infuriating, leaving him there, alone, untouched, brought to his knees. A deed that was unfinished. He still had to be beaten and pounded into dirt. Regardless of it, he was, well, exposed. Various cuts and marks and whip lashes had failed to fully cauterize, leaving him very much open-to bleeding.

That being rather, safely wrapped around his largely cut-through marks in his bone, the various guts which were open as well as his whole chest appearing to be blown as well, was the mark of melting, performed by a highly heated flame. This is not to be kept lightly to heart any longer. He brought this on himself.

A reminder.

'Cut his ankles as well, we are both aware of the Negro's agility and speed. He cannot be allowed to freely run around on a whim and whimper.

We know better than that.'

'Fine, but you're going to be the one who's doing it then. I'm not getting my hands dirty again.'

‘Keep him down, make sure he’s kissing the ground then.’

A mud for mud, it was well exchanged. They were both loyalists after a fashion, and they were only performing on the Negro as anyone would do in turn.

The results of their short-lived precision will not be discussed any further.

Since it only happens for him to have finally succumbed to his wound and finally be released on top of the carpet.

And it was enough now, it wasn’t an obsession.

It could not be an obsession, having so many of them being sent there. It was mainly the Negroes, as the stairway lead higher and higher through the Quarry until it had been well established that, with so many of them having disappeared, there was no return from down there.

The sight was more pleasant from the outside as well.

Green vales, bushes that were, in some way, quietly painted, by the calloused hands belonging to masters, neither more and neither less than it should be said, that was the degrading nature of human. And it was not something to be ashamed off, as it was made to account and prevent further hindrance. Animalistic material could not dilute purity if it could be prevented.

Hence, something was taken into consideration.

He did not die down there instantly. Instead he was being broken apart, in the same way bacterium-jelly would dissolve a cube of sugar if enough time was given, so had he been taken apart through many of the pits that were wide-spread inside the carpet. There was no other way out. And it could not be accounted for any longer.

It eats skin slowly, dissects it in some way. No man should be forced to endure its touch, nor stand there, in it for too long. Boiled marks, spoiled meat, cut-feet, and worst of all, looking at it for too long.

The carpet was strained, the carpet was pained. It bore no place in the world, it was a disgraceful thing, a betterment of evil, formation of no solid place, a disgraceful thing that ought to be submerged, as it had, taking the Negro with it despite not being there in mind. And spoken of in silent prayed, another one was marked off the list.

Least of all would they walk through lances made out of bone-trance.

‘You’re all under a bone-trance.’

‘What is that?’

How?’

‘I think you contracted it by being bitten by a bone-man.’

‘And I think you’ve contracted a sanguine-board.’

‘How would that be gotten?’

‘It’s simply by being beheaded by a board, you’ve got no head yet you’re as alive as if you were bitten by a sanguine-creatures, yes.’

‘I see, for that reason I have no head.’

And neither of them were bored that day. For it seemed likely that they would eat glass, with the mouths that had replaced their toenails. And they were happily living in their peculiar spot, lighted by a single pint of emulated blood, coming out of a single vein-eater, a devourer being near. He made sounds, tightened around his throat as he was dragged and drenched in the most evil of spoils that had entered his head. Annoyed even by the desperation which castrated the highest crescent creations that were appalled as well as they had been pulled from the inner-world which was inside the carpet. Inside of it swoon a single man of ceramics of which canine-dynamic pointing beaked-fists pushed on and punched the walls. His features were benign, rid and worthless as his insides were empty but held a man, an urn-like prototype for the ones that stored their dead ancestors inside of him.

And prayed as they would to the carpet, his fists had finally generated what they could. Unable to be stopped any longer, not that they should be held by any means any longer, because this lack of peace was only but a sign.

He tore out his head, and left some cracks. The body of the filthy Negro fell through the carpet and entered him, a piece at a time, his gut being lacerated, dolefully being pushed through him until he had been unable to correct the mistake which was the dreadful pain. Felt by the Negro as he only pushed deeper inside of him and would remain. Close to his dead mind accessed by a fraction of a second he would not find it fair, the dread being accessed in the disquietude spent and eaten, worn out by the scum inside the ones that were there.

Too many of them had been pained by the loss of the diseased they shared.

As soon as the nigger had been pushed through the urn, despair had fallen unto all, they couldn’t handle nor too far, the absorption of disease which ate. Neither of which one would be fairly placed as if to count the shreds and eat ahead and share between one another much of the despair they felt. Unable to see and feel, they shared a tear for the beheaded one, the one who kept them company for the longest time.

‘Poor man, I see he him for what he is, desperate now in turn and broken.

Me thinks we should hold an eulogy for him.

Since he was the oldest after all, our father after some kind, comical in some way, as it seems, I wish there was a chance we could pull him.’

And let alone they had attempted, to direct and dissect from a body whose scent could not be. If it meant a fraction of him could still be redeem in part, they’d do it, not to leave themselves exposed for many, and least of all the leeches were plenty. Shared between each other, spare, and sappers or mind would eat and devour as well. Mind for the taking and bastardly they spoke.

‘I see the quietness, I hear its wronged, of days they see. We shall be, then, within reason, them.’

‘The ones?’

‘Indeed, the ones who shall open his body and dress in his skin and wear his bone and be infected as well by the bone-trance.’

‘But was I not cured of it?’

No, because it was no bone-trance, it was a bloodbath-bone-trance to begin with. It all made sense because you’re filled with blood and in order to activate it, you need both components, the bone and the blood.

Look inside of him.’

As soon as they tore the body open, they found no blood. Indeed, it was the reason for him not being affected by the bone-trance, it was because he had no blood to begin with.

In order to do it, one of them had to bleed in order to dance around his body as he became a fountain of blood only so they could dance around in the rain and cover themselves with as much blood as they could remain the color crimson.

‘I think I shall be the first one to offer.’

And therefore, he took out a knife and like the famed hara-kiri tradition, passed on as a ritual would, he stabbed himself. Truly he did, with no shame and without even happening to refrain himself from any kind of pain that might do him so. It was all so painful and it could only go so far as to slow him down. Because it ate his finger and he was only trying himself not to laugh.

Pain was cheerful, in general. Suicide is an act of glory that should be condemned as it was a true act of courage as opposed to abortion which is an act of cowardice. But that has been said and the child should be offered a chance to get back and boil the skin of the mother who’s attempted it. That would only be fair, for the afterlife is only brought as a pay-back for those who suffered themselves to be too bold when it wasn’t needed.

Dal

He had been the most humane, unearthed from what seemed to still draw away, from every turn and every turn, he wept. But he had lived alone and refused to understand. Why was it that he came around and why was he guarding himself, eternally in the shroud of sound?

It was confusion which drove his guts to speak in a bewildered fashion. And he had dreaded, if anything the advent of questions he would asked himself. For all the land was his, and it was plain to see that there was nothing and none would even hope to bring him back. Lain where he stood, planted where he shook.

He was well preserved for a man like him who had unnerved himself and dreaded coming forth to a jury-like formation of his own peer. Made long-before they stretched and reached him, in plains, clear to see as they were forlorn and wrapped around the stand, many of them appeared to share a certain resemblance to Dal, who, he himself was unable to count himself out no longer. Watched and peered, sneered upon as if his condescending manner brought nothing to them no more.

‘And no more shall I listen to you, as I was given nothing to look upon other than my work made by my ancestors.

I died, have I not.’

But nay they said and directed him to walk around and seek and beseech for something that would be plain to see and pushed around only so he could dread no long and witness forth. An ascension or the birth. Upon which he could not sound even more condescending than he had been. His will was only as strong as he had seemed, weak-limbed and weak of wrist.

Yet a man that was purely preserved, by the will of some unknown force; of which origin might not be contested upon, nor could there be a reason to ask. They masked nothing and would only beseech him to ask, the shroud of sounds were voices, he knew. Voiced by many, of birth, lost through; for a man, he was rather thoroughly plain in the head.

Wrapped everywhere around and unable to see himself no further than the few steps he’d taken.

‘We bid you to search a reason to live.

Not only have we been made to resemble you, but I suppose the farce of the malign, might be lost within a generation, thinned by your most repulsive whims.’

‘I will not take a break until I create something that’s perfect, as the mind of a child.’

‘Your innocence is lost, don’t break your back thinking, as you may never come to recreate what you have once conceived throughout your mind.’

With which he tried, and looked benign, he could not hold back whatever he had in mind. He had enough dirt, but could not use his hands, those things were too simple and they did not, would not feel right. They could not be gotten, picked aside, praised upon and upheld.

Inconsiderate, to say the least, he would not be appeased, although he was not concerned with what was going on around him. Brims around each edge, breaking, he remembered there, across one of the false-cliffs, whence the depths were fake and appeared to be flat upon approaching. From the distance one would see them push even deeper through what appeared to be a valley, until the almost incredulous illusion of a fall emerged.

Though upon drawing even closer than that, it was all too obvious that one could not witness himself, pox-bubbles floating on his mind, he was unable to think of anything else. For the same reason that he made it so far, standing in one place would be hard enough of its own, therefore the alternative. It was no land he was in.

But the fragment of a ship-yard in the body of a planetoid that had took part in the twist, where a part of the planet had completely abdicated to wronged filth-servants whom would not obey. Some would stay and satiate no hunger.

Somehow, by no mere explanation, he was still allowed to live.

On the fake-cliff there stood a machine. He expected it to look different, especially since the distance made wonders within his barely understood myopia mark.

Encrusted into what appeared to be hardened starch, he could not, for the likes of him understand. Somewhere in there, or anywhere there was a reason for the war that left this planet this way. From the chance of the plains to the broken shipyard where his heart remained perturbed if not in place. Beating with each second thoroughly stopped. He was being, if anything bled out, only to retreat in a more secluded wreckage, though not before having pulled the head off the machine and having brought it with him.

That was just as important.

He spoke with it, like he had done before. No response so far.

What he had done after was thoroughly peculiar.

He simply wrapped his arms around it and hugged the screen upon the display, there would be no light and no energy to make it work again. It almost made him weep. But he felt like listening to the humming of a song. Dal was depressed. This wasn't his home and this was not his friend.

He heard no sound and refused to stand erect upon both his feet. What he saw out there, would as well be nothing, it might as well be nothing more than a growing illusion, following the train of melted starch generated by the machine once the roots were pulled and thrown in part.

He would not dislike it, blue pendulum swings in the night. Waiting there for any other light than that. Of dots wide-spread, not many but a few. But how could this be? They bled the poor thing until it would not shine, in place, within three months, where he stood and cowered, with the single-head, powered by nothing but tears, a short-circuit shot between his brows.

A permanent scar, as far and as widely pushed around would lay.

A few miles away from where he stood, there seemed to be a small acreage-like foundation but only in depth and form, surrounded by the shapes of eighteen burned out into metal cutout-like forms of deformed men which were made out of skin and held one another within the reach of their hands as large pastel colors rang from the sky, dropping like bells. From the sinner-sides, which leapt every two or three of them alike in nature, there would be a man or two with empty heads, leaving the ones between them filled. With their small cranial capacities expanding and exceeding that of their peers until they looked flat no longer; although they would hold no brains, yet some insignificantly deformed curved-like similar featured animal-leftovers from the fusion between the many-legged insects with which they bred with. It was hard to see through their segments, yet their young were held in there.

More so, neither of them should be allowed to be looked into, for their roots only planted beneath the acreage until they formed inter-connected limb-wires that gave the impression of peculiar fragmented nets being there, held for the safety of their planted-in depths young. Many were worn out and were infested with past genetic codes and recessives alleles that would offer their offsprings most peculiar shapes. Not to mention the fact that in one distant generation, they would be united no longer. Since their union depended on the survival of their people, the future was still somewhat uncertain. And it could just not be, the filth through which they had to go through. All of the sacrificed made along the way, they would amount to nothing as well as the fact, being that there was no greater pain their kind could convey. It was hard felt and accepted, to think of it this way. They would be held together, never acting, never watching but feeling them rise through the help of weird pheromones, inconsistent with their nature. Through and through.

‘I can finally see it, my dear good friend, thank you for pointing everything out for me, otherwise, I think I would’ve missed it.’

And as such he was finally seeing things. After all this time, this was the first man who appeared from the distance, starting over the cloud of smoke-pus which rounded at each puff-like dome until it hardened all around. Many of the clouds were too hard to have been anything even closely resembling normal earthly formations, since they had the supreme need of stopping and folding atoms around them. Some looked extremely dark but they wore lightning bolts inside of them as well as everywhere around them. It could simply not be well enough, that every now and then, one would look like copper, iron or alloy as well as a human face, curved around. So many remnants of redistributed atoms appeared to be shaping and changing one another until they could no longer pry out.

It was all too clear that inside one of the cracked egg-shells like sharper, almost none-domed because of the oval pointers pushing out of them, that there were some proto-beings being conceived. Archetypes that were both solid and gaseous, as they were allowed to be so by the control of atoms the clouds forced upon them.

But it could not be so, that this connection also shot in the past, travelling through every shade and every time period where the atoms had been taken from, in turn. Many platforms and many men, all fell away and died.

Some gentleman of no due, woke up with a missing face which faded as soon as he spoke through it and lost his calm. He relaxed no longer and gave no explanation, no excerpt or any due. For what he felt was evil and evil-through. Only evil-thought in the sinew of sky would save him from the evil-die.

‘He was a man of evil which was punished.

The atoms of evil-men survive. It is all too clear that history has been written, made, contorted and carried through by those of utmost vile intentions.

Not to mention that without them and their will, there could be nothing held and witnessed passing through. One would have to account for them. Otherwise history would be dull instead.’

He only had to flicker a hand to prove it so. After all, he wore a knife in it and a young girl of fifteen was standing by him, of course it would be no loss. She was infertile after all, barely a woman, barely a child. Unnaturally benign and ripe for the life-taking.

‘Don’t worry my dear, I would much rather just give you a kiss, but I’m not going to.

Even though you are close to being in your prime, and beautiful at that, I can feel it inside of you. No life may be conceived, therefore you may as well be treated like the cripples and the darks. And may not be allowed to breathe or partake in the pleasantries our good folk may go through in doubt.

But enough of that, he could not wait, not take a swipe, as a part of the right side of his hip got turned into a mighty cloud within three knots. All banished through as he fell, between cracks of his ribs and skin, half of his body clouded, then within the pass of a few seconds, so had his chin and face.

Alas, the man was gone, while the girl ran with a knife lodged in her arm.

Walk forth, walk forth, walk forth and you are of no worth.

His saxophone emerged from behind, it dreaded erupting from inside his body but pushed and writhed out. There in the open, bleeding as the damned emerged, and sang his name in ancient tongues that were ripped from the insides of murmuring mummies that died before their times had come. In the corner, there were crooks and they could not help themselves but shook and in loss.

There was nothing more pleasant than seeing his kin. How they wasted away and how they’ve once been. Past the enclosed area where they only fought for morsels and lived as they may, one could not be able to look past what seemed to be they way.

Longer bridges, upon the top of where, many forts were underway, being built across what seemed to be shores, but there was no sea surrounding them anymore than there were creatures set in flight. Wrought before them, some in sight, but they would disappear before the morning even came to pass. And little by little could they realize that there was no way out. A sun never emerged with a light of hues. Instead, they seemed desperately lonely to find one within. For so many of them to have split meant that they knew something lay inside of them. Unordinary by the way they shook, but never bled, they understood.

It was hard to reason with anyone. Every step made it only too apparent.

Cut around each step, the throat pumped. He looked around and yelled, no doubt could ever push him through, many people on their way, sinew.

Dal appeased whichever deity could come around him. It wanted to waste no forth, appearing like a plain man wearing a robe with the only difference being the size and the fact that he walked through a transparent weaker guise.

He had tiny slippers on, it made him crumble with each step unless he could hold it at all. In, through and through, closer to him as he appeared to draw, he could not help it, least of all would he say something that might catch his eye. Pain was the defector, listening to no god he merged, with one of the drooping organs that hanged along the neck-curve.

‘He was watching.’

‘No, he was watching.’

‘He’s still watching.’

From the distance, he comes now.

His mind had been invaded by his command once their connection was established, placed on its way.

Dal still belonged to him. In this weird twist of fate and through whichever notion pushed his mind, as thin as his body, it was but a boot. But he had listened to the command as he shook.

And there shall be shrines set in his name, which shall prevent destruction as well. They shall see him as a symbol and beware. But it had to be held along the way, hidden before them.

For he was greeted by the Duke

A fluke of mind he did not intend, to look upon, Malt could not fathom looking ahead. For no direction would restrict his mind. His fingers were benign, shaking for the first time in a long period during his initial absence. Too many things did not fit.

Too many stationary-raised oblong structures, that’s as much as it took. Though they might be known no less and shattered, they looked wrong. They seemed to be made for someone sardonically left behind.

‘It’s hardened, the flood has hardened, I can see it already.’

My kingdom, long-since fell, into shards and pieces, spread as well.’

Crushed beneath his gaze and eyes, he knew, the least of all, he could not be blinded, nor could he look forth. He wanted to take no part and found himself of no worth any longer. Only a shade remained of what seemed to be the Duke. His entity was nothing, in this regard. Mocked by a flood made out of the face of Agamemnon, in heart, although scoundrelry was not something to be accounted for, he was surrounded, he could see it.

Even though they haven’t interacted, they were there as well, by whichever means one could tell. Many Suppressors chose to stand their ground, yet hidden from sight, as they would not approach him, the face, nor Malt, disgrace. Is what they felt after, never wanting, never spending their time; it was all too difficult, seeing how he would be even more in doubt.

There were weird twists and patterns that would sweep in, mixing in the scuffs across the first pole standing around each domed door. Near one and gotten, they almost forgot it and went ahead.

He could not handle seeing his kingdom fade. Thence it had appeared, akin to a tectonic plate, neared the one end whence the floor of the hideout was almost dragged across the doors and pulled below until it fell. Through the ground, closer as well to the ship, where they seeped in the bodies, through the abattoir and the butcher's graves; whereas he would stave his hand, the Duke remained in position, glancing. His stance never to be mixed with the rancid pucker, and fealty black-lotus pouches of black pus, of their sub-humanity drawn and colored but neared an end, alas. Thence Agamemnon spake, and he had swelled his body ached. For it was not him, nor they, as they could not have remained in a place out of their need to see and better move where the sea was solid, walked upon.

Nearing doubt, as well as the wickedness of malignantly lost shouts crowned them.

'I shall never let you reach that plain where we have promise your kind to be. Walk upon and be at a loss. We shall cast you in the oblivion you have made your biddings on. '

'But let us be clear on something first. We must not fail to come upon an accord. Plain though it may be, I see no reason to not see him through.

He needs to be given a single slight and a shimmer of hope that would take him down a notch.

Return to a side, there, in the benign. On a single platform you may rise upon and walk and do as you please until there's nothing begotten through.

Pleased or not, I should not be surprised if you would not pay no heed to the signs. We left behind the headless and the blind. Feed on them and take them back, claim your servants and we shall think about. '

'A kingdom rising, all for you.'

'Did you hear that Duke? I think they've made you an offer.'

Malt said as he had stuck It through, as to him, both in place. Though the ground had been cracked and lead downwardly towards the usurped side of the ground where they might sit and stay their hands, never asking, yet convey. And pushing through as if to say.

'Follow me through, oh Duke, follow me through, down there, where we shall stray.

Let's see what he's given you, just so I may be on my way and seek the man that had escaped.'

As not even after all this time could he forget, that one man who almost took what he had looked for granted, and stolen from him, his heart, enacted. Through the fealty of no loss, though sparingly he did lost his temper, he walked ahead.

'Stray your arms and do not look the other way around.'

The means in which the creature which grated their path was nothing but an illusionary, unfashionable manner, the circumstances not being discussed; as the being itself was disgustingly unsanitary, dirty, gritty, made of scum. Looked as likely as to have been bitten off, by visible chunks of rabies swollen, an unsparingly broken around the collar bones, dead throngs and other wrongs that kept him be.

It was necessary to open up his eyes to see that this giant was half-armored by a suit made for the preservation of the diseased, distressed, a human that was a mess, though globular and tainted, like a solid malignant pool of waste, embraced upon, part of him-the pillar of scum, Agamemnon's face on his shoulders and arms. While the creature somewhat preserved a humanoid side, not to abide too dreadfully the blind gaze left little to the parts of him melting by.

A suit of dead robes of skin appeased the sky as they could be seen in forms of clouds. Many of them were dressing leaves that flowed through and covered the buildings that made the crested roofs, hidden beyond they gazeless eyes. Though they could not see it, that was felt. More so than it was necessary to dissect each step and see themselves erected upon a pillar, lay ahead.

'I was told I was to greet you and lead you to the ship.

Down there I shall make sure you shall be pleasantly escorted to the main-board which shall be used to drag the bunkers towards the other side of the world, enter through a cosmic-haze as we make our way to a reality that's closer to the maze which had become. The Duke's labyrinthian flooded kingdom in its prime.'

To which they nodded and waited, for no simple explanation could be gotten off. Rightly so, not through their back, they were basing their knowledge but could not understand what kept either of them back.

'We should establish something here then.'

'What would that be?'

'A chain of command, that's clear. I think we can see one another, eye-to eye, though I may have some difficulty setting aside the fact that you're in my house. I mean outside of it, but you know what I mean.

Each and everyone one of you intruded in my mind and I think I had it just enough with all of you.'

'Yet you've no right to complain about what's been going through down there. That is more or less your fault as well.'

As the fact, though they looked down upon what they've done, this was nothing but a common ground they seemed to meet at. A mid-point, the broken joints, the fact that he felt himself empty and never brought to the justice his heart had felt, long-past, way long.

'I think we both know you're not the same man as you used to be.'

'That's irrelevant now. I've taken his place and I am far better than he's ever been.

I have brought control over everything.'

Yet this Malt could feel it slipping away, as hardened as he claimed himself to be, it was far too difficult for him to see a way out.

'We should keep us to ourselves where lay. Beneath their corners an in the depths, from what I've seen, there's little hope of finding a survivor here.

You should know and have been made aware of what's down there.'

'And how would you know what to expect? Was it not I who took control to this disgraced hole and made order out of it?

This ship is just as plainly still mine just like everything else is. It's rather clear who's still in control but I shall say as little and shall do no more than it pleases me.'

'Your heart has darkened, but I am not in the rightful place to speak of it still. I think you've come to understand the debauchery which happened on my side.

Know that we are not inside the ship beneath your hideout, but rather.

Inside the pool, underneath my kingdom, though it may not look so.'

To him, still yet, the walls were formed as to fit it, as they both could see it manifest. And it was dreadful in some way, being there for this long, as they could not focus yonder and least of all understand what was going on. And filth was uncannily strident but sharp, yet it could be penetrated through as if it didn't matter at all. Nor would it come to be.

He knew much better than to see and be forlorn.

An important thing had to be spoken off before it could recede.

It was an old belief which was lost, with the defilement and disablement of the heads inside their death-chamber, in the station or in the pipes, where they might be or lay, wherever their hearts might be, along the way or not. It had been brought to someone's attention, to pray upon uncanny waves and let alone would they know of what the inscription said.

For it was missed with blood and the chamber was still, and it would still be stilled inside its tightness when the two fat-guards came to drag the man out of it, somewhere, underneath one of the slabs, those curved along, it was written, alas.

His personal belief, which could only seep and seem to be the same, though unknowingly real, despite what it claimed:

'A man is not the same, for he will always be replaced upon growth. And then he dies, inside and he's replaced, by someone of the same looks who thinks the same, inherits his will, nonetheless and carries on where he left.'

And that was as much as it could go, that the belief, though it wasn't spoke off, carried this mark. His name and lass, and memories of home and those of old, for he was the person to inherit this much, for every amount of malice and change and everything that had remained of the original man.

That was who he was. Alas, it could only be cast and thrown, along the way like every memory that shone. In plains and wonder, whichever man the strongest, regardless of who came there, and whoever pushed through ill and unaware, they had to make sense of it all.

And the predecessors whose will shall stall him, couldn't be but one forgotten.

There in a chamber of dark, darker still than the one he was locked in.

Pulled behind by many others.

Much precise, he'd be a man, like all of them, holding to the other as well. Questioning what they had done, with each other's legacies, now that they were all gone. Progress being stumped, and change being as frightening as it were, many of them would come to realize that they were unaware of the disgraceful thing and the fear they felt on a whim. It was just too much to take. Some would want to lose the grip and fall out of the room, as they hang and shook only to the lamp on the ceiling, trying not to fall in an abyss. And they feared even more, as they were him, each man whose memories they shared, who wonderingly wanted to bring back the next comer that they lived as well as the others.

And none wanted to let the grip out of fear. Who would want to do so, as to be forgotten? Unable to realize that things could be much worse and their heart battered, that, alone, that was too much. Mainly so and likely to be impossible to deal with or to cope with; below them, death was a chasm. It was nothing but another masked thing, a hole in the dark, a proton sphere than disabled all. Whatever it was called was in itself irrelevant. As one would not want as much, they could not deal with the stance of death.

Rather than die with their memories they had to check.

'Everyone stand and cling, don't leave the grip. Though much changed, and we're contradictorily, I alone am not willing to give up on the past.

I may not be as great as others claim, my inspirations for thoughts remain in the past and evenly refrained, for all to see and many to be, for the likes of me, I cannot give up on any of you.'

'Then let others in the real world fall to woe.'

'But fool, no one shall ever know what we've been talking for.

All this time and we face the risk, that so many of what we speak might be lost on a whim of time.

For, is it not cruel? Can it be defined? What of it?

If I may not speak my mind, I fear like everyone of you, that we might disappear if we let our emotions through.

Know that we're not great, but it's our chance.

Eventually we shall be forgotten and abandoned, but with the least amount of hope we could save as many of our own to make it in time.'

'Leave it be then and make it so.

We have to fight harder in order to preserve our minds in the same way they were so.'

So much they feared and even less than it was neared, they were unable to make out, for sight or of delight, what might happen if they fell. They were distancing yet again. Farther through and even farther, the deeper they went and the hindrance had livened. It was difficult.

For the ones that had arrived forgot more and more of the past and that was the only thing he cherished most, of all of them, for better or worse. It was the act of memories, and everything of past woes. Regardless of how mean and pitiful and worrisome they were, it was the most dreadful thing of all, to forget. Of all the vile things of evil and deeds that would bring much upheaval, of all the sadness, fury one had felt, of all the awful things and realizations one had lived through as well, time forgave, but memory would fade. Eventually but time, and all those past delights would take him be. But here, in some way, most would live.

Regardless how pitiful, regardless of the shame, they had to live through him much heeded, or else everything else might fade; some things were rather pitiful and meaningless if they were lost. But most of them would be forgiven, if somewhere along the way, came at a cost.

And they had thrust forth, despite the fact that their arms tired. Wouldn't mind it, for a fraction of attire and how silly some of them looked. But they were not dead and were far from giving in now, as they would keep a fraction of themselves on whim.

But Malt couldn't have known of that, nor would he bother to think it other than a mere thought. He had his world and the mystery in front of him, that reinforced everything he had.

If memories were stored in patterns, if behavior were to be replicated, that way they could be grouped. And once grouped, there'd be no chance for any to forget or miss his chance as well as find a loop, only to devour each neuron and each strike. In order to reinforce it, one would have to act the same way through a similar even, or otherwise, he would stand the chance to forget and mind himself as to be replaced by someone who's totally uncanny. Regardless of shame, the vile, or things that would defile, elation, he would have to carry on this way. That is but how a man is built, and once he knows and once he realized who he is and once he's done, there's no chance for redemption, or mischance of light. He has to live up to what he's claimed himself to be, or else he is no man at all.

And past cruelties would not erase, nor would they shame him for any shade. It's his path in life, his past and future. He might be forgiven or shamed. But the outcome of his actions is irrelevant as much as he would fight in vein.

Therefore they walked in silence, but for a little while.

The Duke unknowingly didn't watch, nor wondered why he was as silent, nor as salient as he claimed to be. It was hard and getting harder, yet to push through, all those fading yet to be moments. Everything he's thought, hauntingly stored. It was a hard reflection of who he was now and even the Duke, of all could see who he was and what for.

The man was no longer young. He had grown an unfashionable looking beard and looked as if he would not fit. He was uncannily out of place there, but his life had taken something from him. IT was pitiful, what he was trying to achieve. And how long after he's tried his hands in, for every step was worse than the last one. Every push and every sole a hard reminder, he was no longer who he claimed, nor did he look like any kind of survivor. It could not be poetic in any way, since he didn't know either what his lfie had been before he even opened his mouth and said a thing.

There was much to spare, in some sense.

No one would understand it, in any case, since it was highly contextual, a thing that didn't matter as long as one were desperate enough to try that.

Memory was meaningless for someone who spent so much time inside, locked inside his chamber and left to replace every moment and every kind of long-past lived event with the time. And time endlessly spent there, with nothing to look after and lived through a nest of mental ill. It could not be quantified how horrible it would sound, trying to come about with anything other than what seemed to be the clueless walls. Of many whom would not speak about, nor hear, nor share. Though some would listen, others paled. It could never compare, regardless of word or composition, no mind and no allusion to the thing that was life, living for a short amount of time compared to nothing else.

At least nothing uncanny and no kind of blind desperation, man could not become machine. Despite how soulless he would seem, there was as much as he would look through. For every experience gone and the see-through.

Twas' the reason for which the unit could not, in the end, for the sake of it understand why the head lopped, every single time fading, being brought and much replaced. It was just that. He was nothing if he didn't try. Standing inside the chamber, waiting to die meant nothing, it was pitiful, despite all distraction. And many time and once attractions when he appeared, trying to arose, a single emotion, the elation he would seem to bring, which rose.

But he was not them any longer and he would not think of anything yet.

It didn't matter what memories got replaced now, since he inherited none of their past and would only look to dominate, that which came at last.

Forest in the Enclave

They were making clicking noises while underway. Underwhelmed, the two of them couldn't convey the slightest and aged. A slight taste of murky wine in the water, upon the deluge, close upon, to it, there gathered a few Patron-Masters.

Lankly and Seke could not wait. Why would they put their hands together when they could not satiate the slightest hint of hunger, underwhelmed and almost pulled behind, almost drowned evenly, it could only go two ways, here or there on out.

Fruitless, the urns were poached. They were only vibrating when touched, emerged.

A city could not be set on the rails for too long, it was too unnecessary for them to admit that they were not made to last in there, unaware of the conditions, there.

Came a man out of one of the distant rummaged through tent-houses, long and stark and strongly set aside near the other built homes. One would have to humble himself in order to take away something from their customs, hardly dealt-with.

‘Why, so forlorn, I see that there’s a reason you were here for.’

Said the man wielding a knife, as it was bluntly turned around, right below his waist, encouraged to look upon it, he almost wailed. There were too many things that almost seemed too cruel. A fuel for the thought, a knife was brandished after that.

Another one pulled after, a trick, to which he seemed to have captured the attention of everyone standing inside. He was out there despite the common-movement he leaped through behind. Every moment was spent trying to figure it out in some way. How did he keep the balance his fingers refused to push through him and stay?

Various practices have not been spoken off for various reasons. Most of them would or would not appear to keep up with the fact that many of them were still practiced even to this day in secret. Mostly so, or thrown around for each cavern and every point where they would be heard and lessened to would be, most likely inconsistent with the fornication of their needles. Since they appeared to induce nothing more than their effect and the thing which most conclusively broke them; to put this point precisely on a single location, one would have to take the youth, a young athletic person in good health.

He would have to be pushed past his extremely condensed limit through which his body appeared only to be drawing the air out of itself in the small attached bags at the end of each nettling-needle. Whatever point entered him would not mattered. He was the tool of his own pain, enabled by nothing more than the needle-bags.

The needle-bags were crafted directly in the honor of the Goliaths, of which descent appeared to leave no line that might be traceable to their distant ancestors. Regardless of it, these needle-bags were fashioned in a way through which they would resemble them, and most importantly they mutated in forming multiple heads at once. All of those only grew on top of one another and pushed in until they had finally let go of their long-protrusions which went through. And many were only dreading the substances in which they bred.

Many of the bags were already looking flat, deflated and pushed only through their racked smaller pin-line push-through, smaller pints, smaller, much smaller than expected. They were the protrusions of their mouths. Everywhere across the mouths, it was important to know.

Somewhere in the wild, the Goliaths finally grew. No longer kept under control, they started growing until they appeared to look as if they had been ripped apart by force and torn. Various marks could be seen, all too tainted and purple, around which bone-like eyes started spreading their mouth roundedly in a fashion, pulling everything into smaller rations only to eat themselves to death. The natural state only leads to death. It is for that reason that guturous-noises could be found just about in every placed. Too bastardly, in a disgraceful manner which added to the organic contribution of the forest they ended up being struck in. Despite common belief, they would not reside in high-nests, or wild peaks.

It was another important distinction which nodded at their inability to think.

Filthy, unnatural creatures, as much as they were, it was way too late for any of the ones that were freed to recover.

Regardless of it, that could not change the outcome of the bags. For what was worth, they forced his bony-body, as it had become after the long usage of self-inflicted insertions, to draw large amounts of blood, and perform a pendulum-like transfusion which mixed up his guts inside. Shot in the back as his bone matter, organs and the entire structural anatomical form he bore would start condensing into smaller points. From each and every single one, shot inside the wall, he finally had his chest swollen, emptily forlorn. Split in many bits and pulled through. He would have to survive for long to see, that out of him nothing but his inside-needles lay, with the bags fully formed, bloated and finally, the look-a-likes of the Goliaths in their fully bastardly gloves. Of warmth, inside their chests, many faces of their own, nothing more than long-lost gore. From everywhere and every point, when they would have to erect themselves, it was pointless to look ahead.

This practice had to have been lost, instead.

There was another, he walked with sin. His face was pallid and he was thinned out, with every single one of his guts being torn out, or so he looked like, until one had come to realize that he was no man. And each tube-like stomach-form, which pushed on appeared to grow everywhere until it could not be held in place. They were only so fat as their meat distribution allowed. Otherwise, none else might suffice.

He would not be sacrificed. He was a tool with no legs, dragged away once the meat pulled everything in him, conveyed. By the back, there appeared to be horns, but they were not made out of ivory or any similar manner and most importantly, they were not his. Instead, they appeared to be completely inverted, attached to his back, inside of them, there were heads. Alike to his as well as the predecessors upon the filth of which they drew behind off, leaving their bodies to slowly grow and overlap their features as they not only united but also took the form of the insides of the horn they stood in. Deeply-bit and sucked dry of the filth through which they bit the lip out of; to be more precise about it:

Inside they looked like wax-faces, with more wax being poured from the empty holes that were bore inside their necks. Their precise placement in that tight spot, and the direction against which they were being pointed at appeared to dictate whichever of their facial feature would be completely assimilated and whichever, in the other case would be preserved. At least until the point where, upon the closing in of the space of the form, slightly flattened or hurt, leaving just as much to be held upon.

If the horn were to be placed upon its flat end, where it appeared like it had been pulled from on top of a giant mid-scalp region revolving around the forehead, pointing with the tip towards the mid-afternoon sun, the heads would be stacked on top of one another in a perfectly pole-like formation, with a slight gap at the top. Then, as the horn would be lowered down slowly, the heads would start falling over, blocking the duct as they would only leave a wider gap between the last stuck-together heads and the tip of the horn.

Tiny hairs also connected the heads with the horn, being fed through them, although the slimy holes around their faces and heads could not be seen by clear eyes. The horns were megalithic in size, or close to being so. The substance which poured through their throats, out of their heads and through everything else was some kind of sponge. Leaving various times, minutes as much as second of waiting, or stretching as much as hours at a time, during a time where they would not allow one another a better time to spread through, only to withdraw back into their throats.

When it happened, most of the facial features which had been assimilated would be replaced by new ones, or older ones, depending on various factors. One of those factors was correlated with the aggression the man displayed, as he, unlike no other man could only show as much. His pain and hatred, those displays appeared to influence the organic-cells they were being fed with. His anger appeared to subdue them ever so slightly until they shaped themselves like their host, in order to avoid any kind of laceration or chance of retaliation if discovered. Yet, with all that, they were still not native to the horns they inhabited. Instead, the horns were nothing other than living shells, often used for that purpose. Since at the tip of their pointy ends, the material had become as weak as to be purposefully and completely broken through, cracked, smashed with the ease of a child's prudently pushed-through fingers.

And the strange creature only did as it would do, draw in the fat, then push out, yet never through its back.

Pain would not dissolve any of it.

Trying to find such creatures, the specific specimens of their kinds was as hard and unreasonable as it originally seemed to be. There was no way to put it, other than to admit that they were hard to reach, especially since this happened out. Much of their presence being rather set, in-doubt, when one has to ask about it, they would not discern the creature's location; more so it was being followed by unseen eyes at any time. Whence they would appear, nearing some kind of crossing between the two of them, stood so.

They were not murderers, not warlocks of any kind, but appeared to share some countenance between the two of them, which was only shared in the feeling they had in mind. A gluttony of broken knees, both of them shared it, for, over a few more days, in which this was spoken of, and buried through, it was obvious, they were nymphomaniacs, satyrs of their kind, but wore the faces of women, cut and swollen, drawn from around, their scent bringing arousal, the women were alive.

They were acting like harpies; as all women of their tribes would happen to wrap themselves any man and take him down.

Some of them had been impurely woven all around their bodiless odors. He remembered precisely when this happened. Though it seemed like it would be a distant event otherwise; first a break before anything could be done with, before he could finally walk and dance and call upon the forced of the wing that seeped inside the bloody pools and fashion all that would be accounted past the coolness of a broken wind.

Where did they live?

Of their primitive ways and of their susceptibility to pain, ever-so much was documented, somewhere in the wild-trench woods they hid inside the primordially set jellies. Those who had encased them boldly, and they were wreathing their bodies threw. And they would throw their springs away and hide in shame, for a woman's beauty faded just as soon as she would be on her way, bashed with a rock, a head that's been cracked and abandoned down a dugout.

There were smaller things he lived on. Shorter on the touch, wretched in disgust and looks, that was something he failed to understand.

Need to build something, he thought. I have to wrap my hands around them. Couldn't make a word that was pressed in his forehead; the sun was yet to rise. A few platforms lead to his demise, and for that alone, they were gone, off the chains, a band of criminals that were only holding the slimiest lances. Most of who were drenched in stench. A few snails round his neck, the throaty fellow was still to kill a man in cold blood. Others were like him while some still yearned to open one up. He was brought upon a wild morass. Upon a hold they rounded up one of the strange passers.

Since he was ill, and better still. He stood and made no sound, thinking they would move on. With the exception of him being wildly surrounded, enacted and retreading soon, unable to swoon and lay upon the monsoon that was the weather.

It was horrendous; he was impolite of all men. Of the wretchedness he displayed they knew naught. Of what was brought to knee and yonder. And all the fealty which was stronger. A man, a prude, had come to thee and he had begged for mercy, to be thoroughly denied. He was fashioned like a bone-of man. Thinner still than a dog's yell.

Beaten atop his head, then asked.

'What of old fools that don't last winter's grasps, and of summer's heat the furnace, the age of gray after?'

'I only want to look for a way back; I want to return to my flock of sheep like my ancestor, the Sheppard.'

But he was flogged at the back of his head and there, in a matter of seconds, many crows and raves and birds of dark, they appeared in dread and felt his body as he rocked the sides, or rocky depths, in the river he had pushed through, of the dead. They tried to pull him, and mask the fear they might seethe. It was dreadful, how abandoned this morass felt, now that they have killed the only man.'

'He was bound to die across the path, stray your tears, we weren't made for that.'

'But what if you're wrong about it?'

'What if then?'

Why live for a few more hours? A few years pass. And what of his dreams, a shepherd, when he cannot even claim his stance, oh, but what is this?'

He looked back, turned around by the bloody pool from which he came out of. Dead birds attached to his extending throat, and many legs were joined and pushed forth, sitting on top of the water like a spider, an arachnid in looks. Though he only floated on the contaminated coagulated blood he had crafted himself a pillar on top of, he walked and formed a bridge as soon. As his nostrils felt the blood, he started eating the crows, some of the ravens and spat them out.

'Too tender, I need my meat raw but this is too raw.'

I think I ought to settle with all of you now.'

Instead of begging, he only wanted peace. And cut of many swoons and many. Ask and it shall be given, a pucker blossom made of skin-fragments floated in the distance. They knew naught and could not understand what was going on, thenceforth, they chose disease, distressed as many would feel displeased. But they also grouped up and formed a large, in-cut circle, readying themselves for any kind of fight that might be needed. Otherwise there would be no hope, let alone, choose as they may, the trees had provided the ropes.

‘Lichen-hardened, ropes in the morass.

I think we’re being preyed upon.’

‘I think there’s only one way to settle down.’

Now, listen thee into distance from which arose, a man of no worth with a title that should be worn out, with little of his mind spoken off, afflicted. He walked in perilous way and pushed past their lays, up-strung through the desert, meeting the man whose stolen piece of meat-face shone. Upon the arid sun woven, he asked for something else and more.

‘I wish we had the chance to spar.’

‘There’s no time for that, I’m reaching around.

I need your help, the desert hides them and I may never reach them on my own.’

‘Then I shall join you and be plain.’

‘You’ll see no gratitude if you remain, such is the way here.’

‘I’ve no doubt so far.’

The forest was wicked nonetheless, way before the desert ended, past its stretch and never-trenched. It only pushed around and followed dead in the pass the making, little doubt to its renown, the fore ate what it could gnaw on. It was all fair in touch, the deranged only watched and wondered what went on.

Glory to Mongol

He’s failed once, why would it be different now?

There was no point in thinking about it, or why they were still in town. Not after everything that’s been going on for so far.

He was gifted one thing, one chance to turn around and leave, to reappear again in the other head, where the other neck held him still.

Agamemnon’s mercy was nothing but a slight sign, that he wanted Mongol to have peace of mind.

‘Leave, stumble, you’re given this chance that you may return to them before I may see the.’

For he felt it, in the same way he would look upon a child going along the way.

One push wasn’t enough to bring them together. Though it felt tender nonetheless; it’s been a while, going through the pointlessness of filth, through the destroyed fields. Through lost generations and through every single moment of frustration.

But with each crawl, he started leaving the shell and came upon the same body he had once held, Mongol crawled again.

This may not have been the place, but. He felt like it, the only true child of Agamemnon. That only begged of him to be pushed around and driven in the ground, he could not help it, ever since he was surrounded by them. It was dreadful, seeing them watch. Going along each corner of the eye, barely formed and in the air, benign, never beating, never showing signs that they were still living, yet they were there. Unaware of anything that might bring harm, upon their coronation of the vile ground upon the likes of which he walked. It was thoroughly furthered in, with every building, by the time he was out, being pushed in. Dreadfully swollen and sunken to no charm, he would eat his gut if he had to, for he felt nothing that might bring them back.

Not that way, since the way they were treated was of an utmost malignant manner. Stolen heads would not emerge, there was no saying whether or not they were still dead. But it was clear, as he neared that they were not even set in flight. Merely static as if the ground was well beyond his head but it was covered in light, blindingly setting him below it. Dragging along but never knowing, just what he wanted him to say.

If there was something to be said about him or the ones whom had once surrounded him, it was the fact that they were all too different, in some way. Out of it, despite their in-shared looks and practicability of look-a-likeness, upon being closely looked upon for a long enough period of time, one would start seeing something close to nigh-distinguishable features not meant to be seen by the untrained eye. It was, in some way, clear where those features stroke. For each rounded part of the face, of whichever side lead to the phrenology it bore, there was that humane counterpart that was not scraped off entirely. And to that, they added, those others, features that would be lost, at the cost of them acting as they might, not like human, unlike animals, but bending towards a similar sophistry that made them who they were.

Cherms was one of the ones in the distance, standing at one of the edges near a lost platform that has been disjointed from the rest of the town. It was unclear whether or not he was there for a reason or he got abandoned. Caught about his head, meaninglessly strapped, or close to it, in the same place.

Mongol had arrived there. Although he was a split with a dead-head, which was torn upon and sutured as he could not have gone through with this new toy he would push through and throw it everywhere around. It was too plain that he could not search and see the ground for nothing else and none other.

He had to be flogged at the back of his head with a single thin stripped handle with many nails, repeatedly done.

Mongol, of whom body wasted, in one and upturned way, he buried his heart somewhere else as he found himself eating along some upturned heedless pouch that kept him breathing. Seeing how he worked out there.

And all of the sudden, one of his fellow creatures made of scum, he came along and greeted him. Although his head was flat as if pushed down by a tire-iron, he smirked with bifurcated teeth.

Mongol slept on the floor, it was cold but he was a bold creature. After all, he left his house.

And the dreams he wore were real because they were interconnected with long, antennae-like veins Agamemnon had brought from space and pushed through his skull in the same way syringes would be pushed through, feeding him with direct watching's, that by the time they would reach his mind, they would long be gone and recorded.

There was the sight of a stalkerish thing. He was pushed through to weep. More often than not, it was obviously brought to each of their attention that the square region on which they stood was still connected to their lower side of bodies which they themselves were rather, somewhat inorganic, or looked like dust-particles that were drawn inside a vacuum cleaner that formed the illusion that they were actually moving bodies of skin that still remained attached despite there being a senseless thing.

But the dream stopped and Mongol was there and he had a good look at a goo-like formed head that was part of the chest that was attached to the floor, from which the top of was nothing but a giant-fattened violin-like string that pushed ahead and revealed father heads. Torture chambers, these were torture chambers.

From the string there came holes and the holes started pushing almost nigh-evaporating children's eye-hole forms that were small enough to reveal that they had signs of rupture and inside of them there had been micro-connections that had build elated leg-eaters.

And as the door opened a majestic looking creature whose body almost looked like fat bottled-butterfly opened its many trunks as they began eating from their backs and strapped many head-anchors dragging it down.

For lore and song ripped its head off. It heard the music of the underground bands as it pushed out and breathed through lard.

Mongol turned around and saw a wall that was out of place. Which started pushing out legs and arms from each of the four sides that were surrounding it, which appeared to be kept at a distance of a few centimeters by a few worm-like foundational fat lumps that pumped meat inside of them and made the limbs even fatter, as it happened for the wall to stand still for too long, it suddenly started rotating and swiftly pushing around until it could not even hope to remain into one piece. Since it was uglily-textured, and it looked like rust if rust was organic put on a crisscrossed pattern of large squares that were blue, red, yellow and blue, but mixed together and where they mixed tiny bloated boils appeared to make bot-fly like heads that pushed forth, grew, flaccidly curving down at the middle as meat would once put through a grinder.

And they would constantly be pushed up and lop down, then back up and then down.

Hold him still and hold him still, he told him in his mind as they pierced the ground and wakened the sleeping danger. Death approached and Mongol could not behold the walls spinning for long.

‘There’s a problem with the morsel.’

Somewhere past the Isles, it was far enough and brimming with some scum, in plains. Though they would be unable to remain and train their thought, of plain to see and brims, there hardened. The morsel came after, during nights, when dreams had shrouded of the slim delights that shared. Many of which had remained, and the morsel was but one of the one that lain in air, to be fattened as the pikes pushed through it, and set aside. There it stood, unable to breathe, for the organs that were missing were digested on a whim.

‘Who brings him forth and why had it taken but a light of itself during a day where we may lay in caverns?’

Each saying was to be distrusted, they were, much to their likings, so and so, less disgusted by what happened there. For every plain and ever-said, they ate the chow and left it begging. Ever dissipating in a scum, in a point of smoldering where their birth-sacks were planted, as it became part of their growing shroud.

‘It shall keep them around and fill them with warmth, what is the matter then if we won’t lose, for what is worth, that of ours.’

‘Search for none, I see no point to be gone yet. It wants us to beg for our kin.’

As simple as it seemed they could simply not abandon them when needed, poor in mind and after getting, harder to be touched upon, in yearn for desperation.

In the morsel lay a name. Of no ailment lay in vein, insidious as it were, through it one would concur that someone had carved the name of Gormon. But there was no one yet around who claim it, nor could they see nor be, even in the desperate utmost benign known of what is spoke, defiler. He was not made out of a piece, nor should one mind him.

For the little morsel was indeed brought, from another dimension, made to look part. Despite this shift in form, it was no morsel, but a butcher’s insides worsened by the likes. Once made to look through its insides, one would see that peculiarity which drove its head to look down in roves and feel the blood coursing through the veins of one who felt them, upon relapse. Though maddeningly they could not be brought into question, those who ate in desperation fading, all alone, servants came, descending from their breederries, to see this strange morsel look-a-like descend towards a much bitter height, and grow in eight directions. First for as in a cross, the others complimenting the edges as they pushed out, wreathing as they twisted as in horns; but plenty of liquids pushed out of them and fell upon dead ears, forth. Many Secludes came on, and they twisted their heads and waited to be done. Inside of their ear-drums, a radical growth had pushed through, flowering through the sinew of an accosted bottle-neck of bitter due, called in time the blocks of meat they formed just floated and entered the odorous hills in the distance, only to show, how hollow they were inside and all the fakeness of their stone and dirt was to be gone as soon as they entered in contact.

But the Morsel grew and attached itself, to their highest towering formations upon which for many years they would stand upon and see it change. It was the mere formation that could only be kept and spoken to. Through and through, only to get it when needed and forced to be done, gone after years of hardly wrought survival, fading, their bodies were left only with the least amount of power just as they were left with shrouds of cowering wounds. They formed huts of their own, malignant stones and shells, surrounded by the dark coast one could not tell when to step on it and whether or not it was the sea or just some dark floor for them to be in.

Often times they walked on it, and that seemed but like a sea-carpet, while on occasion one would fall and almost drown with no direction, no reaction.

No reaction, no reaction.

No reaction, it made no reaction. It made no reaction.

Why did it make no reaction?

No reaction, it made no reaction?

It stood in the puddle and made no reaction.

A piece of flapping meat, as it was once in the distance before a group of the utmost Secludes came forth and started looking at it. The wingspan was of a depth of eighteen centimeters and it looked like it had been flapping out there for hours before the group stumbled onto it.

And all of the sudden, it stood and waited.

No reaction, it made no reaction. It was reactionless, frictionless even, it couldn't be moved. One of the Secluded only pushed a tail in and wanted to make it so they were extremely deformed.

As opposed to the other lesser Mongols, these Secluded were almost caught nigh-into the split. They had almost grown second heads and longer bodies but the sudden change stopped once Agamemnon turned him around and managed to revert this change.

It didn't matter as much any longer, since they were mere tools that were being used to drone about and butt into things, like this meat.

Still no reaction, it was supposed to move. Why didn't it move when they came near it? Was it shy?

Could it be that the piece of meat was shy? Could a piece of meat even feel shyness?

'How about we recede into a hole and pretend we're not looking at it? We could bait it.'

As they should, they walked back and started feeding into their bizarre notions of how one should act and in whichever such fashion.

At the very least the streets were clean.

It was a rude, seeing how the hotel didn't disappear on command. As a matter of fact, it should've done so when someone came out of their way and pushed on. Writing backwardly on poured through glasses.

A sole man had come, the torso of an arachnid only having flown out of one of the highest peaked windows that lay there.

Judging from the side, from where they stood, with everything picked aside, it only seemed like, strange. But the hotel looked closer to ancient gothic castle whose bodily architectural prowess and form had been, if anything morphed into that creature of little worth and little regard and the madness which kept it alive being nothing but starved now. It begged for mercy but there were none around to please its filth attempt.

Gourney took a few steps back. Gwen accompanied him with little in mind.

They were indefinitely stopped, perpetually trying to find a reason to emulate a stay. But their feet wanted to return, their minds conveying nothing but where they might lay.

‘What an awful thing, isn't it? ‘

‘That kid over there? He's awfully lonely isn't he?’

The engineer would not partake in their discussion.

Gourney was the first to approach him, but only in a non-distilled manner. He was raw, angsty-looking, salty in some way. He smiled, turning around and waving back at Gwen. Before she could react, he turned around, faced the side-walked, then punched the kid in his gut, making sure that this time around he turned even more slowly than before. His grin hadn't changed, but there was that slight hint of anger in his throat as he said it.

‘It's all going well here, don't worry about us. We'll be fine.’

His accent slightly changed, as did his manner of speech. It felt as if he spoke in the same manner a man would after considering leaving a message on a telephone, barring his mind with every sentence as he knew someone was behind the line, listening at every step of the way. It was pleasant, as petty as it seemed, satisfyingly so.

His eyes turned a shade grayed just then.

But she didn't mind it for the same reason she felt neutral. Her mind felt as if it turned off while he did it. After all, it wasn't her child and since Eruphaer hadn't said anything, she simply did not know how to react to it on her own.

‘Right, I think we should join him.’

‘I don't feel like it. He's touched that child already.’

Let him do whatever he has to do until he's done.’

‘You can’t be serious about it?’

‘Are we going to wait for him to beat him up?’

‘What do you mean by us?’

She didn’t go through with it, but Gourney did. He leaned forward, pushed the kid on his back then started stomping him in front of them. Still no reaction or no attempt to stop him yet.

‘Where is my servant?’

‘Why is there a head on your table, master?’

‘It’s not as if I’m responsible for it. But I suppose I couldn’t have foreseen it, could I?’

‘Tell me master, word for word, how has a single head managed to lopsidedly scramble its sides all across the table?’

‘Polloc, do you see that hole in the ceiling?’

‘That missing large part that feels as if a giant finger pushed through it?’

‘I suppose I do, sir, but I don’t understand how the rest of it could be explained.’

‘Simple, I’m going to have you flogged unless you shut your mouth.’

He immediately simpered down and stopped acting like a simian in heat. He was definitely not going to make it, especially since they were eating his nails, gnawing at them from time to time until the tiny specks of flea-like syndicate of evil insects stopped instead.

It was loathsome, but well earned. It was pointlessly mourned.

‘I think we ought to renegotiate your servitude and while you’re around, would you mind not staring at what I’ve placed on the table?’

‘May I not begin cleaning it then? Am I not one to look into.’

But there were so many of them who had taken wild forms, flying about in the distance, the sky was worn of the blue and their shades could be seen flying through. Of dark-decayed, their bodies were different only because they rode into skeleton-formed, cartilage worn conjoined helicopter-shaped organic flying devices that were not kept hovering by the engines but by the strange tails that were flapping and tapping the air.

And the air-molecules that were tapped seemed to harden in a wild area which almost turned air into a hardened surface on which they simply walked. In some way they weren’t flying, but dragging and crawling on hardened areas.

But to be more precise, the women behind dunes and beneath the morasses, whose gaiety had also dragged them below the ground seems to have been something not to be kindly spoken of. Since they were so insane, irrational, they thought.

'If they shall claim us, then we shall take all of down with them

We shall drag them to the pits of the abyss where they shall succumb to the depths of chaos, where the smell of piss shall drench their clothes.

And I shall make of them flat irons.'

Guts had to be put gut with gut on top together. Hanged across and lynched in ice, termite-heads who could not do it, eating from each other's hand in nights. Where the many angelic voices sang, a crime emitted, heads to grind. It was ordered, just like the creation of incompatibility, bleached in necks, throats were simply put in beds. Mourning for the child of light, who was brought upon the streets that was a diseased gut king. Whose countenance unstable, he wanted to punish the young. For having suffered so much now, that he could not, for the likes of him understand what went around.

So many strangled vehicles, all of which would be more than impossible to set into motion, the functions of their legs being disease. Stress was unfathomable, nothing was at peace. And thence the lesser one, of cogs that didn't work emerged, their backs were swollen, and they walked in paces that forced them to stare at him, with worse eyes.

But what of the engineer whose coming here was only so. It wasn't long before he started thinkign of a cruelty he's been guilty of.

'What's there left to do?'

'It's too late to turn now, you know that. At the end of the day, no one can change who they are. It's as simple as it.

It's what you are, it is who you are. It's too already, you need to commit.'

'There will be repercussions, won't there?'

'As there always are, but you know better.

One who cannot create beauty has nothing left but the ugly. No amount of jealousy can change that. It is the consequence of its absence, henceforth one must live how to live with it.'

'Very well then, it's settled. So be it, I feel like there's no better need and I shall proceed then as I was once asked.'

'Take this claim with you, pick upon this blade of yours, the scalpel of your choice, the blade that shall speak of no age worse than that towards which your kind shall go towards and I shall ask you naught.'

Thence he proceeded and searched inside. For little to no scalpel would cut the blindness of an eye, and blindingly would he follow benign, thence four of them came forth. They followed him and ask of bold.

'Question, it's only what I need, answer me and I shall proceed. It's the filth in mind that keeps you going, is it not?'

'I shall partake, and make place in the ritual from which they shall emerge, if that's what's needed be.'

‘You shall do nothing of the kind until you will have proven yourself as one of us.’

Thence they said as little as was needed, pleased by the fact that he would take no leap in any direction. Not to be too shabby or to shy, but the deranged in him spoke with itself. And it could only do so, while spread through way, of sorrowful days. That passed soon after, and asked of wonder. Who might keep him in check? Murder he felt, committed with both hands. Empty and bloodied, and leper’s wrung cords, they’d told of him. And olden days that would push forth and past him, cowardly going, for he had picked a younger target, but a woman whose blinds were set, and they had warned against her for her prior meeting with them from which she descended gave her as much, she knew as well.

‘What shall I be called then?’

‘Lady of Sacrifice and your demise shall never be called in question as you shall be marked never to have been touched without any and with prior feel. And I shall seek no appeal and make it so even the lousiest of men know.’

That much he had touched upon, would rather throw among the way and break, of shards and cracks inside the pale dominating color that had covered all. Of hue whom they would be about, no fear past emergence, and little of them would be said. There in the distance, long-past since then they saw her. But cruel woe had settled it so, he was with her hands wrapped around a man, whose fealty held his cruelty in check. Of whose wrong doings would only bring them down ahead. And threaded as they might on hindered legs they settled on as much and felt themselves falling back.

She had to have been spared, alas. They asked of him and gave a chance.

‘Leave her be, no matter what you might see eye to eye it won’t matter if she doesn’t survive.’

‘What of it then? I thought I ought to look for ways to prove myself worthy and see to it as I might.’

‘There’s no hope for you, is there? That you might even come to show and sneer for our deeds may earn no respect among your peers if you claim her life.’

‘But why her in particular?’

‘See it now, look of plains and you shall understand the reason why they might look and least of all emerge past what they hid.

And you shall see what our ancestors did to her in order for her to be kempt and felt as lesser and as broadly and as prodded through.’

It was plain that he could not have changed, for the deranged loon knew no better than to join the swoon. His arms still wrapped but holding tighter.

To be plainer, yet again he asked for lesser words and would not be met.

He was cruel, of man or words, he strung her despite their misgivings and was banished forth.

‘Never return to this place again.’

It dawned on him as he returned to Gwen and as for what he's come up with, his failure to breathe was showing, as of lately he began thinking again.

Harvest

Harvest came and they remained. As planted men beneath the reigns, pillaged and worked upon, hit in their heads only to bleed in the ground and feed their god.

His stalks of skin grew from inside the ground.

Through his wild body emerging, compound eyes merging sights, the lights growing the inward-men in doubt. For wretched servants, in servitude and knowing, for whichever reason they were in the air, servants floating in bacterium-prisons that emerged, from the pool of infections, the pile of unworthy, the fat of spores in which they tainted even the likes of petty-dead worms.

Harvest souls but better lames, of bodies bidden and eaten away. From those brought forth from the roots grew on. Each, aloud, spread and body ended, out of desperation and dreaded, pushed out through filth.

His body seems to have departed, startled by its own guise. It blew from underneath earth.

A weary of harvest approached, and walked in the distance.

'I'm wasted, tired and I'm not able to grow.'

'You are not civilized, look at what you've done to my home.

My city is ruined.

That building of yours is an affront of decadence and nothing more.'

And it was so, tied and pushed in, many dead animals hanged and strapped on top of every plate. He's turned this city into a symbol that drove everyone away.

It looked out of place. As every side had started drawing the insects and the botflies which entered it and leaped behind, lepers gathering and entering with each drab, as they could only draw deeper inside. And they had no point in looking.

They begged, all of them. Fealty in the dark room, edges around as if it was a metal-cage they all stood in. A prison which was but as rounded as an observatory, or a tower with a telescope, lacking one, of course in their case, chained again as they were pitied and filthy in the head. Damaged and turned the wrong way, their brains rotting and scum plotting against one another yet they shared the same compassion asking. Begging in disguise, repulsed by what they were seeing around them, with no chance, but the one in blinds. And bindings were keeping them knelt.

They begged to be spared.

He appeared once again, bag bloated body of swan, a gourd-like fat dragging it down. Its cords, nigh-uncanny strapping from the wingless bag, in which all its organs swam; dragged over a neck as lengthy, through it the cord pushed in plenty of its organs back. They pushed it lopsidedly and threw its head, a large crack, without a beak, it looked as if its head was cut and carved in.

A second cut which pushed much deeper, the rounded lips of a seethe. Gaps of eyes which drearily pushed on, as it spat out its ever-growing black organs into the many rows of dark heels, that crushed its body on a whim.

Across its chest, a giant compounded eye, surrounded by large, deep-coated trenches which pushed ever so deeper down.

A ringed-depression across its chest, a body that grew with the shameless digested crests. Filthy marks obscured by the various scars, its body was one of almost tar, dripping into what appeared to be naught. Dragged below and pushed through until it cracked, from the ridges dripping, weeping for each black tear, it suffered even the slight hindrance, to appear.

Named Amplorah, clay flower of the dark swan, of which disgraced bubbled with its boils across a vile skin that spread behind it. Many curtain formations fell, and it could not for the likes of it swell when needed, blood was boiling.

Not long after the torture, it finally appeared.

To the Harvest God, it said naught. Blindingly following, it almost bloated itself into a spot and waited. Perilously many of the dull-idols carved against it many icons that were pulled and scented. Of the dark and in the making, the weary of harvest waited for a sing, of this deranged that drew back.

Harvest took months, they pushed around and only crowned. Of lays where hanged, and better yet, they leaped around. While laying still they rose and pitifully, but it will work.

One Weary approached. He was forlorn and lost for words. He thought he would be allowed to grow. But around his ankles heads grew about and munched.

It was a punishment for drawing in too soon. Being disturbed for a darkly manner and the swoon of boils, spoiled meat would make it so we hear of it. And darkly batted and battered after. Mistakenly comprised of strewn upon and many coils surrounded his petty mouth. A hooked shroud missing, left as scars, all around his mouth, missing pieces stood ajar, long strewn. Pushed through like the veins that hanged around a lynched Cajun's.

And the Weary was called Lyak, and he swerved, waiting for itself to mourn. A lack of bodies hard of hearing, leper's pained. Painted in some way and shown in another. He wished to get distraught and look for another that might join him, belittled as he was. He was far too strewn into it and would rummage through unless forced to yield, and better still. Now approached and put into the position of a roach he bowed.

And the beast bitter, looked sharp as small chiseled eye would pour, and turn about as the dark-clay covered into the black foundation. Standing on a platform of its making as it waited for the starvation to come after it.

Another one closely alarmed, he was sickened and siphoned by weakly clefts, and little mourning. He asked for less. It was not in his nature any longer, to impress the one he bowed to. But so many of the Weary came back and would return and switch around and better yearn and watch and try expelling much the starch from their insides. From a side, delivered, to another, breathing through and they would spend unfathomable hours just so, switching through.

Its tar-like skin boiled what it could, for of the weary, as much as they should keep their distance, none of them knew any less. No better than they should, some brought a man forth.

He was named Glad, for each kindness was a blessing. And his earthly mass, upon which he was cast upon had been a blessing in disguise, it should not be known, nor thrown apart for his sake, his ancestors. Those of evil, they descended only when they called. Upon his history they shouted and remained as well as run down into the ground. Yet the ground was hardened, boiled, it tore the skin and ripped it out. His head and neck, strung. He was a man of unknown past, but vile as no lord of past should ever be accounted as. Evil, no disciple, knowing, by the time he was found, his servants had been eaten, shroud of sacrifice, the knowing. He asked of each, a child in turn. Pain was only a sign of remorse but it was not him, nor his, instead he whimpered as he was lamed. Cast upon a stone, and grave. Of his own choice he wanted so, to be killed and ended before he could draw the attention of something worse.

Although he would be even more scarred, around each side of his body, knowingly, so-far, that he could be taken apart, he refused to meet or integrate in their wild societies of plants of living, in their den. Although they were outside, he could see that many of the servants, the Weary had been used to build, although their primitive creations were dull, they stood in there and shook and swelled. Remained and would only still themselves in each other's graves. Desperate for any touch, dissipating as they could not be called to pay and pray upon those they had spoiled and took the reign over. Many slaves were too humane, weakly compassioned. It would not bode well not stay with them. Not for long. Watched and dreadfully in touched with the headless that came and took the world apart.

He looked upon their meeting, though he could see some pseudo-ends around the trims of each neck, deeper inside there remained an inversion of the entire body, bearing an unknowingly shaped head, which refused to swim through the meat-sponged of blood it was surrounded by. As evil would see it to and carve him out. From the flatness of the head, deeper inside, an insidious mark would seem, on a whim to bear the feet that were turned about. A lack of woe, yet he suffered as much, it would not go Lesser satisfactions knowing and even worse than that. They could not be controlled no longer and would not even pay to watch, heeding to the gourd and harvest, not knowing what they wanted.

One of side of the argument, this world should be made of black clay. It should be coated, entirely and would have to remain like that only for the eternity in which they lived through as well as they would not question the final decision, not look for wonder, or ask for stronger vows to be. It was uncanny, how they tried one another, yet in fights. Not against each other but pin servant against servant as the bulbs that pulled out would rather be as dark as Amlphora, or as wicked as the Harvest god, whose unknown legacy only rested, in term. Wasted on no one that might ever know or touch of filth; squeamish for some satisfaction, delirious as the attraction of bolder thin, and arms within, they reached and skinned. Each peel, each coat, they bled, their worth.

Fights could only drag so long and for every time one bled black blood, or spat the same color, or pupils that were same as every other of their touch, they only started falling over. Stalks that were being cut, but no claw, no axe, no sharpness could be seen, only those who cared and listened to a whim could know of their understanding. It was hard and hardened as they were, they decided they ought to talk upon settling on a side, of the harvesting region, on the other side of hillous-graves that rose atop and blocked the path behind, and struck the heights of sky as peaks.

Though they could not be seen for they had been kept on this side of region, surrounded by a mighty pair of interconnected circles that, they themselves were encircled by the peaks, the regions were filled with the planted heaps of weariness. And they would rather not move and waste, than be forced to get out of the way.

‘Listen and be pleased to know, I have settled many wonders but refuse to go.’

But this was not Amphlora but one of the servants through which the message was being conveyed. And it could only be taken as the weariness that pushed out and in, and through, rather unpleasantly cut-through. Little more than the taking, they would flee and set it might. Rather cruel in the likings, they could only settle this under the light. Glows in dark, the sun had died. They had killed it, somewhere along the way.

Though an act perpetuated by a creature as the likes of Mongol, they could not have been as farther away than they had been, for a the safety of their reigns depended and deepened with growth, for even the clay gourd needed something to expand on. Otherwise, to which demise, and treaty of the blindness brought them even closer to each other’s throats.

He whom hears

‘Time almost ran out, hasn’t it?’

‘I suppose it has.’

He looked back for a moment. Without saying a word, he walked.

There was no doubt any longer, as he only took a breather through.

It was bothersome staying, especially since there was no point in seeing in the dark. And the way the tunnel had been carved in left little to be done about it.

The four of them went back, with the single light they carried with them being too flat. Around each corner, there was something off.

Insides wasted, all around the metal edges, a few cargo-cars had once ventured through the halls. Behind them, a few other rails were still left there, primal-looking in some way.

‘Shame that we won’t be able to reach it in time, isn’t it?’

There were dreams once, all standing. Too frigid in some way; all would hum as it approached. That part of the world, distantly further drawing itself until it wasn’t needed any longer seemed to swerve, a broken mantle of what it had been. A patch of land which got tilted, pulled and only got grittier once the looker finally drew his mouth open. He could not speak. Instead he saw with each breathe, only in that steam of colored wind that came out of him. Through is he saw the light, a future that was fleeing in sight. It worsened, with his sight only nettling around each breathe. He was too plain.

Slowly he moved through breathed-upon patched, all of which were too mixed for there to be only dirt and a red wasteful grass cone. Both feet got impaled and walked upon several times, as he had recognized the same patterns he looked upon, past what appeared to be. A single part of his muscle, well-toned yet torn apart it agony; until he could not help it any longer, where he held his breathe. Surrounded by them, he chose to lay ahead.

This dream guided him through the dark.

The Heathen walked.

‘It’s too short a while, isn’t it? I think only fifteen minutes passed, at the very least. He told us to wait at least, at the very least twenty minutes or so.’

It was hard anyway, they were too set on it. Everyone was getting it. The feeling of paranoia was being spread evenly amongst them and that hadn’t been the least of their problems. Since one man went missing. Another one, unnamed, at least from the looks of it, there was something of a gap in every single member of their group. A shared gap.

‘What did he look like?’

‘Tall-headed, I think he was at least tall-headed.’

‘In what way was he tall-headed?’

‘His head had the length of my torso at the very least, pushing out into the ceiling, where it split in half.’

‘Not in the same way Clara thinks it does.’

‘How come you know how Clara’s supposed to think now?’

‘I don’t, I mean I can’t. I suppose it’s not debatable any more than anything here, is it? We’re not in the same place any longer as we were twenty minutes ago.’

‘And we’re not going to be in the same place twenty minutes from now, no shit.’

‘That’s not what I meant to say.’

It’s only that, you know, I can’t see us going anywhere else with her being dead.’

‘I thought it was John who was gone.’

‘He’s still unnamed, isn’t he?’

‘Fine on me, we’ll call him John.’

‘John Long-head.’

‘Fitting.’

Answered Croy, who appeared to appease the place, his eyes going just about everywhere, as there was little to no time for any rebuttal to occur. Then there came the other part of him, they were somewhat surprised.

‘Long-headed, split in the same way arms grow, he looked as if whatever happened to him was somewhat natural.’

‘In what sense?’

‘His head was pushing out of his hair in both directions.’

Twice-faced from every point in the head, small-trunk tumor like growths that bore his appearance. And they seemed to agree onto something, he bore them all too naturally grown. Hardened even, though they were not horns; leaving something all too clear, at least from the way it looked, there was no doubt that this appearance shook them.

‘Lower trunk appeared to be missing. He was held by a cartilage-cage made out of smaller formed trunks.’

‘How can it be missing then?’

‘You know what I mean, it wasn’t missing exactly, instead, I think there was something to it.’

‘Smaller bodies inside of him, smaller bodies curved and torn like the bars of a cage, all wearing arms, pointed, I remember, he had no real arms like we had, no forearms and definitely no fingers either. I think he had smaller concave claws.’

‘He was an animal wasn’t he?’

‘Of course, you remember his eyes, don’t you?’

At least that’s what they all seemed to be looking at, even after all this time. Domes that appeared to leave his orbit sometimes, deeply burnt in, by the iron. They were ingrown at that point but they reflected and projected against each earthly surface that lay there. He was everywhere and none at all. He spoke with them even then, soothingly calm, despite having killed another man.

‘I shall find a way to kill the clouds, I smell it, someone poured gasoline on my beating organs, the brain being my living-machine.’

He spoke no longer but continued to stare. He was aware that by now neither of them knew what went through his head.

John Long-trunk came back from the dark, or at least the unlit area where he resided or had resided this far. He made something out of the sticks his hands managed to wrap themselves around. He also spoke about his own adventurous nature and how he found a beast with no eyes but twice his size. Feeling nothing but a hard shell that surrounded it; the encounter of which did not go well. He had been strangled by it and bled internally. And in his moment where death had almost crossed his path, there, out there, in the dark he pointed.

Swollen and forlorn, with all those fingerless arms, he pointed not to long after.

‘I saw a pair of green faces push through and a running body that accompanied them, with multiple necks following through.

And their odor had almost taken my life.’

Then a break, as the main trunk that was connected with the neck and the cage of smaller bodies froze, immediately leaving the impression that he had been akin a solid figure. From there on now, whence he stopped and shrouded no commotion, he immediately pushed himself on shallow feet. Bluntly stricken, no defeat.

He recalled that the one poisonous creature that had spared him got so close to killing him that he had almost held it as powerful in his hear. Swollen organ that it was, he wasted no time before he decided to rip it open.

From one of the smaller bodies, a tiny pumping, beating organ emerged. His chest heaved after being open, he was afraid, unable to tell. Worthless in look, shaken by the feel and by the distress that had been him, he prayed.

The two other heads that were split remained, staring in the same possible, yet hopeless condition as they had been before. Prior to meeting men they had been contemplating their filthy condition and could not remember, for the likes of them how they got there to begin with. So many worthless thoughts.

‘You, Croy, are you not?

And you, Clara, Robert, Den.’

He remembered as much but could not tell much about them.’

‘How are you able to see us?’

‘You’re already been made.’

‘You’ve already been made, don’t you mean that?’

‘Nay, I think they are, but they’ve been made already.’

‘But that’s senseless.’

‘Is it though?

Look into your brain, dear copy. You'll find a close to empty room in there. All four of them are sitting on chairs but they're incomplete.'

'Then they're yet to be made.'

'False, they've been completed already, but once the limit has been reached, there are diminishing returns that need to be made. Otherwise, who knows what might happen after.'

'What does that even mean?'

'It means that if you don't shut your mouth, I'm going to force the body to split you open, then I'm going to murder those little people inside your head.'

That way we should find out whether or not they're actually there.'

'But that could not be, you couldn't be referring to a physical room, could you?'

'Of course I could, of course I can. Not only that but if I will it so, I could break you open, smash you open, then make it so you'll never get to fix it after.'

They were standing there, shocked, certainly if such a being had graciously entertained them with its presence, they would've most likely remembered it, wouldn't they?

Though that was something they could not, for the likes of them understand. Too many things didn't make any sense.

First they were false, or at least one of them was. Second point, they were somewhat flawed, since their brains had been split open and could not talk. Thoroughly approached, they wasted no second and pushed on.

The Long-trunk Evil, and the Long-trunk Fake, that's what they all appeared to refer to them as. Yet no question had been answered about these ancient halls and what would remain after them, once they stopped walking around the place.

'Let's be done with it before we carry on. Only to be certain now, could we at least settle onto something?'

'Very well, we should do it. What do you want from me?'

What can I expect out of you? Are you mad, silly, broken in the head?'

'You've got me Fake-trunk, you have me figured all out. But what of it then, if I may ask so pleasantly of you, if you don't mind me questioning what's going on through your mind.'

Where is the man?'

'Which one?'

'Let us start with Den, where is Den and what happened to him?'

The Fake-trunk carried on. He had nothing to lose and had only the slightest consideration over doing in, proceeding over, trying his best to carry through. Blasted and defeated, worn-out by the watch.

He saw only a flawed room which could only go for this long-time and every-turn, the access being run over, turned-on and turned-to be. He saw it broken, rampant on being broken through. Some smashed windows being placed on the eighteen by one hundred fifty, the depth of which pushed into a wide-looking chasm, lending the place the strange appearance of a wild drop.

Which curved, pushed, danced around, when the crowd pushed in and started coming through. Stepping through the many doors, from what appeared to be every possible direction possible. Pried upon and blocked, many of them being chained and wrapped, walking like prisoners without heads. But not a single man looked like him and there was no chair.

‘I witnessed your mind and I might wager that I am not impressed by what’s going on in there, Fake-trunk.’

Which was even more confusing than before, since both of them were heads of whichever one’s choice, there would be little to no reason to carry through with this investigation; since they missed it, in a single second, a beat that would swallow the heart, like the terror of a single rotten grass-hopper’s diseased entrails. The hopper being made out of giant humanoid longitudinal-tracking devices machine-men. With the devices in their backs, eaten through, with their hearts out being thrown out by means of pollution-patches which rose out of their meta-like decks.

They would be set in flight until caught by the butcher-creators’ hands. He was responsible for making and putting everything in place, with his many tools and many arms, he put everything together and could only dread himself no more. Mirrors on the wall revealed, what he looked like, the appeal. It fell, he was almost dead then. By means of self-inflicted gun-shots, right from the revolvers he made out of the servants who did not realize what went on. Through his mind, he asked.

His teeth were broken through, he could not listen, he only asked.

‘I need to be spared, I need to forget. Please, make me forget about what’s been happening around me. I’m in a desperate need of separation, from my earthly thoughts. I am in doubt now but I may never understand how I came to be alive.’

He took this chance, he took a rope, after finding out that he could not die from a single wound, a bleeding hole, then he found out as well. His neck was too strong, his will to survive would outlast them all. Thenceforth he refused to step in line, admiring nothing that might even push him around. He had almost done it, but then again, he only looked through his last remaining hope, strung by each additional rope. Many of those being added in rows, strung across his arms, they tore through his bone.

But he at least managed to set himself in awe.

As the Butcher-Creator appeared there, next to John Long-trunk, Den, Clara, Robert and Croy, being just as confused like the rest of them were.

‘I was there, out there, working in the dark.’

Details lay simply as obscure as before.

‘Regardless of it.’

The Fake-trunk hadn’t had the chance to speak.

Most of the separation came from their pushed-out differences. It was hard-felt. More so that anyone else could tell, they followed each other off by trying to mutter something underneath their breaths. Then and only then could there be any satisfaction whatsoever, since neither of them wanted to speak, or to be even more alarmed.

‘One of us has to go through the dark and see where this leads.

The tunnel is even more caved-in than we initially expected.’

‘But that Butcher’s come from there.’

And he looked like one, or at least, unknowingly to them, all that fat was no fat by any means, only a cover for two child-like beings which had removed his insides and were hiding inside. Almost faceless, yet fat-like lumps surrounded them, plainly put over, like marsupial embryos that were attached, largely connected and pushed around. They were the ones that infested and ate from the mind of the Butcher-Creator who attempted to spread their distress.

He was suffering as much as they were, with the slightest share of luck being this, he missed. He could’ve had them.

There was no reason to point it out, but they were dull, way too dull to realize it. Hard-placed, all around them, the thickness of the foam that stood between the metallic surfaces that surrounded the contact of their finger-tips was something close to zero point fifteen millimeters, making the gloves be somewhat inaccessible from the insides of their skin-points. Despite them blending together in the same way blood and chocolate frosting would, and the eyes being planted in such a way that it looked as if, on either of them, they stood mildly deformed, being somewhat too close, too near or too far, they relented.

It was a pointless wonder, they could not see eye to eye because of mere anatomical deficiencies which went as far as to affect their brains. Dreadful, in some rather conspicuous way, their guts were plenty, along the way, replicated on the dark, kept in the air like a hanging ship held by a few ropes made out of normal cartilage, leaving the impression that they were surrounded by bone. A mass that swarmed around their floating throne, upon which a man was subjugated, it was Den. He was there, no longer able to speak as his mouth was being sealed away.

And he suffered what appeared to be, the cartilage being a part, as he, could suffer nothing more, guts being plenty, before. Way before he gave it in, his body was almost pushed through and lost within the surface, thinned as if he was starved. A few holes in his back revealed as much, whatever he had eaten was taken from him, like the starving stray, a dog with no handles, emotionless and poor of heart.

Somewhere in the distant lands.

They were plain of head and swollen around their temples yet they walked shyly away from the beheaded, whose plain neck hanged lousily attached, through two and three matches burning around the forest he poured gasoline around. As if to encircle it, he stood aghast. When he found out that fire was his god.

There was also a large drop, two thousand eight hundred forty two mile below the edge of the plain wood-crest where their bodies started spilling into, a well-like formation which was curved and rolled upon, wreathing against itself as their bodies got stretched among a metallic stair-case. Which in turn gave the same feeling of the deeper stretch that would otherwise lay underneath an opera stage, where the audience clapped at their sacrifice, seeing them get trip over and be ripped apart for nothing else but the promise that they would be given a chance to return. No time would there be, for no mourning would see them through.

‘Thence I shall go forth.

First of man, bearer of his fist and signal within each step in part; I bear his legacy as I come forth and shall steel myself against iron, of no other worth and no might shall they see me for what I am.’

As he had no doubt for the trance he walked upon. Each stretch of the land around the chasm that lay ahead of him would signal him to lay apart each weapon and his suit. He was no brute but could only look out of the way for so long until the others shook. They could feel no sympathy, towards no man that wanted what was theirs.

Their ends meant meat. And meat lay at their feet. It was the planet, their home, everything around them, the mark of slaughter, the butcher’s aftermath, ever-after and within his grasp. He could not fathom coming to his soundless sickening touch, as he lay where he was, in trace. He tried as he may, to pick each hay-worth touch of skin. His eyes within, his knuckles bearing only the burden of his bones, unable to fight no toddler, nor anyone of old.

He was simply defeated, a symptom of stagnation, made out of broken tools. Many of them being afflicted by no swoon and by no touch, filthy and disgraced after a while, as he could see no point in turning around; he chose to pick and struck his fingers within the skin, then and only then had he pulled on those that had fallen. Long before he had encountered his dead brothers, of which age had not sung. And they would never again come at last. To the point where he found their wrongs and the paleness, distressed as they could not be gotten yet.

‘I feel like this meat is young. It should not be this way.’

‘Do you doubt that we told the truth?’

‘I doubt no man.

But your intentions are clear. You feared, yet before I came here, of what I might find on the way. I’ll see to it that you shall be made to suffer, unless I am made to repay all that I broke along.’

He forced himself to sit along, and watch them mark the bitter marks left on their face.

What disgrace had he suffered then? Disproven and pushed out of the way, but a much younger man who came upon the chasm. Who looked below and saw what it was, the spear and the feather-like manner in which it had been spread there. He would not feel no blasphemy unaware, of what was going on. Of meat and type he knew naught. Nor would he show any sign. Of the approach, he was much bolder, as young men are. But let alone what would he do to survive, he shoved the old man out of the way. And refused, alike, in terms to say; what his mind had heeded, put it bluntly. Was that life held no worth for him, blindly, spent.

He realized that the old man had nothing to look after then.

Thence the reason why he acted this way, or why he tried frightening the young, hoping they might go out of their way and return to the village they once left in youth.

‘I know better than to ask, but how long would it take to go back?’

‘Years, unkind, of the blight of which, by the time of your return, you shall be left with a sight obscure. None of the people that might recognize, either your demise or as their own in your current and future guise.’

‘So we return as strangers, then. Strangers of no future, strangers of no past, in the village of their birth where none may recognize who we are, who we were and why?’

Why should we return then? For what reason might they see us face to face and touch us still, when there’s no reason to wait still?

There, below, at the end of the chasm, there is none but a mere chance for an end to suffering and no choice to return to the place where they might mourn us. Should we not take it then? What is the reason to stay?

If we chose to return, if we remain amongst strangers amongst strangers, we shall find nothing but pity and be pained by our memories. And of what worth is waiting to be done?’

‘You shall find solace in your memories and you shall fight for your right to belong.

Is there no better place to be? Do your hearts not need to look no further than where you might be?’

‘A pity you are old, a pity of no worth. If you come back with us, you’ll die along the way. There will be no reason for you after, not to know whether we might make it past or might convey. Little doubt as to the pass, choose as we may and return to whence we long-last, waited to be done with.

As we had once come to say.’

‘Pity, I shall miss our conversations. But I will not be satisfied unless you choose. You, of young men should know better than to lose hope and pay no mind to what might come to worth.

Lead your men upon the walking and seethe no longer after the coming. Of their lands you may not know, but you can plow and claim your own.

Of a woman, you may pick, and fight the last man that stands still.

But what shall become of your son, if he is not born of your seed, a lout. Might he claim your woman, might he know no worth, he might claim her as his own. Though is that truly what you want, of all?

Leap if you may, knowingly that you'll be followed along the way. And they shall spit and leave you cradle. And you may suffer and might see pride in earth and seethe no further.'

As much as he had thought so, it was pointless to contradict him. He knew much better, much less. He was of a pile of worthlessness. Better to be left alone, he was standing, after all, near a cradling rock that might fall and let him be, out of hope.

He was left with as much and pointed.

Towards the way back, jointed, on the walk.

'I shall help you come along.'

'I seek no help and shall refuse to be taken back. I will look no further than my grave and walk upon it if times allows as much.'

With that in mind, as much as his kind allowed so, he declined the offer and let it be so. He refused every kind of help and would not see himself any more.

'I shall wait until you pass the hills, the mountains and the sea. Until no other chasm and no pass surrounding you and better through, will feel no more.

Leave as you may and seek my help no more.'

With which he searched his thoughts. And willed no longer yet to see the pass of time; a time to be alive as every young man followed him and went past the ways of better lays. Where spring had passed and leaves had lasted burning flags. Of piracy and of disease, of no better days of peace; they might not know much, they might not lay and watch their backs.

As they knew that ever-farther there he waited, and he watched.

'Whom of theirs and whom of ours shall we meet along the road, I call, and stall for no longer than needed until I shall stumble no more upon the road.'

And with he walked forth a few more steps until the stone had become, of no stone and of no foot, whereas he might walk upon the grit, unable to see past him and past the images of his seethe. That he might meet someone along the way, as if met not by another friend but by someone just like him, he stopped and saw not himself, but another man. Of no worth and of no quiet, undressed and standing, impressed that the man whose fortitude they shared reached as far as to look upon and not hear a single song in the making. For he had barred his ears and lost the years before youth had reach the overpass and through his only and once and once demise and at every single wide hole in which his children pass. Where he would and would not hear, whereas he could not near a single living man. Where he was followed all around, couth in body and mild disgust, he had seen something his mind would not appease. He had seen himself and he was not pleased. Though he knew where to look, shaken, understood for what he seemed to be, he could and would not believe, that the man was he. And he was there, he had been waiting for too long, the time was never.

‘I have never known that, I would have never expected to see you, nor would I have seen or met my mind as plain. I should’ve known and feared, waited here and lost but a single hold on top my heart, the many. Of peers and my years, those whom came and were left behind. Of others that had followed, I left behind.

Only for meeting you, as this chance arose, I see no rose and no green plains that I may look upon. Nor ever would I have known that you were nowhere near, nor would you have approached me when I needed you so.

You have come too late, as you have left me here, thinking I would stay.’

But he was met by him, though it was not him. For he had left a long time ago, leaving only but the marks on the ground, only so he and him and they, together may trice his kind, where one of them had reached no farther. When, thence, they might walk and follow, growing farther and seeing where they might reach. And so to tell, there might be something. And they might never reach what, searched for, was never told off, never recorded, never touched and never before seen by either of them.

‘Was he not like us?’

‘It was not so, I do not think I’ve ever seen or known him so. I wish I knew, I wish to touch, upon what he seems to have in mind, I watch each step. I see that he is dead, for the road he walked, towards his home, from which we came from. Towards the promise we broke, I see naught, as if you caught it.’

And he was caught by surprise, in a guise he would not find pleasing, by any means. He could not understand what he meant, or what had happened to their home instead. It’s been so long, and youth was gone. In the middle, he was there, but yet to come around. He waited, and never younger-yet he faded. As false of hope, and never asking of no more, he shook his head and walked away, and worked towards the better day. Towards each tower, through the pass, on what seemed to be murky water, the wind would last. Many lay, of each day that they had come onto, they could not understand the venture, nor see through.

With each slight wind and each cold see, he could not understand where he lay be.

‘I asked of you something before, that you may stop me before going forth.

But I see that you have missed, but a prized upon mist, where I lay asking, and never to confront you, basking upon what might still be.

Asking naught, now to be; I ask of you where I have gone, and what you’ve done yet to stop.’

‘I’ve raised no arm and lay no hand, I’ve touched your shoulder, but my hand did not lend, no spirit nor strength, of one as old would not dare yet know what happened, why I asked after, how is it he came back.’

Although no answer, he could no spare. He could not understand, nor could he see himself be past it, way off, as he felt naught. And he felt bitter, compassionless, as he could not. Understand, past little, to no end, how could a man be humbled by a man who neared. Out of fear of his kin, out to sneer upon each single man that came with him, he could not see them. Not eye to eye, nor could he dye his pupils as if to understand why was it that he came upon them? Why stumble when he could not understand?

He missed the point and would lose no spare, yet face him during a time where he would not dare raise a single finger, out to hurt. As he harmed no one and would not dare come forth unless search for.

‘I know there was another man of ancient days. Both of their bands would meet where he lays, but we’ve been guided from the pit.

And I have been made to known that I’ve already sacrificed my youth.’

He would not say no longer, nor spare himself to see where, might, upon knowing of the passing light, that they might stumble upon their small embankment, upon which they might ask, upon defilement. What had happened there?

Their guide only missed his cue, and better hue, in which his eyes, of green water, basking upon a sepia-cloud, the bone from which they ate as bird of prey delivered upon their graves, empty pits of dirt upon which they staved no hunger.

It was a force to be reckoned with, for here oer’ yonder.

Of way back and where they walked towards, glory to man of his house, though he was not. As someone might not even begotten, or dethroned. A son who recognized his father’s saying, never to haste. He wore a cowl on the way and dark in look and of old tales that never shook, he’s come to see of little mind and peace betokened and lesser pride. They were misspoken and doubted still and never even knew of screamed of past and never to have lasted still. In doubt he came, with yet his brother, dark in clothes of pagan’s wrath. And leeway to his sin and the troubadour which followed, called and made the noise of past, to which countenance at last. It spoke of olden days that were, mischievously as they were, remained and still only in thought.

‘You’ve missed your chance, and now, your hand is last and lasted through. I see no bough but missing through. I see no point, desire less, I wish there was something to forget.’

But he spake still and made his lands, and pressed through then and only came at last, to ask of stills and see the vales, of which he spoke, of which remained. And he knew little and he knew much. Of many points, alas, bewitched as he was.

He knew of whom had travelled back and seen through it all, alas, were not. Of sings and token lights, symbols of the glorious north, in the distance where their worth were not betokened, lo’. And known that lights of fire, and glory would not seethe, admire, ice was melted, never forth. They have spoken of themselves as they have missed their own.

And little by little as sight by sight, they were met not by past but the glory of a fight. Although missed, they found the peace and quiet, the least of lyre, broken words. None would make do for what was gotten through them. As they had only wept, the maidens were there, their children and dead, men were put together with all, and those that remained were not descendants but cruel things that mocked them in heart.

‘You’ve gone for long and you have missed. I hope it served your little blasphemy that is peace. This is long and way beyond the cut’ en throng, I see no reason for your men to have come back, thought wrong as I’d be. I see that there’s no reason to be.

Anything but watched, listen to me, I see you for what you are.’

‘Abandoned your old, you’ve made us who’ve wronged. And on the way we came to see, there’s nothing yonder.’

‘Nor before, since you left to be with sickened kin.

And there deserve you lie still.’

And the men were much, much older than before, not frail, but strained because of the long way, unable to meet handle and bash. Least of all desire at last, delirious in way, unable to stray. But most importantly their will wasted with their youth. No desire to start over or return to once and least abandon hope to death. This was to be their fate, since left for what they were not be. Since they were cruel to their ways and kin was be. There were they stood, deathless in some place they belonged in and would. Remain there since ancient time and never before would they leave, or face the kindness, and see of worth.

They stood there and waited their turn.

But an olden man, their leader passed. And least of all, would he cast another glance, he turned and made it from whence he started forth, to journey yet again whence they went. And for what reason only he knew as the others fell.

Bold by time and never known, as wise as he would be of Hel, he vowed to make it past, near pit. And bring the old man from whence defeat. Had reeked of much barbarous plains, of dirt and meat and heat and land. There and only there beseech and not asked for more, to seethe.

Ichilat

All of the colors spoke of evil days. They refrained from ever looking around them for more than a few reasons. Days gone post tainted, as they could not be withheld from the dread the small devices in their knees’ told and would not breathe away. From every point and lost joint which popped, a small implosion left as much as tender touches in the planetoid lion’s den. From the gargantuan hold where they lay. It was past, lay, of heads were wrung. So many flashes going and each hold grabbing ahead, tentatively tying themselves past and around each dead-tree and bee-hill upon which the lion head-shape skin formation which lumped ever closer to their wild surroundings, against which attached, they opened hatches and appeared to develop largely longitudinal-stretched bodies that were eating and drowning lesser beings in pancreatic-cancer round hexagonal-flat flying palaces. In which they resided with their wildly deformed, madly caught and wild forlorn servants.

The men without hope, who were the first one to document the beings when they weren’t even there to begin with; at best they could not dare to see, where colors faded, one would be even more present in the mind. Since they were blind there, trying to explore in the color-blind regions when plainer men had kill the living wells.

It ended up so. The sky was red, as the molecules which made it so had been soaked in the blood of the beings upon which they had been impaled and killed so. And they were nearing the living-wells where they drenched the bodies they carried with them when desperation ended and they desired, change. It wrung in the wrong placed and almost killed them. Since they had to be worn out. Since the hate was growling through their shouts. It was hard, trying to envision a better life than this.

‘Feed the living well.’

A man would not complain, nor would he tell to others, that brooding mothers were everywhere around, trying to get a word in. Shouting if not in plain rebound, as those mothers were gluttons, floating as their heads were trees and of skin the tops, and many leaves, their children grew and fattened as to see. From their ends, spear-like shots pushed them in the front until they felt no satisfaction, no end to it and felt only pain from the fruitless action.

The slave-conveyer ropes were brought, wrapped around and pulled in sight. And as they fell below the rims, of the ground, a whimpering sound of chimes had stopped them.

It was delightful, seeing them pass.

All of them are wearing mollusk-helmets, though only on roughly uneven days.

‘You’re a nasty criminal, aren’t you?’

Damn you Cackle, damn you.

Go back to your room now and don’t you come back until I’m calling you.’

But he limped back because he didn’t have legs and the ones he had were deformed and came out of the back of his head, aligned vertically and popping off his throat. And he could only walk on top the ceiling while his many tongues dripped on the floor. His carpets were limb-cut dogs that were kept alive by his mother who was underneath them, inside the other level and the other apartment beneath them. And she was missing the lower side of her body, yet accumulated fat. Upon which all dogs were fed and their bowels united. As they had, out of her shoulder there pushed a single machine-like tube that pushed beneath the earth and fed the unnaturally head-strong deformed tiny perilous eaters of girth. Whose long faces had evolved so further-more through body-gore until the arms and hands had been absorbed but they were present inside of them but could be seen from below. In the same way a piece of a sharpened pencil would leave its mark, so would the skin-flap left beneath them, as they would push their solid sweat bolts out of them.

As they themselves were attached by large cubes that were being stacked upon cylinder that were placed horizontally as well as they were elongated in both directions and combined with that of the others, through which, underneath their evolved bodies, in turn, they buried their girth and their unfashionable deranged organs of which function was nothing but a timed-yet delayed starvation. And that starvation was a virus. But once it came out of their bodies and became airborne, it did the opposite thing to those infected, as they would be fed instead by tempted and repurposed molecules of meat. Taken from cut feet that could not be given for granted.

A few more lay beneath them but looking down in the opposite direction while their bodies were inverted and pushed below. Not to be allowed to creep so far as to be strung and lynched or pinched around their cervical heads. They could not help it down there. All was dark, all was evil. The waves of air pushed around their cheeks. Pale as one could rather be, uncannily strung and caught, torn apart. He wanted to be free.

One of them who was clever enough to twist his head managed to avoid.

When the time comes, we shall kill her.

There beneath there, in a chamber as dark as a single bubble of air that flattened the hall and looked like the innards of a catacombs placed underneath a church while being used to store and preserve the bodies of saints. While there was no skull, a young lady was trapped in there. A door was locked but she could not handle looking up. IT wasn't necessarily dark as much as it looked like the ceiling was no ceiling but long dark lichens of wet hair hanging down. And though the figures of some heads could be seen, she only looked upon a neck which was strung and twisted round.

Most importantly she could see it jerking up and down and she couldn't help messing around. But prying through, a cage misused, someone ripped off a finger but used her fingernail to stop the bleeding and prevent the infection. Although the stump looked like a strange flat-tire that grew in every direction and had already eaten the other fingers as well as a part of her arm, that entered her throat and threw her head back. While her legs were backwardly pushed into one another as they had holes from which she now spoke because her mouth fell out of the socket.

And the mouth-socket she wore appeared to be in the wrong spot as her eyes split and appeared to be munching jaws that allowed her to see and look around only when she bit down. Which was even worse because her body was also pushed on a few centimeters in the front, then retracted, then pushed on a few meters until her body had finally become somewhat fully-extended.

Around the arch of the hand-shoulder, chest tire which prevented her fingers from being opposable and the peculiar way in which her legs now twisted allowed her to leap around the room. When finally, had she come to the realization that there was a four-point cylinder head-helmet which flew from the back side of the inner wall, guiding itself on top of her head, her face as well as her skull had almost been completely crushed if not squeezed out. And the backside of the metallic surface looked as if it had the crystalline holding mercury injector that was indistinguishable from a thermometer that finally entered her spine.

Her spine having inflated for no other reason, as it was inflicted by the helmet, other than to prevent her further leaping around; which also forced the brain injury which had been attained to be perfectly stomped if not pushed in. It was obvious by now that she was suffering because she felt no longer needed. Since the lady had been a servant of the house and now she was lost and no one wanted to touch her.

And for a woman of her age, this caused hysteria. Although long-dismissed as a general practitioner's diagnosis, this appeared to be nothing other than some severe exaggeration of the affliction she must've been forced to endure through.

'Almost done for they will come if they hear noise.'

Said the one above her, but who? Who could that fiend be? Of all the perilous dead, those whom countenance that that belonging to empty dead, he suffered, beauty could not be described.

It was agony, in there, inside their mind.

And there were tiny insect-stones everywhere around the place, changing spots at such a speed that they almost looked like amorphous-remnants from a Mesozoic era. Yet distraught they rearranged the room in a way none other might be brought to recognize it.

Somewhere near the disciples

He simply left the house and was on his way towards the mansion. If there was anything he's ever considered leaving behind, it wasn't that.

Their meeting was long due, and for now, it couldn't be delayed any longer. Argos finally settled for a sight, near the sea-side, way beyond the reach of the hares, where he had look upon the plains they had once waged war in.

Farther away from where he stood, lay two people, sat across a table. They didn't wear anything that would set them out of place, yet the way they spoke was bizarre, ahead.

'I think we should be able to abandon mentally ill people in deserted areas and allow them to fend for themselves.'

'That's a marvelous idea, I think that would solve their every problem.'

'Indeed it would and that way, the mentally ill will finally find the means to survive in order to create their own breed of mentally ill inbred species, which shall give us an insight into humanity.'

'Marvelous idea, but on what species shall we start proceeding these experiments on?'

'The worst denominators of our societies, it is way too clear that they're no longer sustainable and they should be dealt with as soon possible.'

Human experiments are but a means to an end. And there are so many defects out there that it should provide us with no further than where we should look towards. It's plain to see that we could abuse a few of the, unspoken of trouble makers which might infest or touch upon the purity of direct genetic lines.'

'It's settled then.'

And that is only how the first man had been brought in. He was tall, lean and somewhat middle-aged, a bit on the posh but a foreigner with specific vulgar-traits that would settle him as an outsider wherever he might go.

At first there was this thing, the notice, the diagnostic they seemed to have received from him being picked up from one of the nearest Asylums.

Schizophrenia-pugilistica, given, stamped on his forehead by a coat of hot-iron, then strapped back. And to be sure about it, he was to be called upon the realm and pushed around and made sure that he would survive the separation which happened around. He was hewed and stripped naked, it was only something he would spare no less. He was desperate for a confession since he had nothing left but his desperation run through. But to be sure about, he, of all, seems to have done something to himself there, during his stay as their prototypical laboratory.

As it happened for him, in a moment of coherence to write just enough for this to be drawn from it, written no legs, that were imparted upon him. He appeared to share a strange system of beliefs that would go as far as to hybridize themselves with an uncanny heathenesque belief which in turn appeared to serve no divine being from his side.

Instead, the man appeared to serve an array of phantom-limbs and hardened plaster cherubical figures that were rather, stumped in tendons and only grown in the same manner plants would, out of those limbs. Strange thing as it were, the man had dreams them without arms, despite their lower sides missing, which only signaled something to his own woe. He was desperate, to at least make something out of it, and would rather affirm it again and again upon various interviews as well as other feigns of interest that they had been long deceased before he even got the chance to touch upon them.

‘It’s all the dust in the room.’

He coughed again.

‘It shouldn’t interfere with anything now, should it?’

‘I suppose now. Do you think we could perhaps just?’

They wiped off the table. A line of dust was still clearly visible, it dragged on. For at least a few hours, they could hear him struggling in that blasted room. It shook a man off, having to listen to it was.

Plug of cords

‘You need to silence yourself just as you have. Your heart has been afflicted by an unfathomable disease which shall rip your body apart if is not tended with.’

And forth, he could not believe it, he could not face everyone. They were filth, ingratiate primates.

‘Ignore them, we shall not be stricken down by a bunch of simians of every form.

We shall not be destroyed, not yet, not while our essence still survives. It is for that reason that we need to continue before we come to the reasonless death that shall force us to abide and feed into their wills.

Are they not filthy?

Look at them, disgustingly forlorn, displaced, hearts that had been worn out and never stood a chance to evolve past their prime.

It was plain-dead, wrathful, the call of desperation.

‘Women are like dogs, they need to be killed; but sometimes they’re like cats, so you’d only throw rocks at them instead.’

‘What do you mean, master?’

Asked the servant before the table was set.

He was holding a goblet which was very much around and appeared to pop from his back in what seemed to be the making of a large heeled surface that ate part of his head and throat. He could not listen to another second of his incessant screech.

‘Master, have I not given you enough to drink?’

May I pour?’

‘I will never ask of you to stop.’

Though he considered it as well, he missed how well he was treated by them. How and where he threaded and how cold they seemed to be. Although he was high-landed in the society, he was still considered somewhat of a fool, even though he had been vaguely.

‘I’m tired of it, get out of my room, bring my wine no longer.

I want to be left alone in with my studies.’

He dismissed the man. It was lonely, being there, unappeased.

Some rope fell. It was cold inside the room. A portion of the ceiling fell off.

Right atop his table there stood a single man of decay fell. His body splattered but his head-trunk still lay there. It was hard to see just how affected he was or the pain he caused when he could not even breathe properly any longer and the energy only seeped in until he lay stronger. Hardly-damaged, barely broken, unable to seethe through, for the likes of him, he lost.

And mind, a cost. Many or few, a little to them, or better through, smaller, tinier rat-wearing bats followed through the top hole. Elated by it, he appeared to be worn, taken for granted, starved, he asked.

‘What do you want of me? I’ve got nothing to offer you, more than so. I think you ought to leave.

Listen to me, as soon as I grab a hold of my servant, I shall, if anything skin you alive. You shall be a carpet it If I will it by midnight.'

But he woke up walking, through a forest. A knife in his hand, Lord Laurels knew better than to ask, what he was looking for, and why was it that in the slit of every tree, of which shadow appeared to cover everything. Though he could not see detail after dark, only the blue sky, a cat appeared of which countenance dictated nothing but its wildly stricken yellow eyes. A glow strapped upon them, carrying on. He feared that he was given what he asked for.

In the matter of a few seconds, he took a stone off the ground, then chunked it off and hit her head. In doubt, he approached, and saw the maiden, who was dead and worn out from all the running. It was certainly disgraceful that he would think it this way. But he paid no attention to the other feline admirers, as he chose to slit a single strand of hair and smell it. Her locks were just as flat, as they might be called upon, brought to his disgraced nature, he saw how his hand lost its one verdure.

Dreadful device, dreadful device, it's everywhere. Its green light marks its power, it's always there. Every house and every apartment had it, connected to a largely misused cancerous power-strip, it plunged through man and took a hold of him and of his mind.

Green light in the dark, it was always turned on.

In a dark room whence he came, and swollen around its white-marbled neck, there stood the light, as hardened as the delight from which its projection dripped, below the carpets rimmed with green, soaked in it, one man came out with a single grit. Of blasphemy and pulled cords, they knew of little and it wasn't worthy speaking of it.

But that device soon decayed, and it pushed out to breed them as well.

If the device somehow turned its light to red, that meant that a fire was bound to start. Arson was something detestable, which no one could foresee or prevent, in any case, since its inception would come too fast. And the red light also stopped the molecules which bred the different decay in the air, completely stunting their growth, which in some cases gave them the most unnatural looks one could get into. Worsened by the heat, they would erupt at each other's feet. Many of those who somehow made it mid-way through the entire extension of the light had managed in some way to fully push themselves over until they simply formed a line, no longer able to resist what was going on in there, connected by a vine-veins, the meat, and the gore, bloody-snores that they were got conducted outside. Worsened by the filth they came out on the other side exactly how they would seem to be. Appearing and disappearing as their bodies protruded, a spine tormented and shot through, worsened by the unfathomable girth and the fifth of the scepter of bones, of shrunken' fingers that were placed in part, never eaten before but now the time for someone to intervene.

It was difficult, trying to establish contact with it.

Once the haze stopped and the green light allowed for another gulp and sphere-like dripper, from which fully grown bodies came, their brothers who had been livened finally walked upon their pointed ends and came to carry on their own. As far as they were concerned, they were simply resting, as flattened as they could come, in a way, kind of like a woman's chest with nothing to show. It was disgusting and irredeemable, too cruel to exist. It was unfathomable, there was nothing there, starved, and painted in a bad light. Mare to stumble and to crawl as part of him melted despite being carried on and allowed never to have touched the ground, especially when it could do so much damage. Nothing could be more needed or expected.

He was directed, therefore to one of eight paths, from which the device would not reach, although it was important to keep in mind. That it was everywhere. Without the slightest hint of a single direction being taken from them, taking this too mildly, putting everything in one spot was difficult. But it was a house of coffins and they were only staring not at roads and not even staring but walking on lanes that were bifurcated, lead to the same door and were merely exchanged from one side to the other. Clearly something allowed them to crawl back. Because they were not in the mood to kill another one who fell from above.

Not only was it a house of coffins, but the thing was automatic, caught in itself. A man was there, behind the only way ahead.

He opened it, peaked in, then locked it, as he only cared of getting out of the way in time. Too dangerous, they smelled it from a mile away.

Like a pendulum it swung, like a saw and as a blade it broke through and almost destroyed the land they came to walk upon.

It was hard to see in its entirety but from the strike, it was a plane which hung from one side, combined with the living tail of a mammal attached in the back. Though, by some divine reckoning, it bore long water-spider legs that had giant puffy wing fats at each ends. Upon which they bounced on air as they were eating the strange bullet trains it kept on its back. Only by being fed metal could they be allowed to keep on all the fat. But fattening too much was dangerous because, otherwise, it could not stay in air for too long.

Slowly it started going towards a few bullet holes that lead outside the house of coffins. And it seemed so, hadn't it? Through some likes of some unfathomable delights, there were butcher's rounded clearly plane, from the standpoint of their surface, cleavers upon which the longitudinal-watches recorded time, since it was one with gravity, bending reality, the strange Pendulum, whom shall be called, Ogliot, succumbed.

'For he shall not be allowed to go no further until the coffin-trouble is dealt with, as it's too obvious that we cannot deal with everything he's gone through.

No, I think we ought to kill one of the cattle at the bottom which have.'

'They're not cattle, they're not bovine.

Stop annoying me with your insolent remarks. They're dry painted shapes I did.

They're supposed to signify insolence.'

'You painted a herd of cattle with a bunch of giant bulls. How can you even contest it as being anything else than the obvious choice, when I know for a fact that they are what I claim them to be.

I know what cows and bulls are supposed to look like.

Also, you've drawn and painted various other dead animals such as cats, hens.'

'Hens aren't animals, are they?

I thought the hen was the chicken stable you used in order to grab a hold over their eggs.'

'No, I think.

We were. Never mind. Regardless of your so-called artistic expression, your depictions are considerably disturbing.'

Both of them were just two other decayed who were looking at Pendulum the destroyer, Ogliot.

For someone who almost fell to it, they were bearing no chest, only heads and a few arms put together. And they were ugly and deformed and no one appeared to like them. For that reason they spent most of the time inside the frame of the house, and they also had bullet holes everywhere around. Since no human ever entered the house and since the ones that decayed never challenged them, there was no reason for either of them to interact at all.

On this side of the world, everyone minded their own business.

Yet the two of them had to stir them up. Hence the bullets that found themselves shedding even more light inside. And it was displeasing and somewhat annoying, to say the least.

They had been dismissed and crippled as well. Most of their fingers had become stumps, toes used by no one else. Plain to see, as it were, the mood was beige. As if their insides were spread, although the mix of colors and shades and hues would add up to something else much worse than what they had. Hard, it was hard to look around.

'So much free time to create everything we want.'

'We don't have much, other than the red-chalk. Do you think that might hinder what we're doing here?'

They had greater plans than that. Annette was with them and she was the reincarnation of herself, with the exception that her childhood was different, fidgety. Shaking, afraid to look ahead.

Large illumination tubes, that was the illusion that was happening in front of her. The girl was looking at large wide-spread, pushing through blades of lights which revealed the largely deformed, much-decayed, colored head, which appeared to be struck in a perpetual melting motion, which formed new eyes and new faces at times, never the same. It was much harder seeing some of the hands hanging out as if they belonged to dead animals which turned them upside down as they laid on their backs. Twisted as their hands in a way someone covered his mouth in shame after doing something wrong but looked upon from a horizontal point as if the on-looker put his head on a table. Fingers twisted, and tingling, this was much worse than expected.

It was fear of scaring her, despite their uncanny appearance, they feared what they might do to the child if they intermingled with the forced that took them off this chain of command that was established between the two of them.

But usually, in such cases, the child survives. The child had worth, the child was human after all. It could be judged by its physical features and the fairness which survived over other human specimens that she would survive for as long as it is deemed necessary.

There were no tears for evil men and somewhere around the house, a fire was being made. Turned and churned against, as hands had touched sticks, which yearned for a change in shade and color, and none remained still no more. Though they were unknown and little more in doubt, they called, and shouted, much astonished by it, they had been watched for some time now. From higher crowns and stimulants being planted in their mournful glance, present there as they had been, it would be too shallow to make a point and wince, since desperation could only be attained for this long, maintained as somewhere along the way, they brood.

In a cornered tree of metal, where the peaks of steam formed black clouds, they stood and asked for even less that it should be allowed, bellowing as empty men, of whose entrails had opened a way, forming a bridge to their house of tolls. Paid for in guts and touched in gore. More and more of the decayed gathered, some of which had never been fathered. They knew of less and wished for gut, but could not do it and would not. Such a wild display of artistic prowess such of the likes of which they've never seen, shook their likes and never-quiet, they stood and wasted no time to weep.

'Let us come into your house.'

They said, for the master looked above at a single pale scum-wheel which shone upon the steam breather, pointedly crying of metal-traps. In the air they caught small birds they ate, never to reveal how they survived. Water was not to be seen, but a geyser could be found to thrust upon a system of long-metal thawed pipelines, feeding them blood and clots, with plenty of the disgusted rotten cadaverous bats that came in. Whose ceilings were, in empty turned-out the ceiling beds, the place of their arrival, stay. And never-asked for, blood conveyed but mist in shambled. As the decay could barely be seen from the distance, amply put and never shaken by the ones that shoved through cracks, of mold and bats, their clay-like rocks of wax and puddles. They threw spikes and spindles, roses-burst upon the bridge as they managed to call upon him, not to mind their coming and their worth.

'Leave, I shall tend to neither of you. I have no intention on keeping my promise towards bastardly caught-creatures, those of you which shall be gone, I shall feel nothing at all towards you.

Leave and decay, I pray that you may fall upon your way back and never settle upon a watch, or to look at my creation.'

'But we need to how, as well as clutch your ways and methods of crafting.

We have to build bridges of our own and build a town and surround it by walls just like you've been planning on. '

'For how long have you known of my acts?'

‘Too many years passed and I think there’s no emotion that would last as long as it did now. We know and seen through it, we want only to be a part of it.’

‘Nay, leave.’

What was conveyed through could not have been even the lesser of the breaking through, they waned as not to understand what and where, towards which the mind conveyed the pain they felt and dread as it was coming. Somewhere in the distance running, through circles that were cut and blasphemies that were not to be spoken of or claimed about. In wage of dirty wars, there were plains of broken acid, pools that have evaporated and left nothing in return.

Through depths they hid and planted themselves weepingly as to be caught. Brought to the madness of a land which wasn’t theirs, the people of whom, of which of rum, and other boiled substances could not even redeem their contrivances between each other; yet they grew as if plants, but never rooted, out of pools, despite there being none, they had drained the radiation and the elation of chemicals that changed. Plenty of them grew and floated as their eyes had grown and skulls were known to house their bodies. Many which had grown together, only pushed the one big one through.

Though weight was added, they were knotted and only brought themselves to shrew. Many cut and brought to knees and many legs threw on and forwardly until they turned their mournful stares. Plenty of the dreadful yearned, for their sudden elation. Bastardly they refused to touch. No ground could hold them in place nor would they stand themselves for long but growing. With each joint, knowingly forming their bodies, of anatomy in place and deranged cracked bones they pushed around each edge until they imitated man. But humanoid they were not, instead, they were simply their own thing, unable to leave this form, but worn out by all the pain they suffered on their own and while together. A reminder of pain would not make them suffer or wear them out.

There was no chance for them to be gone, as all the land was blasted, as it lasted eight more years, in such a way, that many would plant themselves until the god of harvest observed their way. He had known of all ills and of organic matter whose countenance had turned it to feel itself grown and push out of throngs. Of those who wanted to grow despite their incompetence, he yearned for them to have been met. By him alone in deadly bed.

In the pools, the broken clutches of the various tenderly-depths upon which their kind only pushed through depths that never caught their eyes. They stood and waited on top of one another’s shoulders, now with him in their minds. As he had fed them many ways, and many other necessary remains, they begged to receive a blessing so they might grow and swallow humanity as a whole.

And who else might not deem humanity cowardly for hiding on its floating structures, thought they were not the culprits and the architects they made. All the necessary arrangements for everything to be set in place, claiming what was rightfully made. By claims of ancestry, for they had planned ahead. Long-survival but was caught and in their makings, never brought. It could just be in pain, the makings, they were only getting more desperate as for the sake of their taking. And each claim had taken a generation, pushed, and little more was known, they should.

Sekov's notes

Reminder, peculiar note:

Inducing emotional distress on dog.

'I've come to observe this by accident, while I happened to be in the kitchen, and the dog was on the hallway, a few steps away from where I stood.

Whilst being aware of the dog's presence, I've turned towards one of the highest placed shelves which was placed on top of the front wall and began scratching its edges with my fingernails.

The canine was thoroughly displeased as it appeared to be have followed my movements closely, as it began shaking and making wild noises of lower octaves. It was clear enough that the dog did not enjoy this at all.'

In order to see what caused this reaction, I walked around the house and began scratching the wooden doors as well, to no result.

The reason for its reaction, which yield the same result was the fact that this shelf inside the kitchen, despite being made of a similar material, wood, it appeared like it bore various jars on top of it which were placed in a line, three in the front, two in the back, their placement being somewhat similar to a pool table, filled with sugar, coffee and one of unused rice. The dog must've simply thought that they stored food, hence the signal to its primitive brain told it to react in such a way as to beg for it.

This was thoroughly displeasing as I often find myself annoyed by its enticing notes, and the way in which the dog reacts is shallow at best. It barks often enough, therefore I must hit the dog.

It's plain that the dog is often in the wrong, being incapable of controlling itself, especially since its prime instinct drives it to leap at my legs while performing the most disgusting chants a creature like itself could go through. Repelling creature that it is, I have often dreamed, as being spawned by my further annoyance to the way it reacts, of trampling and beating it to death. As I find this occurrence to be too much for me to take.

Oh, how much I enjoy pushing it around. Feeding her less than a bowl a day and taking her for a walk for what seems to be less than ten minutes a day. Those are things that I find as the rightful penitence such a creature ought to receive, since I found myself, as I have said before, often in distress because of the mutt. This little noise-machine gets beaten often enough, sometimes even in public, other times I often proceed to simply pull her leash in such motions that would seem somewhat familiar to Southerners in their old time ordeals with the Negroes. Regardless of it, they're short-lived and most of the time the damage is barely felt.

It's the least she ought to have received. But on the list, the next interaction with other similar pets seems to be the felines, as I have found myself, often enough chucking rocks at them outside and around my building.

A pleasant thing, seeing how you can easily trick them to follow you around, by simply taking a few pebbles and throwing them just close enough for them to think it's something of value, the feline will simply follow it around. Do it enough times and the cat will draw in closer and closer until she's close enough for a direct deadly shot to be taken. Not that I would know of any of that.

Although this is a rather useful tool in observing their behavior, since, whereas one would find himself with little to come up with at hand in order to survive, with limited provisions and limited materials to use, he might well enough come up with an easy way to consume as little resources as possible while achieving just as much.

A few rocks are thrown around the general area where the cat might come, slowly being followed by even more pebbles being thrown. Then, as she's distracted and turned around, either a bigger rock might be used, or a boulder, that was, as few resources might be used as possible while possibly getting hold of its meat.

Frogs, this one was for pleasure. During rainy-days, I would step on them and rub it in until their gut strung open. Always in the same way, always the same image; which is kind of strange. Would it be that the way in which I stomped them was in a similar fashion as the last time I did so, or are their innards fashioned in some way that I'm always going to find a tiny red tube sticking out? It can't be a coincidence.

Smashed snails, tadpoles, little parasites as well, amongst other good examples I refused to throw back when I went on fishing trips. Suffocating them was pleasant, it's something else than inflicting pain on them.

I tried talking to people about what I like doing, but they thought I was anything but serious about my suspicious activities, which is for the better. In some way, it's far better if they see it as a jest than take it for what it is and at the same time it's far more useful to me.

But, if there was a problem there, it was the people.

They didn't like my ideas, they loathed them. My ideas were righteous, as they were meant to serve as alternative to the wrong-doings of society. It was well-earned in some way, I suppose, their lack of satisfaction that came with how prisoners ought to be treated like was one of the signs I should've been made aware of. I relent. It's irrelevant now.

Although I walk and see eye-to eye with men who follow him around, somewhere in my small village, there was a man named Aleksey; he didn't live here, as he merely passed by, but I seem to remember my attempts to talk to him. Well enough, I was well surprised by the fact that he did not enjoy hearing about my various dreams, about my desire of entrapping people as well as the other stuff. Hmm, I wish I had a better way to put it into practice.

But here, in the distance, there's a house.

It's yellow, or some ochre that was long since washed up. The land is simple and there aren't many details around, as even the trees in the distance appear to be painted on. Though the land is still lush, the grass can only be felt by shoeless feet.

Shoehorning a screwdriver through one of the outlets, or forcing her to do it while being chained to the bed, that was hard enough, it's unclear what I dreamed of doing and what I've done, no one would believe me, so I must be far-gone already. They say they don't believe me and I have no proof for the time being. It's way too hard, trying to go on with a performance in front of them. I'll be honest here, of all places, I'm afraid to talk and act in front of a crowd.

I was merely stumbling and falling over my own two legs while trying to show him what I meant. I don't know whether or not he understood what I said, as that man, Aleksey, whom I have met and spoke to over a long while, on various occasions found himself patting me on the back, several times as well. I don't know the reason for that. I'd like to think of myself as some sort of rational being. Then, why would he pat me on the back after saying such horrible things?

Unless he was a horrible being himself, it could be that the smile and the way in which he presented himself to me was way too similar, too strange as to be compared to how other people treated me like. I didn't know this yet, but his mistreatment of the women around the village was startling for me, even shocking. I didn't understand it at first, not only him but I, who's done so many awful things, the culprit of so many acts of cruelty, found himself shocked.

During such acts of compassion, I found myself drawn to them. It's strange, but it's, they're different than the other animals I've been with. They act differently, especially when they're hurt. But that's not to take from the fact that the recurring dreams I've had always kicked back the motions.

'I shall be honest about this.

I see no reason to treat someone fairly well especially since they've been used.

No, I suppose one would end up seeing that, despite there being differences at first, there's no real difference between the two after being observed over a long period of time.'

Scum-people, I know I'm not thinking this because I'm paranoid, since I am not. But they must've thought me a low-life. Some of them in particular thought of me as the scum of the lot instead. A murderer-to be, a petty, lousy criminal no less, but what they know of me?

He's thought himself, as any man in his place would. As he should finally come onto himself, and soon enough, as a man he understood. What a plain thing it was, how much he's done.

What worsened his apprehension, the direction to which he shot, the man could not understand where he went wrong and worsened by each spade, with each grain of dirt that remained, he buried the woman and walked away. Through night and sober, least of all would he understand, what made him that way, the things of nightmare which stared him in the lane of hay, where horses disappeared, he knew of himself and even nearer, had he grasped a stroll.

He took a life that did not belong to him, and imagined worse. For this fear of animals only came to be in part, the agony he forced upon another as a child. All reminded, caught there, as he started in the distance, largely unaware of what he's done. He was an unfathomable soldier whose meanings were lost in storm, a blow, a cone of winds forlorn, and in the spikes of light, where a single thunder stroke through night, he vowed he saw an animal of a man. But for the likes of him he could not tell what it was or why he ran away.

But whom shall deliver justice to a man as evil as he is, who would not fathom standing still when asked and pushed around and made to pay for mistakes of the past. When he rose and when he stood and what he did and what he killed. Of plain animals that were dead and those that gathered around him, whom were plenty and still. And all of whom had haunted him, a man who did not for the likes of him understand what's wrong. Everywhere around, crowds and rows and animals he killed in snow. Leaving there as he could not, for all that was worth, he could not make anything of them. It was too plain, he did not understand what ticked in his head, why there, in the houses plain floor and underneath the door a fake countour that signaled but a body. He hid all of them, but visited from time to time, a hick of no mind, followed by another one, who was his pair.

She was stranger, whiter in the head, both of them had no other place to stand. And seeing how he face no problem and he could feel nothing towards either of them, he asked for little and passed it ever since.

‘What does either of you want from me?’

Can't you see I'm passing again?’

‘We won't be long, just a day or two.’

‘They're getting me, I say.’

At the command of which, he pulled the lower hurdle of his hands, right above his ankle, then above his knee, revealing in-so much that there was no leg to begin with. But only a cat, a dog, a few smaller tadpoles he had killed before, attached to a leg that might've been sewed off, yet there was no blood around. In a plain-to-be, never to be approached for distance he had ever considered looking into, lopsided for the ceiling spoke of a far vaster story and of more provocative worries. Such as the rituals he must've been accompanied by. And all the reigns that pushed him around, as he could not understand where it all began. Or why he did it, set aside.

Whatever that might be, the gunpowder was used and most of it was missing.

Though he attempted to explain why they were making the signs or how he managed to put them in place so he might replicate by any means even his toes, he failed to do so and instead chose to smell the scents. And mark of science from an age that wasn't there. It could be an explanation, a man that experimented on himself. But this Sekov has always been an odd one.

He claimed dark times and animals that spoke to him and asked him to die.

At time both of them were tormented by the images he spoke off but he could not say or ask again or push himself back to stay. For what he asked had only stretched his lip.

‘They planted the eggs in there.’

‘I think we should leave.’

‘Honey, wait, it's raining outside.’

‘We shall be back in two days worth.’

‘But, I.’

There was no worth expression or anything that might be exchanged, which, of joy and earthly pleasures that may not even be pushed on them. They said little and walked away, for all that worthlessness no man could endure. It was so hard, facing his pounding chest, he shook, once he realized, there was no woman he killed. But who was in the grave and whom might he have spoken to? It remained for him to walk and see and make it all the way back, to the place where it all began. For what was worth of him to ask, now it came to him that while in doubt, he faced no consequence, nor would he ask again and have himself strung over a tree, conveyed upon what seemed. Farther into the night, with only a lantern’s cowering and little blight upon the clouds, an omen bounded that has followed him. Along the way he saw nothing and could only think of his obsession which boosted his compassion. For all the while, mild attendee, he faced a court of hay and had to walk through it once they had caught him and he was almost pushed away.

His abandonment of pets had led him, finally, erect upon the pile of ground. Mildness of which and wreathing peace, and lack of desperation hissed like a snake once he dug. In the middle of the night when no one was around, he opened the grave where he thought she might’ve been in, placed at the cross, near which he found naught. But a trail from the grave had landed him in a place unlike many, from what he felt and never could he have met it again.

Driven by the jealousy of man, he came to realize that neither they were dead. And he had felt nothing and he had killed no killed, and there were no dead animals, and the snow was plainly erected. For he had dreamed and still did so, he had been in an illusion and his notes came to say so. For, once he rushed and once he came, once he pulled the wet floor off, backed by the outline which could only stay there for so long, oh dreary thing that got his back stretched and pulled ahead could only have him wanting. Seething for what’s done, he read aloud.

‘On how I guided myself to think that I’ve done all that, all of those acts are mine, all mine. I’ve killed and taken life, I’ve spilled blood but it was ink.’

But it was more so than plausible.

‘I drained their veins and held the reins. I’ve made it so you realize now, of all the veins that you’re the only one who has been hurt.’

For the animals were in his home. Tall and hasty, agape, he realized that these notes were faked.

‘What have I done?’

‘You’ve killed our kin, this was a trap.’

All along, from looking down, the body of the woman, there it was. And the animals had also grabbed a hold of his foot. They shook until he understood that they had been playing with him for a long period of time and he felt it so, every time he felt the torture that was him. Guttured, a single intestinal wrapper, a tube came out of him, the snapper also threw a rock, he had been bloodied and abused. Cut around the ear but never pushed through drum.

There came his chance, as they were preparing to scratch the ceiling like chalk. Animals, all of them, wondering straying for words they might share. It was less pointed, he cut one of their legs. The giant humanoid cat stumbled and accidentally fell on top the dog. And the Frog-like men, of whose face was eaten by termites had a head that blew alight and started burning, or which spread started encumbering the insides of the house. Just in time for the man to get away, as he opened the door and saw a sky-flat, upon which, every few twenty-or forty meters, there were the animals he killed, a rain of blood from the guts of the frogs. And everything from that point on was overwrought in details and never simple. Too hard to look at, no way to focus the eye, all kitsch and never touched, brought to him, he sampled his tongue as he liked the animals he killed.

‘I can finally enjoy the taste of my pray. How long I have waited to test this, I could not help myself, I want more of it, I want to eat it for as long as my hand shall be strayed and my long-needed bloody bath is settled.

I want some warmth, my head needs to rest on a pillow of dogs.’

Which was slowly being brought, but by a giant bird whose legs were actually made of many other critters but only in wideness and not critters in looks, but general shape, as the plats which formed them extended and formed large pictures of bloody crime scenes, which had documented his entire life, and that which had been known of, as he finally alleviated what seemed to be his entire career as a failed man who neared his ancient days.

Many of the days being too pushed-out of him, being revealed as his neck-skin dragged behind and covered his head as to form a protective side, but that wasn’t to be spoke of as both him, the animals and the bird were surprised by the hole which happened inside their protective concave surface which deformed itself in front of their eyes. It was impossible to fight against now that they had little to no chance to even raise a single finger, because of the agony and the amount of manual-labor filled power that was expressed through the fighting spirited men that were hardened and pushed through the veil. Ate through it and managed to revealed that they fell to their deaths once they killed and smashed the animals that fell with them. But those were only dying still and they had been hardened from within. In the air, during their fall, as they blew, their bodies managed to stall the fall of the animals who managed to float in the air.

Impaled by coagulated blood bullets that had been shot from the insides of the criminals and the dead singers of which sin had only spared them of a much closer dead-aghast agony. A lamentable virus that was merely starved by perdition, carried through, they were limited as agony passed through. Punished for carrying this virus by exposure and by the insolence that was lust, filthy as they had been, they suffered and were cast in the bodies of the frogs, the leeches and the dogs. May they suffer then, as they left, for a legacy, nothing but a blood-web, held by them and listened to.

As anchor-fingers of dirt played upon them, seen through, slowly he came, once the entry had been swollenly-deemed as worthy. Never to be accounted by the shortness of a single snapper, the disaster.

It was no altar upon which he came but a strange construction like the type of an angelic-textured engineered built, designed by someone who had been a genius yet touched on a whim by the grace of a divine being that entered his mind and had him build it.

Though it had been crafted to fit a flight of interlocked stairs that were merged at the edges where they ended only to they could be somewhat tilted or pushed thoroughly beneath them in a deeper line of a step that bled the chimes of wind that lead below the finger's chimes, or kind of like a slide, the build looked like an interlock of many circularly-inflated stationary bicycle-units that were put together and expanded upon only so a few of them would have bridges between them, without the handles and without the pedals, but spinning in an endless display of bones. As it could be seen that it was organic in part, lend upon the edges of the sky by a bunch of legs and arms that were circles and never touched the build but span around the horizontal belt, as it was only worked upon by such a strong gravitational push that they shaped the build around them, as they gave the impression that the thing was being forged by them with the help of the iron particles in the sky and the general heat elements that bonded by their unfathomable touch. For in the middle of the circle, there was hope. And hope was a rotating mouth with many teeth that came from its every side as well as from every hole inside their molars.

There was enough space left for them to grow meat through the molars as they developed small eyes and infants that were in actuality worked upon from the back of their heads, by the umbilical cord which came out of their backs and fed their brains with an unnatural substance known at the sound-foam.

And his kind of strange breed of sound-foam, if that could be called so was lend onto them by the dark being known as Amplorah, whose mark could be seen on them. But they didn't know what to expect as their minds had not realized that they just came into existence.

Slowly the being was lowered down. It walked on top of the bridge as if it didn't matter why it was shouted at. By many of them who would appear, his servants were angry, their minds would constantly disappear, leaving only rage to punch. Everything in sight had to be destroyed and hit and thrown around. Not to be too cruel now, they were not interested in hearing about the weather.

The weather was evil. Blood was contaminated by evil. And evil there had wings that were inbred. They kept mixing together with the dead as they committed vile acts of incest. Since blood and flight were evil by sight, since they would be seen together in the creature that came upon the strange machines, once he had become a servant of the unnecessary destruction which happened in distant stars once the universe had finally pushed through and opened a darker hole a few miles away from where the large stationary bridge was being wrung upon. And writhed and turned in the same way the ancient sisters of fate would do, in Ancient Greeks, by their making, one could not have seen it through.

For evil words could not be spoke backwardly because lies had to be understood in order to seem like they were real, he appeared.

A liar of two heads, a deformed finger, that was his head, with many wings that were the bridges, crafted still and part of the leeches. A body of disease, that fat could not be brought, the back fattened as the pump of a single lumped tube pushed in and out, refusing to make contact. Though many figures were seen, the figure had no distinct face, only the markings of knowledge that wrote in ancient graphic languages that were still somewhat ready to be interpreted.

In the dark, by the bowels, those were his legs, many anchors of dirt appeared, and they felt flat in an attempt to stop him, after that.

Two arms came out but they were too strong to be brought down as they pounded the air, making drops and mark of glassy-steel push over, like windless spades that were pressed into spaces.

And once it was safe for him to finally come through and leap about he saw himself go through and stomp the head of the giant bird, upon which he stood, as if on a pedestal, wanting to be done for.

‘Listen to me Sekov, you need to listen to me now.

Those animals you killed?

They were gods and you killed them.’

‘You mean the ones inside my burning house or the ones before?’

‘All of them.

Go and look for the two hicks, they will know how to help you but hurry before the man that’s wrapped in a cloak because of his vile nakedness finds you.’

‘But who’s that?’

‘I don’t know, I see no light, I can only see the indigo that’s obscured by a dark fog that’s being made out of tiny fireflies but instead of producing any kind of luminescence, they’re taking the light away from my eyes.

Why do you think that is?’

‘I do not know but I think I’m afraid, the snow is flat now, it’s all red.’

‘Women have been doing the same thing as dogs are ever since the beginning of time.’

‘How will that help you?’

‘Look behind.’

The woman he had killed, or thought he had killed had actually been buried alive, and had survived and had been burned alive again, only to survive again with many degree burns. She ran around and he followed.

He could that the fire ran out but she was in deep pain. He had to console her before she thought about alarming someone about what he’s done. It was illegal, thought only if it was reported. Otherwise he would be free. Sekov thought about something and the only thing he could think about was the fact that he’s done nothing wrong, without shame and dignity, there was no morality and he could finally go ahead.

‘Listen, I’m going to give you a piece of advice. You must go forth and buy her a sharp stainless steel hammer so she could cripple her legs and blame you for it.’

‘Why can’t she blame you for what I’ve done to her?’

‘That is not how it works, in order for you to be guilty or crippling her, you must enact a means for her to harm herself. Otherwise you shall be guilty of no crime.’

‘Then I shall do it if I can find the means.’

‘And there shall be a boost of emotion and you shall be elated and do as you please.

Sekov, you are also my son.’

‘As you are my father, but what is your name, father?’

‘I shall tell you once you save her from herself, make her join you, search for the hicks and I shall help you listen to your heart and do as I please.

I would be pleased if you corrected your mistake and somehow saved all of them from your actions of the past. All those deaths could be redeemed somehow.’

And that would be another chapter in his life.

Sekov simply pushed on and never asked questions. He didn’t know what was going on, but that didn’t matter to him. If he ever met that Aleksey, he would definitely tell him of everything that happened here, and he would tell him a tale of charm and power, and fright and dishonor and how he came to redeem himself. From that point on he walked ahead, never to feel bad about himself or wail about having his mood be ruined.

Thence he went, not to abide, what he had thought, himself in doubt. He walked on steps that weren’t his, he tried his best not to pry too hard in them or make a mark that would crease and leave something that might’ve looked as if he plowed, through them and broken down. As they should, they stood and waited as he went to the store, as distantly placed as it was, near the village of his own. By then the person behind it was, to put it bluntly, nothing but a giant iron pain that rotated itself as it pushed down. Suffering followed, animals bled. He was somewhat, defected. It could only be called that way now, he wanted to say something but doubted it would make a difference either.

Poor in mind, he asked for a hammer.

‘How much will it be?’

‘An eye for the hammer.’

‘But I only got two of them and I may not make it through if I give it to you instead.

How about my sweat?’

‘What about your sweat?’

‘One moment please.’

And as he turned, Sekov merely lifted up his shirt and sleeves and merely squeezed the back end of his armpit into his hand.

‘There’s look down, here, you can have my eye.’

‘That is indeed a malevolent beauty. Where did you get it?’

‘Hammer please.’

And as soon as hands shook and the pool of sweat fell, the giant pained man-nail having had giant iron wailing hands that turned around pushed ahead. Why am I so tired, Sekov thought on his way out. He didn’t realize what was happening as he was chased out by the meat-pain man whose head was a giant nail, but whom wore an armor of nail-turned, interconnected nails which made it seem like he was wearing a chainmail ringed overall. It was even worse that he considered taking everything he mistook and shook the lamp that stood near the doorway, leaving the place in shambles.

As the store-keeper came and stood in line, the lamp exploded, taking his head which shot around the store as nails leap and destroy everything, allowing for the entire building to fall in a giant hole that swallowed half of the village town. While the other half started floating in the air, as gravity made it so buildings were being attracted to dead animals, although not every building was stuck to the meat ceiling.

A single orphan child realized that it was too late for him to get out, as he only searched for a mother. But no one mothered the boy because the boy was too much for this world. He carried his small companion, the table everywhere he went.

And now, one of its legs had entered his throat, by forced, leaving him bleeding on the floor as well. The blood being affected by gravity as well.

Near the scene.

‘I think you ought to have this Dame.’

‘You don’t even remember my name, do you?’

‘Of course I do, that’s subtle, I think it is.’

He was not of the mind to guess it, with a slip and a drab.

The scene was serene, as one would be. He found her where she was left since she and him both waited for this to happen. A few feet away there was his father watching. The house was still burning and there was no putting it down. He was still trying to understand what went through him when he gave her the hammer.

‘Here, while you’re at it, do yourself a favor and point it at your head instead of your knees.’

‘You’re not going to help me get up?’

‘No, just go on, get it done already.’

‘I can’t do it if you’re watching, you’re making me feel guilty for doing it.’

‘Then don’t do it.’

I’m not forcing you to do anything. As a matter of fact, I’d be better off if you didn’t do it at all.’

‘Very well then, I think it’s settled.’

He got her on her two feet and took the hammer away from her, not trying to step in line.

They walked to the fire, came around. Pointed in the right direction, they walked. It was hard to tell whether or not this meant a thing but there were in-doors again, trying to read off a strange thing.

Ancient building, they entered it by accident. And the look on their faces was deprave enough.

Counting bleeding needles and there it was.

That part of his notes where nothing made a lot of sense either, since he was trying his hands in the wrong placed. His notes had been recovered after all thought a part of the page was the lower cut side of a bullfrog and a turtle. Then he thought of whichever else he seemed to do. He threw something down the gulper and never asked himself half-way through how he's done it. Acts of arson, this wasn't the first time where he managed to commit them, it happened way too often for him to abandon it.

Though somewhere along the way, upon a town he made a flame. Though they had their buildings and the kind missed and covered with blinds and hard-ceilings, he set there with a single lighter and dropped it in a floor and met the brightest flame he's ever made. Thoughtfully he stared in vein. Lights were dancing in their eyes. And then he hid under a few leaves and rocks and a flock of little ducklings he pulled from a stole. No one figured out it was him. Devilish swindler that he was, he's done it again. He's got away with the worst possible thing.

He pushed her out of the way and then he walked alone for a while.

It was awkward, the way it happened, although he even allowed her to keep the hammer.

And the sight was strange, as she looked back at him disappointingly as if she expected more from him, before setting her eyes down.

Sekov had a black hat.

It was a nasty-looking hat.

He used it most of the time to cover his eyes and avoid everyone else.

In this case, since there was no one else around to look back at him, he avoided the cumbersome sight of so many things around him. Too many animals watching, too many of them were there along the way. He was a man without shame, or so he thought, although sometimes it was too much. But having his eyes covered felt much more, or closer to a blessing than anything else. Being.

It was a nice tiny patch upon which he stood. It's been a while since he shut-down, or turned his mind off. It fought back against him, lashing out, as he stood there, being always in pain without a single doubt of what was on the other side of the fence. It was getting so much harder to walk and stand. To pull off the hat to the ones that came out of their way to ask him.

Tall men made of feet, cut-out paws and heads of beef. He didn't get to see their faces or to feel anything but the space left between them. It was so much harder, having those thoughts. It was even harder, trying to get up.

It was hilarious in some way. Suppose he split with her. That he now ended up being the hick. There was not a single step further he had to take in order to find them. But there was nothing he could come up with in order to make it so he could make up with them.

How could he be blamed for the actions since he had no home?

Sekov knew that this sudden burst of compassion was nothing but a broken bust whose face was picked upon by a hammer whose crushing hit, the sledge had pierced through, leaving a chain of desperation on a trail of stone. He was a good man after all, and the animals were evil, and had to be stomped. Only to get out of this sight he underwent a complete process of thinking, which drew, upon the most awful of thoughts and rancid sinew.

He considered what went wrong. Somewhere along the way he killed an animal and wore it like a plank. And then he killed another and he put it down like another plank. Going on and on until he made a small raft. While on top of it he sailed on air, knowing that the raft couldn't fly on its own, a few dead, yet invisible hovering animals must've been the ones responsible of propelling the raft. But after a few rows, the raft came off and from the invisible ruckus there came a sudden burst of blood in the air which moistened the planks and filled them with their blood. Once the transfusion was ended, the planks planted themselves in the ground and grew leaves that resembled the critters. For once in his entire time seeing and looking about, Sekov realized that the tree under which he stood for shade looked out of place. But he smiled nonetheless and walked on. He had to find his wife the hick and claim her back from the deceit his father must've wrapped her through. He, of all was evil and he only realized that then, though he desired to claim a sit on a giant bird-like throne on top of an evil den of rotten cadavers.

Scared, he was also scared of something.

Since he couldn't remember where she went. It was raining, but he could not understand where she went or why. It was all too convenient that she didn't answer when he called on her. His notes would tell him.

The notes were always on him.

Reminder, spoken to him a few days ago, written on a patch of black ink with white words, hard to read.

'I've seen them everywhere, ever since it began, nasty things.'

'Describe them to me.'

'I can't, they'll know, they'll recognize themselves and see a way in.'

'Like a door or the side.'

'What side? What are you talking about?'

'They're always there, one of them in particular noticed me the other day.'

'I don't know why he's following me, but I can't take him on.'

'For how long have you been followed?'

‘I don’t know, but I’m afraid I’m going to see him again. And he knows, he simply knows what I look like. He knows who I am.’

‘Is it a man then, the person who’s following you?’

‘Yes, he is, but different, I think he’s different than other people. I think.

He’s tall and a dark figure.’

‘Where else have you seen him?’

‘Everywhere, no, I mean only once. There were other people out there but neither of us said anything. He didn’t approach.’

‘Why are you scared of him then? Do you think he wants to harm you?’

‘I don’t know, but he’s not the first one who looked, others did the same. Everyone looks, and I can’t stop them from doing it.

But not everyone, I mean they are, those who look like him do.’

‘There are others then?’

‘Yes, like you wouldn’t believe. And they’re.’

‘Don’t stop now, keep going.’

‘You know, I’ve told you this before, they’re always looking at me as if I’m some untrustworthy person.

Maybe, I don’t know. But it feels so good finally speaking to someone, you know?

I know I keep repeating myself but It’s true. No one really listens to me when I speak and when I do, I keep wasting my turn or go over them. But I know no one would believe me.’

‘I do, don’t stop, go on from where you left.’

‘They keep watching, they keep turning their heads for some reason. No one approached me yet, but everyone’s staring for some reason. Always, they’re always staring for long and they’re all, they’re doing the same thing. Everyone acting that, staring at me, them.’

‘Who are they? The tall dark man? That’s not enough of a descriptor.’

‘He wears a tan, while the other ones look normal, but their eyes, I think I see them by their eyes and they see me by them as well.

But the others, they’re different. They think I want to harm them.’

‘Do they? I don’t know.

I want to be left alone. I want to live in here, I don’t want to be out there. I hate being looked at. Can’t stay out for long, you know that.

I've told you this before. It's getting really hard, thinking. I'm not used to think, it was all automatic in the past. Never thinking, never speaking, never doing anything.'

'You used to pass notes around to speak, haven't you?'

'That was long before, I think.'

'Were you follow then?'

'No, it started after.'

'When was the first time you saw them?'

'I was, I forgot. I was approached once, the first time, I think. I can't remember what he looked like. In the liquor store, he was there, he told me something. I don't belong amongst them.'

'I need a descriptor.'

'I can't offer you one.'

But I only remember that, no. You don't belong here, that's what it was. I know it was one of them.'

'Tall, tanned, big eyed, I need more than that. I can't work it out.'

'I just want to avoid them for long enough. They make me feel much worse than everyone else. At least the others made me feel ignored, but they keep pushing and pushing and I can't think while I'm being.'

'Tailed.'

'Right.'

He looked again in the back. No one was there to surround him. No one was stalking him anymore, it was all safe. Though the sight was still dim, and the animals were there.

He never spoke to the man about the animals, why would he?

It was hard, trying to make the difference now, trying to see past them. Couldn't figure who had been affected and whose was. And whose hand was it.

There was no friend he's spoken with. It was his delirious mind speaking. It was hard trying to befriend anyone, especially with those tendencies. Everything was wrong in the sky again, but this time it only got worse. Flat as in a box, and eyes, his eyes were there, it was the motion, while he was standing on a plain bench.

'What's with the bench?'

'I was trying to mind my own business and sketch something on it.'

'The bench?'

'No, I was. I used to sketch on top of the, on my sketch pad. It wasn't a pad.'

Just something I pulled off by myself.

I don't want to brag but sometimes I see myself as being clever. Ehm, that's.'

He was still there in his mind, if memory served well. It was that sliding motion. He appeared out of nowhere, his back was turned and merely, docilely leaned against the bulk of a house.

He saw me looking where I shouldn't.

'So you brought it on yourself.'

'I was looking around before he even came. But I don't think that's why he looked at me.'

He broke the voice off and walked away.

Man of voices, or man of vices.

It's what he would call himself. One way or another, either of those would have to stick with him.

Poor Sekov thought, he didn't tell him everything, especially since they were in a safe place, of a road where he wasn't even likely to approach. Of some side that was gaseous and abandoned, if not bore a large spike of obsession every seemed to cross, antipathy being carried against him by every animal around. They were merely in the wrong, he had been right in killing them, as for a while, he thought that there would only be one true god, of which he did not speak of.

Though plain of head, never in so much as a religious man, he thought.

'I've done something, I suppose, to offend them.'

'Now we're getting somewhere. Are you finally going to accept the reason they've been stalking you for?'

'I think they're petty, I think I wronged them with something. Much worse, I think I may have humiliated one of their own, and in return, they have been warned of me and my intentions.'

'When had it happened?'

'Many years prior to our meetings.'

He stopped talking for a moment and pretended he was leaning over, just like the dark man had.

There was a kid on a bicycle which made it over and barely passed him without a notice. It was weird seeing others walk and disappear into the distance but by now he had been used to it. Regardless of it, that must've been it.

'I think I'm responsible for something far worse than the shortening of a critter's lifespan.'

'And what would that be? Come on, you're between safe ear-shots, no one's going to hear or judge you.'

'I've built him an altar of tumors, made out of the cut-out pieces of his body that fell.

I befriended one of them for a short period of time, and. I couldn't help it, but I swear, I've done it so.

I think they know.'

'Slow down. What did you do and why?'

'It was a friend, of which. I couldn't help, he was simply. I found him bothersome, obnoxious.'

'Right, so, because of that, you built him a what, now? Come again?'

'An altar, made out of leprosy, caused by his disease. I carved his face into it and brought people onto it so they might laugh.

I did it so, and brought him to it, just so people might laugh at him as well.'

'That sounds. I. How many?'

It was hardly something to think of. No man could listen and not be dumbfounded. Let alone question what had happened that day.

'I scarred him, and I took joy into doing so. I am a man of no pity now and I think I've always been wrong into doing what I thought so.

Unfairly treading whomever I pleased, I don't think I know of a better way to say it, but I cannot appease them any longer, for what I've done might never yearn for their stalkerish behavior to end. I wish there was a better way, but there isn't.

Petty darks, petty, petty, petty darks will never forgive me for what I've done. Though deranged, I think they've had a hand, in what I've done and how everyone seems to ignore me off-hand.'

'So they're the ones responsible for you being alienated?'

'Yes, I think it so.

But listen, it doesn't matter any longer, since I don't need them. I have the best thing, the only thing, most dread of emotions left to mind. I have her, once I find her and we shall live together and not mind what others think.'

There was still something which Sekov hid, but he was too clever, way too clever, even for his own wit.

It was a lesson which had been imparted on him by much greater powers than his. For what was worth, he could never, under no circumstance whatsoever, trust dark-skinned people since crime was in their blood. And it was only too clear now that they seemed to loathe him because he was, underneath the wild appearances and the strange clothes he wore, a great person.

Why, Sekov, as he scoured through each page noticed that he was indeed one of the greatest men that had ever lived, although borderline narcissistic at times, he knew much better than to trust those evil people whose dark-blood was only dark and a shade darker because of their vile tendencies which drew towards acts of criminality. Unlike him, who had been a regular goody two shoes for the entirety of his life, well-behaved and well-respected in his village as well, which only added to the fact that those who looked at him with their weird eyes, of no lack of better understanding and explanation, were simply displaying envy towards him. Since, lo' and behold, they were out there again.

They weren't there in their physical form but they were there nonetheless, readily pushing themselves around in order to commit a viler act that would even rival that of murder, thence called in the past, eavesdropping. As it happened for no one else to care or fathom such an act of dread, which would even rival that of stalking. Listening on someone's private conversation was an act of treason to the country, but those people felt no shame whatsoever as they paid no allegiance or concern to it.

Nonetheless, it was for the first time in a long while that he understood, how seriously deformed they were, serving as a decrepit adversary reaction to their sub-human like behavior which was displayed by the very nature of their being, that alone being overdone by their malignant obsession with staring at him. For every blink appeared to produce something in him. A burning in his head, they wanted to stare in his eyes and enter him and read his thoughts. Worse, they wanted to subjugate his very nature by their almost enslaving eye-power, which could only be fared and warded against by not looking at them. But that had become hard for him since he had trained, over a long period of time to be able to stare in people's eyes in order to recognize threats, though that alone backfired since staring for too long made eyes appear in the thin air. Which manifested in their turn, the other bodies which floated from the other worlds as eyes were but mirrors that could force him to come in their subjugated plains.

This danger was the episodic membrane of vileness that had to be avoided at all costs. He saw what he initially thought to be hallucinations, in the same way one would look at a mirror, in dim light over a long period of time only to be met by an image of him deformed in ways he wouldn't have imagined otherwise. But the world was not a mirror, despite what he may think, yet with every passing second it appeared to be so, even going as far as to look as if bodies were just heads and faces which explained why so many of them were changed. Especially the dark-skinned ones who were the vilest of the illusionary creatures, in their dark embraces and dark-skin subjugation technique which was, at first what appeared to be stabbings.

It was a stabbing performed by one of them that alarmed him of the threat they carried with them. As their embrace of danger and animalistic behavior only seemed to be so much worse for the taking, dragged over.

He looked down at what seemed to be but a pool of blood, which clicked with his disturbing action. The man at the store must've seen the entry to the other world as well, once being met with the reflection of his eye.

I see the ground as it is, an entry that's been established by them through the reflection that was caused by blood.

He had to avoid looking at eyes, reflections, the sky, and the lights. Only then would his mind be pure, only then could he avoid the neglected features of those that attempted to have at him. Dread had filled his nostrils then. In consequence of evil, he attempted to recede, to a lone place where he might find solace for she wasn't there to console him when the thoughts came and forced him on a whim, way below his mighty cowl, disastrously caught in act. He could not understand for the likes of him what went through his own mind.

‘Without the solace of company, what is there for me to look for? What is there left for me to do?’

For I have inflicted pain and fell, your hands upon your worn out domain, I see no worth and wrong that might be undone. And from that I shall never be done for, in preaching to no one in hollow caves.

I shall remain in here for eternity and I shall stay, never to leave my domain.’

But a few days spent in there had stricken in at last. For he had worn out his clothes and shoes until he had to stitch them like a concave hat, he claimed his future after that.

‘I am but a victim of mad circumstances.’

That is what he wrote, on all the page and worn out words.

‘But you cannot be one if you’re aware.’

‘I cannot change.’

‘Look at you, you’ve killed a man.’

‘I’ve done no such thing, I’ve only killed animals. ‘

‘They’re men.’

‘They’re critters, and you are a liar.’

‘I do not exist.’

‘And neither do those men are killed, they’re not beasts. They’re not.’

And he was silent, and unknown, for there was no one around to tell and search him for what was worth. He didn’t understand the delicacy of each act, or which arch through which his need had pulled him towards.

‘Then I shall claim the name, Insane Killer.’

That one remained, well enough, something he enjoyed as well. He would not mind now, for those who knew, his title, through and thought. He’s brought this on himself, the vile one.

But thence, they would know and hear of him and be made ware. Then everyone shall know and be made to know of his acts.

He walked as far away from home and her, and left the life, never to know of anything else, never to have cared, for what was fair.

‘I see that my reputation proceeded me, right before I came here.’

‘But who are you, oaf of lard, your feet seem wildly worn out.

For how long have you been running?’

‘At least a few days, I’ve been, and for what is worth and what I’ve seen, there’s no damned explanation that one like yourself.

I killed a man.’

Said the Insane Killer.

And for the first time he had looked upon the man, he finally understood peace. It was the first man he had ever stumbled upon who listened and responded, a despot that had found him.

What was shocking and what threw forth wasn’t the expression, for which blankness he recognized in his own.

‘So have I.’

The man said. And once he heard it, his mouth would never be un-shut again.

‘Do you want to leave? I suppose I didn’t actually kill a man. It could’ve been anyone, really.’

He wasn’t a hick either, but had been merely kicked out of the house, in need of work.

‘I have. But it was in self defense.’

‘That’s actually understandable.’

‘I stomped his head off.’

‘Also understandable.’

‘After trying to bury alive his woman.’

‘Wait, but, you must be me.’

‘Rightly so, because I am Sekov as well.’

And after they established what they knew, from that point on they walked together, both Insane Killer and Sekov.

From that point on, the Insane killer’s amour seemed to have been bulked by muscle, the fat of bull, while Sekov’s head was that of a bird whose sockets were missing.

Farther in the distance, where the house has burnt, once the rain stopped, the hicks had returned. Though they did not mind or seem to mind the Father or the woman, they finally entered the burnt-out house, claiming it as their own.

They weren’t aware that it wasn’t Sekov’s any longer, nor the fact that he was still out there, for long had they travelled and were wearied to do of all.

‘Told you we should leave, can you imagine the scene?’

‘No, and I don’t want to. Make yourself useful and put up the house. I think we can claim it.’

And looking back, the father simply shrugged his arms. Neither of the parties were going to offer a counter claim to the house, therefore the hicks were homed from that point on.

‘We shall see the sun that’s rising north and we should see it how it waked of worth.’

They didn’t understand how anything worked there. Since the land was barren, a fire as wild as a hell-fire afterlife had raised everything to the ground.

‘I need to do something for me.’

Said the Insane Killer to Sekov.

‘What is it, my lord?’

‘I need you to write your name on a piece of paper.’

‘But, these are my personal notes.’

‘I need you to do it nonetheless.’

‘I have written many names but never have I written my name on them.’

‘Do it now then, this is the perfect opportunity.’

‘Very well then.’

‘Incredible. You’re incapable of properly spelling your name.

Your hand writing is awful and barely legible.

How did you manage to survive so far?’

He didn’t even suspect I got away with murdering all those animals, which by now would be hidden inside the bodies of men. Just as they were talking, the evil dark people were wrapping the dead animal gods and the other animals in the human bodies.

Well, as opposed to Sekov, Insane Killer was a highly educated man whose seen and travelled around the world.

No, he had been wrong in the past.

In some way, this was actual poetic justice. Being put in the same place as he was.

‘We have to establish a chain of command, between the two of us, just so you know that there might be someone as well as some of our own that might join us soon. I am waiting for him but I shall not speak of his name yet, and only wait when needed.

Yet I know that you won’t understand it when he comes.

He's.'

'Is he someone I should be weary of? I think I'm rather well endowed to deal with strong-headed strangers as I.

As I.'

Couldn't think of it again, no, no, not here, nor now; not in front of the Insane Killer. He was a real criminal unlike I who'd play with pets and mess with them from time to time, again. Don't let your guard down, don't show him what you feel, don't betray your emotion here. Or else he'll eat you alive and kill you, of a mind. Was it truly self-defense? Could it be that he lied about it then? Going on this path made Sekov rather uncomfortable. He didn't know what to expect from the man or how to react to his so-called threats, subdued. There was something about him, a missing hopelessness he couldn't think about, not while being watched. He feared that if he left or said something too soon, something might happen as well. What would he do to me? He's awfully strong, he seems so but I could be wrong. What kind of man is that who kills another by chance? Is he strong or was it circumstance?

Circumstance wasn't he, and he could not think of anything. Not here, not during this moment, not when he was also considering this. The man near him, the man from the distance, he was, approaching.

He was hard to see at first, as if his features were even worsened by the blindness of his sight. He didn't think of it, nor would he dare. He could not open his eyes once he was here, no, there. In front of them. Hard to see by the looks of it, he propelled himself as if too sudden but always looked made of a piece, an after-effect of a hooded man who bore no shallow grave-look from whence he came. It was insulting, he was insinuating he wasn't even there.

'Aren't you going to introduce me to him Glicknat.'

'What was what?'

'I think it's mostly Clicks. Like the chattering of teeth, you're not supposed to say it.'

'But how will I be able to refer to him if I need something?'

'You will stay by my side at all times, do you understand Sekov?'

'What if I don't want to? I'm my own man.'

'Are you now? You certainly don't act like one.'

There was a clear shortage they could not avoid, but it was uneven and unspoken off.

Why it's clear, this is the difference of an inter-generational defiance that's being pushed through man, that which may as well go through less than a generation until it could show clear evidence of its own existence. The hick might be taken as a mere example, for him, of all has been forcefully civilized not by accident but by mere force.

He needs to built upon that which is broken, torn apart and worn by fire, build upon it and subdue. He replaced the weak and moved in his stead. And whereas someone like Sekov was unable to return and claim what was so-called rightfully his, that is there no more. There is no claim once another man took what is his and claimed is as his own. It was won by either chance or right of conquest and therefore he may never take it back. Although he was unknown to it, he was yet trapped in that walk, unable to look back at what seemed to be the least of his curiosities.

The three of them continued. It was a jolted leg upon which they walked, but that was enough. They stopped not the crossroads or the cut-out path off to the side, but simply waited and looked at what appeared to be a single pint of jolts, a cut-out motif of no songs and sounds. A bitter thing that stood about, as they looked down and saw what seemed to be line of fair-furred rats.

‘A rat is still a rat, we therefore should stamp them to death.’

‘It’s plain to see that they’ve been banished, have they not?’

‘I suppose they were. But should we not claim some of them along the way?’

‘Shouldn’t we spare some trouble for the village they’ll be migrating into?’

‘Nay, say this much, I don’t think we’ll be able to do much damage to their most filthy-lookers.’

Not in such a way that it might hurt them.’

‘Stop them nonetheless, I want to see some of them dead.’

Said the fairer-one, whose more credible knowledge, of stomp and throttle only begged them to do, right as he wanted to fill his mouth with fair-furred foam. It was all too tiresome, by all accounts.

Another stridently torn-out note, or close it, still poorly written.

‘By Sekov; strange how of late I’ve come to realize how awful of a creature I truly am.’

Truly so, it was hard at first, while swimming through so many thoughts and delusions. But that Aleksey, seeing him again while passing, meeting him again had truly been an eye-opening experience. There are simply so many times someone could pretend he’s justified everything he’s done while claiming otherwise. And in some way, performing such vile acts could or might as well become bothersome after a while. There was just too much a man would have to compromise with in order to keep the entire structure standing, especially since most of it has been build on top of stumps. A bothersome thing, all too old and too plain, so many acts would seem now, for once in all their makings, of a cruelty that belonged to a niche Sekov did not want to be a part of.

Yet, regret is pointless, and it would help no one to know this. It makes just as little of a difference feeling shame about an act in the light of knowing that it will only be repeated in as short of a time as possible, without there being any kind of control involved. That was absolute, in some way, accepting it, during such times. It had to be absolute, not to justify them, as acts of pettiness or harm, but as finality to the fact that one cannot prevent them.

Any such attempt would simply be dismissed as soon as the bone kicked in. As it would be a wrong to assume that it’s anything but a genetic factor that’s guiding it. And that cannot be, for its sake corrected by no means. Only death might put an end to it, whilst it being no option.

Yet he knew that he was possessed by evil. And evil spoke to him in evil tongues. For what was worth, they spoke no less and appeared after time, retorted and misguided, torn and desperately lighted, part of skin. He had to kill, he had to kill, the man next to him, it was clear.

‘It was him, it was him, the Insane Killer.’

‘How did you come to realize this only now?’

‘It’s because I knew you’d do it.’

It must be the animals.

Twenty minutes passed, both of them looked at what they’ve done. Together, bold.

‘I think we’ve messed this up, haven’t we?’

‘Suppose we did, what now, Sekov?’

‘Find Aleksey, he should know what one’s supposed to deal in such cases. I think.’

The man turned and quickly jolted his cheek from a side to the other.

‘You need to shut your mouth already.

Stop acting like a child, Sekov. There’s no such thing as evil, get it out of your mind already. We have more important business to discuss.’

‘But I’ve. I, I, and what about everything I’ve done?’

‘It’s inconsequential, you know of that. It’s been long-due.

Put everything behind and keep moving, we’ve got more important matters as I said. You will take us both down unless you keep your head up and keep walking where I tell you to.’

He listened, as he had to.

There was but a click and clang that was rounded about and missed on chance.

‘You realize we’re not getting anywhere now, do you?’

‘I’m still thinking, I’m thinking.

Give me a moment, at least, I need to clear my mind somehow.’

He stumbled, man of no’er near enough a fool but standing.

He was washing the dog, once. It was hard, bothersome, always submerging it a few gallops down the bucket, hardly pushing it. Even harder washing it, then spoiled. The dog would be put up, wrapped around his arm as well as wrapped underneath a towel. There was this one time he remembered to note down, when he firstly tried it. A mirror lay in front of him, an old one, delimited as in a bathhouse.

While looking at the reflection of himself as well as the dog, he finally tried it, after having considered it for some time. He wanted to know whether or not he could do it. Slowly he lifted the uppermost side of the tower and placed it on top of the dog's muzzle, holding still until he started hearing its choking sounds. It lasted for a few seconds at least before he became uncomfortable and had to pull it off. There were shiver that still managed to crawl down his spine as he considered it.

Although this was not the first time he inflicted pain upon the fiend. No, he was a firm believer of punishment, and the dog was always being awfully noisy. Barking caused anger, anger caused him to lash at the little creature as he pounded it against the wall. Often time, but, never guilty, not for hitting it, for no hit, no slap, no kick, no harm done unearned had made him feel any remorse. Only the one that was unearned made him feel so.

'You've never killed a man Sekov, you don't have the stomach for it.'

'I don't care about that. I'm not supposed to be here, so far off home.'

'It's kind of late for that, isn't it? We're far enough that no one will find us.'

It was all too uncomfortably set, like a scene where no one might find the body. And he hadn't known the name of the man, only the nick-name he'd given him. Most of all, he supposed that, if chance be, the name might've been perhaps way too fitting for his own sake. Some things ought not to be talked upon, not here. All too shameful, seeing things the way they were for the first time in a long while was.

'I think I want to stop now. I can still make it back.'

'You've done a lot, you've done too much and worst of all is that you don't even have the excuse of being ignorant to the acts you're guilty off. You know.'

People who are well mentally don't justify those kinds of actions, do you understand? There are no such things as excuses for one's lack of control, impulsivity or burst of anger. We're far enough for no one to hurt you, for you not to harm yourself or others.

This forest has no wild-life in it. There are no animals, there are no men, no beasts, no vile things, not even birds or nests, no ants, or termites, nothing. If you were to dig a hole underneath the ground, you'd find no earthworm, no plain thing and no betel you may crush.

As I said, it's completely devoid of any life but yours.

You shall leave on berries and on the fruit of the three. But you shall stay here for the rest of your life until you'll be left with nothing.

This is for your own sake, Sekov. I will take away your notes as well, there won't be anything else for you to document in this new monotone life of yours. This is your punishment, do you understand?

Just as you held those animals, in your twisted, sick way accountable for what you've done, this is what you've earned on yourself. You've brought all this on yourself and you need to accept it. Do you understand?'

'I don't like it in here.'

It's all dark, moist, and nasty. There are no lights coming past the branches. It's all shadows and leaves.'

'But most of all, Sekov, it's safe. And for the sake of everyone, we might get a peaceful reign and lack of terror during nights. This is the only righteous end and you know it, there's no need to fight it any longer.'

And in some way, he understood.

It didn't matter who it was, what it was, for some reason, yet, he knew. Those animals would eventually become men, cruelty would become sadism instead. It was all in the nature of man after all. This anger, hatred only came to justify the worst things in a man who sought fight to punish everyone based on his own sense, of bitter illness for which there was no ailment. For it was no justice Sekov bore, but an illness which deformed his every sense of fair, something broken in his brain that in the end got him there, with all his notes scattered.

The man who touched a liver-kettle

He had been benign and he had tried to make it in time. Although relentless in touch, he fell to despair, unaware of what was going on around him, thrown around and bickering for the polystyrene luminescence in which he basked in. Once the storm subsided, he could do anything but know, and throw his life against many plains, unable to see the light that was being thrown forth. Against him, wind paled, first the streets and the flying veil, he could do little but to know.

Where he might stumble on, if not a plain house, twisted around, unable to be gotten, hardly touched. He pulled the door, unable to trash the place and moan. He had been plain of head and wasted no time until he walked ahead and started straining his legs. Once the sand beneath his feet revealed that he had lost his slipper and the shoes that were worn, bearing the appeal of his calluses, he wept. Having realized that there was no way back, he closed and punched the gate.

There was no way for Rod to satiate the need for the monks, as they imparted ancient knowledge onto him before he went ahead and lost his chance. Mightily and taken back, he stumbled rightly through the next room, a boat that was plainly twisted in a cone-horn, twisted as to emulate stairs. Drunkedly he walked with a stave he picked up along the way.

A lamp was somewhere above his head. Another one a few minutes of slowly pacing along the way, accompanied by the surroundings, chairs and windows that were torn-off all year around. Placed near one of them, a table and a cabinet, deformed to match every step. A few staircases that led to completely sealed off ceilings spots. Dust could be seen hanging up-side down but never touched by anything else other than the single claw of a bird preyed upon empty latch.

'It's been touched.'

Thought Rod, in which case, he would be rightly inclined to think so. For all the reason and all the wails, he was simply out of it, yet back to thinking, prints were plenty. Although they spoke of no scene, the sight was somewhat still serene. But this was no boat, but the bowels of a wooden-cavern whale. So it appeared after entering the following room. He had been in the tail, although this was not just a whale from the looks of it. Those were only the general pointers that alluded to its true form.

As a whale would need to have eight long fish-wings as the ones it had, that were shaped more likely to accommodate planes as well as the engines that were inside. Rather than a whale, from the back it looked like he was in a cruiser that held smaller planes with a large track for them to land and take off from. Which seemed to be the most likely point, that brought the lack of understanding. IT was obvious and plain, some of this would not remain as well as it had been before. Prior to their understanding, him and the other man who was a few feet away, in the form of a completely decayed body of rotten meat which could not have starved no sooner than a few months ago; as if it mattered to be brought to any kind of attention, a pair of cannibals ate him. They certainly did but they were nowhere near the place, nor could they have been seen. Or caught red-handed either. Blood-guts were spread that way, but that wasn't written on his back.

Rod had something he never told anyone about. He had written, on the back of his head, heading down the trim of his spine towards the lower end, the scripture with a bone-scalper taken from the body of a mutated bottle-cattle. That having been referred to the general shape of the creature's body, as well as the fact that its head had extended until it looked like some kind of cap. Popped open after being shaken too much. Seeing it pop off because of the acidic mix that was being shaken upon was horrendous and terrible. Dreadful and much worse.

No one wanted to dance with the man who killed such a majestic animal by means of such disgraceful acts. Though this did not apply to their female counterparts, since, as scummy and botched, damaged and thrown around as they were, they were completely excused of every act of every nature it might've come in. And this was only as horrible as it sounded, because it was, for obvious reasons, exploited upon.

And from the town where the fellow came out of, to say the least, it would be an act of common occurrence, having a woman show up and carve a man of her likings to her heart's content without facing any kind of consequence whatsoever. Or child, or animal or whatever else she liked. Most abhorrent acts were just as well carried on with, for no regards over any of their lives and likings could be drawn. Since it was in their very nature, such as criminality and the sub-human behavior which was unique to them, they were somewhat accounted for being either juvenile or borderline belonging to another species that neared a most primitive and animalistic side.

Just how some birds are attracted to shiny objects, so would women be to commit as many abhorrent acts as possible because of their loathsome nature. For no greater creature could compare with her kind, of no loathsome act would add up to the killing of a child in her name. Most importantly, she would justify it, eating the offspring in some cases or abandoning it.

For that reason, the man who died near Rod seemed to have been eaten by nothing else other than a primitively abandoned all female tribe. Since there were no men present to take care of them and hunt and civilize their species, this act came all too natural to them. As their cowardly nature postponed if not overrode human-morality and since their apparent strength came from their number, it was obvious that they overpowered him. Alas, he was not simply killed in a mere duel, as much as any code would dictate, instead he appeared to have sustained several blows at the back of his head which could not even account for the other kinds of blows, scrapes, cuts, and gouged eyes that were present even before he had the chance to fight back. Yet, he did not die from those, there was a struggle first.

Trying to keep them back had been almost insurmountably difficult, although he would not relent, nor land a hand, or pry him. No finger, no whim, only a few strikes thrown blindly that landed and brought some of them down. Pointless nonetheless, as they were only doing what they could to bash and spit on him as he would be taken down, and thrown ahead, out of the way, unable to fight any longer as he staid his hand and lend himself unto their nature. It was pointless to ask from this point on, but. Alas, it was what was it, they ate him since most of them had almost been starved.

Point proven in some way, as the man had been the only hunter of their gathering and their animalistic nature had only shown itself because he was old, frail and weak. He still managed to kill three of them and cripple two but that was only because of some blind blows that ended across their carefully placed row-formation in which they stood. Women were incapable of thinking, hence they haven't become aware of the benefit or spreading and surrounding him. If done so, they might've survived, contrary to what happened, neither of them made it past his death and starved or died out of eating the raw meat out of his bones and that of their sisters.

Those damned harpies were unable to even start a fire so they could extend their miserable lives for a few hours.

Speaking of which, someone was there before him. Rod had not seen any of the women or had even realized what went on or why the man was in that position.

He ripped off his arm which came off with his shoulder and skull, leaving the rest of the body in shambles and disjointed, messed around with like a puddle of dust and other shrapnel-shards.

And who shall dare bypass his snare. And who shall talk to him unaware? For Agamemnon was supreme in might, and of lumpy delight the mighty thorn had once been set in flight. Flung upon the rascal space, and much disgrace to him, defaced, thence his children stood in turn and asked of yonder, ill in turn.

'Who might know where once might be?'

'Whom might still know of better ill?'

'But I say to you and need see be, search for me and wait and see.'

For there and yonder, said and caught, he thrust them to look for him and better ill in doubt. Dark and woe and never called upon sow, and plowed upon and evil throng, his words were plainly yet to be heard. And still he mourned as he asked of all of his children that they might speak of him and ill-worn out.

'Look for him, who knows of ill.

For I feel nothing but jealousy and thin. As my word is, ride ahead and search for him yet.'

Agamemnon knew yet, and he knew where to, that might fall upon him, said and done. Brought about, he wanted him gone or found, the tongue of which still scoured, to his unawares an empty land on a planet that may never be seen. He thought of it but could never feel, nor ask of it, and feel.

‘Where is it? Where is the one I seek?’

None may know there the Tongue-Agamemnon went or what he might see to it. A land forlorn as well from the disease, but it was just as much that it shouldn’t be spoken about.

It was a mess, being inside the place.

With all the parts of it falling apart. With him there, and just about left, the entire construction almost collapsed. All the empty space was meaningless, pointless.

It felt empty.

‘Hey, is anyone there?’

But there was no answer.

Maybe it had once been pleasant to look at.

Perhaps someone had once lived here, but there was no way to know. There was nothing else that seemed to signal of a struggle. At best there was that one corpse, but that was all. Something was missing, something important.

Somewhere along the way, there was a light which turned on. It wasn’t the right moment, it never was. A light turned on, and he came through as soon as he saw a sign of something. It was an empty door, it was an awful place that was hallow. All the signs of abuse and abandonment were present there, just about everywhere man had touched and built. But most importantly, out of all broken parts, of the lamps and books thrown around, of flowerpots and paintings torn, of the whole obscure that was part of the room, which was told of. She was there.

‘Hannah.’

‘I think we should leave.’

‘Sit down.’

‘I.’

He passed one of the paintings but there was no way to see past it.

‘How long have you been waiting for?’

‘It’s been a while. I think it’s been a few hours.’

‘I’m sorry I kept you waiting for so long.’

There was a silence between them talking.

Everything was so different then. The room stood out despite the mess it was in. Perhaps the only shocking part was how normal it seemed. And how much he wanted to stay there; it wasn’t confusing any longer. His lost steps, what he lost and how beautiful it looked. It wasn’t even the room itself, but being around her. Someone familiar; nothing could replicate that feeling. Nothing could take it away from him. And there was no one else to bother either of them, no runaway kid, no bothersome company. They simply stood there, not even staring at one another. He simply looked down.

Five minutes later he killed her.

It was that bothersome company he could never get used to any longer, especially since, if he were to admit to himself, upon some deep reflection or something similar to it, he had fits of anger. Why, he's the one who ruined the room after all.

And the painting was only Hannah's stretched face upon being ripped off the sides of her skull then strapped upon a metal plate. In all honesty, it was hard for him to stand in place or to do so without wanting to hit things yet again. So many of her skin-shades pulled and ripped, worse than any beast could be accounted for.

He was merely serving as an actor of destruction, being not even able to control himself any longer before he kicked back in and worsened the stare.

'I suppose this is another part of my past I have to leave behind.

I'm sorry this happened to you Hannah, but I must go on.'

They felt cold but snow was naught

'It was me, I made them, though they climb the walls, I may not see them.'

Not eye to eye, that enclosed area, during which they climbed. And attempted to reach, my creations pushed and wreathed in, although mightily forlorn and decayed in look, melting atop their empty clothes, of no minerals in their veins, blood remained and scourged them all. Though they had hunted the men, whom hid atop walls like filthy simians who refused to give their heads, of whom arms pointed below and shot. With their revolvers and rocks, with their hands on top of floating mines and others that were spread around, they hid. Like primitive beings, unable to retreat and search for woe. Unable to know what might happen if they suddenly retreated past the throng. There was no other way, this was a dead end, and they could feel only their fears.

As those fiends appeared and decayed. With many arms wrapped 'round or sprouting from on top their heads, through their ears, elks of meat, whose colors blended veins of green and purple, red and blue, mixed of each other, pushing through white of ivory and bleeding legs that crawled behind them as they pushed through the locusts, insects were bred in their arms. Many too strong and too thoroughly evolved to be taken down. Though shot in heads, never bled. Not from the highest caliber shot, not for the heaviness of an axe or whichever fire was thrown.

Not even the leaps they took and mines that dropped, no land could be anything than theirs. Many would not be aware, though some disappeared, appeared, and were gone. And others leaped into inexistence, then reappeared a few feet, then shouted aloud. As for every disappearance that came, some of them had to eat their arms or bite ahead, only to stay. Or stave whatever drew them back. While the most daring of the decayed, of whose humanity would not stay, appeared to have their half-untouched human-bodies in the back, pushing out, but drawing in. Through warmth and only fear had them sink in order for the men to look away.

Though many feared the blocks, the pillars which were as thick as buildings and counted in the hundreds in the back, for there was joy to look at them and in-between, at endless numbers of decay and the farther reaches where they weren't even human, nor would they be. Or appear to be that way, since they had given to decadence they've become what had remained. This filth was theirs, but they took no part, nor would they search for it, in broken hearts. Whatever pumped in them was in-humane. But the comradeship between each side prevailed.

The humans stacking, yet supplies, they could survive through decades and never-ending looking supplies. Many generations raised across the walls, as they were surrounded by a nature whose disgusting form looked like nothing to be gawked near. Out of fear, they would not last and cast no wonder in disgust.

'I'll throw a fire-bomb.'

'But wait, but wait, we can't do it yet.'

'He's right, it could spread.'

'They know of it already.'

Another man pointed out, for many of them could not dread to look around and forget. There was no fear in their eyes but joy, for killing was pleasant, murder was but homicide. And it could not be painted otherwise, than what seemed to be. A cruel game of theirs to be.

'They poured gasoline on themselves. Could you believe that?'

'Clever things, but where are they getting it from?'

'I see no supplies in the distance.'

No greater terror could be forgotten or left that way. Though there was joy in what they were doing, their wall had to decay. Thence they started backing around and made it for the pillars in the sky. For there were the ones below and replicas floating. Knowing they would be followed somehow, they came up with a plan, knowing their friends and family members would be near.

'We shall leap on top the floating mines.'

With it they made their perilous trails and went up in the sky. Towards the other pillars on top of which they stood, near them, shaken but misunderstood. Asked for naught and never-dreaded, threading on most perilous touches, glancing around and the most peculiar watches some of the decayed, the trench-people, the ones of war. Soldiers that were walking backwardly but looked as if they were conjoined, a mixed bunch on a side wearing war-uniforms with nothing but the many keys that were strapped around each joint and pushed around. What? One could see his legs behind, left there as he had been ripped apart. Though beneath that trail, the line of guts, it was revealed that they were naught, but snakes and perilous cobra-like fat lumped beings, that had resided in the fake skin another decayed had peeled away. None would be harmed, they cared of those who were left behind.

While some were injured, without heads, after showing signs that they were moving again, of course they had to be picked and healed.

‘I’ve observed this kind of behavior before, I think I’ve heard of it long before, long-before, a long time ago, during a time I may have known of something and looked again.’

Though he was pained by what was looking out for, he knew what went in his head, the pain.

‘They’re acting like ants, in wars against termites.

Though I may not be able to point precisely at the right species that I may be able to look into and look for.

Although I may not be able to recognize the rightful genus, I’ve found out what kind of behavior this is.’

‘And what is it then?

Are they related to the ants then? An off-shot, perhaps?’

‘No, I think they’ve read from the same sourced as we have, or at least I have.’

‘Why would they take that example from ants and not from humans?’

‘Because they’re not human, what do you mean?

Of course they wouldn’t want to imitate humans since they’re not.’

‘They’re not ants either.’

‘But they act that way.’

‘Humans act that was as well.’

‘But humans aren’t ants.’

After which, a sudden flash of frustration made him stop talking. They simply carried on top of the flying ants. The giant ants which made this mockery worse, since for some reason he started at them, without the slightest point of explanation or anything that would’ve made him think of it as otherwise.

Troud was one of the men in the back. He was blond, blue eyes, and a general nuisance. He was unimportant but pleasant to be around. He was one of the last to make it on the mines after making sure everyone made it to the floating pillars, before a few fire-bombs were dropped beneath his brow.

It was unpleasant, after that, seeming them try their best, but never reach the point where the ground, of geode stone and gotten through, of bitter rocks and teeth broken as they limped towards their shoulders and climbed upon their own, withdrew. There, after a while and only then could they listen to their gongs. The sounds they made only evoked despair, pity and disgust from those above them, as they realized that beneath the decay, there was hardness as well as fire could convey. After spreading in a circle, after seeing them melt in part, many a man have realized that there was nothing they could do, nor take part in the gluttony that was their being. A pity one would have to be, account for some, this way they see them for what they are.

As suits of armors they wore their insides, broken out, and bone would not cripple the fire, nor stave it off. Thence they burned for hours, lived and never missed the slightest hint of pain, hiatus. They must've been conferring for hours on their next move and direst plan.

Trembling upon a missing sun, they made it at the highest peak, where their machines made meat and cattle, fruits for lay. Humans would survive through the harshest and most dire, say. Least of all would they acquire taste for anyone, be spoken, they never asked and never staved it off.

And the halls and walls were always full. Many people appeared out of nowhere and shook everything as they brought the arms, pointing at each other, then down at those who came and shouted. If anything a man felt almost elated, to please everyone and be dissected, if only for a second, that was all he would need.

It was unpleasant standing there for too long. But it had to be, so long.

As long as no one said a word, they could stand still, and call towards one another, feeling the slights and the shimmering heights of wind that guided them around the holes. Many of the bridges lay on hold as they placed their colonies on top the pillars, spreading everywhere before they realized that hope was anything but theirs.

Once the fire had run out, once they were left with the slight hints that one would have to be alive, to witness them atop their shoulders, gathered as they reached the crests, surrounding the joints and ever-growing until they could restlessly work to reach and hold. From their inside-holes, some had thrown smaller bees, and chunks of many infested trees. Whom had grown and least of all surrounded their spherical squared domes, many of the lost souls being hidden inside. Of other bothersome, loathsome mongrel-kneecaps, which sprouted from those strangers, there came their tiny beaded eyeless pins. And insect bodies standing inside their grins, as the tiny deformed roots planets themselves into the pillars growing, some of them prolonged their stay, knowing they would feed on stone-matter and empty organic platter, buried inside the floating pillars, taken by them as they feared.

‘What will they do without us?’

Asked one of the deformed, the mad, in their wickedly forlorn and long-abandoned tongue. Though they spoke in some dialect of abomination, many of their mouths had not adapted yet. Some had holes that they made themselves in their melted over lip-grounds, others had their hands retreated, curved and beaded, which the most severe, of many trumpet like cavities had their long extensions bonded with bone, and gum and ever-stretched face-matter through which gut came even further and pus infected more. Than their faces, some spoke with signs, but others were armless, mouthless even with no change, mutes in dire verges. Madly trying to eat each other's verses as they could not even go not forth. More than a few minutes were wasted, as they looked up-worthy of a question.

Lepers of renown asked.

'If they breed inside the floating stone, will they fall?'

'Clear your throat.'

As he did so he could see that a part of the sky was colored in a peculiar shade that could not be gotten nor tried less, and it would impress no man to know what happened next.

But they were no men and no humans either, as they could see that the sky was broken, lay apart and colored in a shade that would be ruddy but bronze-like in the dark, tending to a blue. An aurora spread across it, fading, yet appearing at times, with many dots that seemed alive, upon looked at they appeared to grow like puffer fishes in doubt.

Though most importantly of roots, many of them grew and shook, so far they did not drag the formations down, and they kept floating despite the sky being somewhat puffy in nature, like a veil of a wet smoke that appeared and disappeared with them in ground.

Some fell from the long stairs they made of their bodies combined, as they were taken down by sprays of bullets and came from behind. To be broken upon abandoned walls upon which the human beings had once come to take their plain shots and make their claims. It pained them to move out of the way and asked for something which was theirs.

'I shall see that we shall eat our fair share.

And of the stubble, we have lost a dear member.

He was too great for this world.'

He had eight small heads which grew upon his neck, although they were tumors, they lived and were most intelligence, for their standards asked as much. A mockery for them, as wanted, would be for each and every single one to ask.

'Of a shin.'

'You may have both of his?'

'May I eat a head?'

'Too many of them are wide-spread already. Have them.'

'His innards maybe?'

'Spoiled but you may do.'

'Can I bear the rest of his body then?'

‘Do as it pleases you.’

Before long they simply had it and he was shared and not a single part of him remained in there. It was only a matter of tastes and nothing more. No one could be blamed either and no one would lose their heads over it. Since law was of their making, least of all could they be pleased, as long as they watched upon the dreary whom lay unappeased.

It was cheerless, the wonder of the sky. Benign in form, a way for the heart to die in the briars, upon the winged-sharp branches, they stood like pumping trinkets which splashed each drop of blood. With every beat of the wing and every sound aloud, they would only push and dread coming on. With every unappealing song and every prude worth, they stood erect. Painting the dead who had gathered around the deadened oaks, many of whom would have nothing more; least of all, to ask of someone who might call upon them to spread the disease and come back when they were called upon.

Though some of the ones whom had decayed less, whom had appeared to be dismembering themselves upon entering reality and spreading about, with every leap and wont, what they brought forth did not belong to this world. Yet they were added to the oaks, as ritualistic as they would uphold nothing but the most irrational, the mad. Their rituals being nothing to be proud of, but insults to the unholy and the wretchedness they shared around. Counts in passing, and ever-dreading themselves to be, they felt themselves hardened by the cancer that flowed through their bellies. But they had eaten those who fell, those who could not be aided, ants they would tell.

For they had read as well from books, and had absorbed upon their knowledge of their mindlessness belonging wreckage; shouting after flattened vales, they could not, nor would they search for more when the age of the uncanny faded. When the darkness ended, and all was settled, then they had appeared again.

Despite their sad-malformed appearance, they still seemed to bear that forbiddance of the madly realms, upon the plains in which they roamed around. Never laying through for long as shouts were plain and each disease could not be bounded just to skin. It was in bone and they were being thinned out before being snatched, thrown around, and watched.

Back to hiding, in a large staunch across the road, in the mud where they could not uphold their fright less. There would be none to confess over it, nor to impress a king, of York and wing. A trail they left but the windy sea water swept it away, flushing it through with the rest of the unreasonable hues that were present there. Like a silk of no taking, a bothersome wailing, they could not force themselves to chant her.

And she did sing, past her wings, all alone, there she sings, as she could only stay and wonder. When they might come, where they might search, upon peaks of wood, her laying. On a heart, there would be, still beating, but not laying.

Thence she would be called the Lady of False Tears Annathael, of which creaks felt of snow, melting as to know that her time would not outlast the summer. Bit and torn, she would not find no living servant to ask her worth. But watched upon their hiding, they waited, and ever and lo, to and fro during their penance waited. Leave of summer, foam of skin, they were wide-spread and grew as thin as they could make the oaks, the ones that were caught upon, and the ones that had accepted the women, they be used for breeding and stack their arms. Many of their forced being made to grow large, right before the puberty whence the decay and the misaligned bone growth started.

Kicking and wailing as they forced their rebellious nature out. Not too perilous ahead. The way said, need to kill a child first for some reason.

‘Listen.’

Said the madly-caught voice.

‘Man of pure descent, your mind has been corrupted. You’ve degenerated as you have started wanting them dead.’

Though the man knew, there was no way back. He killed his wife and slaughtered what remained of his son. There would be no redemption to man, only flight remained. Only flight subdued his delusion that made the sign. And of this world he saw something from the past before it had been thrown in the benign. Unnatural touches, hanging him every second and every perilous touch of his feet. The soles of which almost strangled him before he could breathe through the air.

‘Who are you stranger?’

Man in raincoats, wearing only the marks of the decayed. He disappeared before the man’s vision altered and he saw him no less than he would stay.

‘I have come to warn you, don’t come forth.

You abandoned them and shall only fall for no grace if you make it forth.’

‘But I wish to follow.’

‘Then your mind will only become far more wretched, and you shall decay with them. For this filth was caused by their minds and they have felt, ever so graceless that you shall evolve like them.’

It was the next step in their evolution, guided by the gritty sights and ever-prime in which natural selection had given into the decadence of the malign. And they searched no more for him, the party faded, lost in woods. For the man known as Anthony had only looked forth and stacked his pills, those eyes that melted within his lantern-bottle made out of the bodies of fireflies, which he sucked upon when life was uncanny, wishing he could die.

The man made in post-the run.

Set in flight to feel and see where the many coated figure had gone.

Stumbling onto an abandoned house he seethed, entered it, almost defeated. He lay hopelessly staring in awe, unable to concentrate and see whether or not he was there, instead the shock.

There was a bloody skin-box with skin-colored toe-crayons in it, somewhere inside the bookcase. And they came in stacks of trees inside their peculiarly crafted box. While seen from the front of the case, in the front row, from left to right there were crayons with the shades of berry, orchid, cerulean, blue, cyan, lapis, coral and white. Second row pushed slight to the left, leaving a small gap on its right side, bearing shades of olive, anchor, wood, plum, black, sapphire, salmon, beige. Last row, same placement as the second one, with the fingers being even more squashed because of their peculiarly overgrown size, seashell, dark orange, gray, thistle, tawny, carmine, iron and sangria. But that was not the least of its concern.

For what was worth and what seemed to be underneath its skin-cage, the small pocket in which it was bred for and pushed around its head something was written and twisted around. It would be nothing more than what seemed to be fashion inside of it that shook the soles of what it had been written on.

‘Greed, for greed destroys all. Greed is but obsession, greed destroys its art. Greed cannot preserve its master, greed devours all.’

And for each finger, there were rings, expensive ones of gold, and thin, around each finger, laying, worthless to the men who had them once. For greed held no purity in the making, for the coin had no value to a man whose facial features were distraught.

He touched none of the fingers, their rings, nor masters no longer, he pushed the box and threw it yonder.

He walked out and left the place. The rain was dark and it seemed as if a darker party of rain-coated strangers were out, trying to record as much of the wild occurrences in the air as possible.

Still, brimmed upon the touch, they watched no longer, a decayed snatched a single musky-pint, long-thin as a rod, placed upon the anchor where he’d watch. He needed that, if all were empty, dewy and estranged from the other people, taken for granted as their bodies were living cabinets, hollow on the insides like barrels as they hold little pints and drugs that were wrapped around coyote-skin and fur and burnt blunt solid tar.

‘We should not stay here for long, I think there’s still something moving in that pile over there.’

A pile of leaves dirt and birds, skulls and the extremely fattened body of a large mammal who appeared to be inverted at its tail, whereas it would seem like it bore its own head out of the socket where the neck was placed in. Through that bone socket which otherwise managed to lend a side which would make it so it felt like the head was actually a giant eye, beneath it, attached by a largely concave, elongated spine-saddle, all the organs started pushing and rustling away as in both directions, the heads charged, taking their organs away as they split and left nothing behind.

It hard living out there, outside; there was no way to interact with anyone. And it hardly mattered if anyone survived.

Bad memory, as well, there was young Ford, he barely joined the others now. He barely made it through. It was hard for him, being surrounded by unknown faces, remembering. The worst thing that he had, his own impediment, his own chain he dragged, the one thing which kept him lagging behind the others was the fact that he remembered something, which kept him behind.

Ford refused to grow up, and every now and then, every once in a while it felt as if his life could end. That he could lay and wait for the decayed. To leave his soles, his feet, his robe and see them trample upon him and the throng.

He could not forget, no matter how hard he tried, he was getting desperate. All this time when he had lived, for every leverage and walk within, his every step along the way seemed to amount to nothing, as they paled. It was never his intention to make it that far, and he only suffered for what seemed to be their last day together. As he had wronged them, once, long-before. And their last day together, the four or five of them seems so suddenly. It seemed like it was the only thing he could think about then. While the others were busily trying to decide whether or not he should be left behind.

It was all for nothing, he thought again. Pointless, everything was pointless, not without them, not without having them to share.

It was too late, not only to return, but to mourn. For what he's done and for every action, long before their last day, it had been too long until he came to realize who he was. How horrible of an act he had always enacted upon them, how he could've seen it back then, but now? It was too late to change.

He looked back at everything he said, and everything he's done until that point. And it was then that he realized what lay in his heart, all the evil he had gathered in it and the poison that eventually brought him to his knees.

It was far too late for Ford, change was pointless, meaningless, it would make no difference from this point on. Thence he stood there as they parted ways as he chose to stay behind. That was what his cruelty earned him, that was what cruelty made of man.

But it was not at that point when Ford died. Unlikely to be told here, or there, he lived and carried on the flight of steps just in time to look no further than where they led to along their way.

Ford regretted so many things, but, they shouldn't be spoken about. The way ahead was still hard to get through. He was tired. It was already too tiresome, thinking about it.

He rested for a while, against a single wall, underneath a shade which went on and off at times. Lightheaded and somewhat unable to walk any longer, yet at the same time unable to fully fall asleep.

Right arm missed a few finger nails. Over the course of the last few hours he tried digging through the gable-roof of plants and dirt-stone that lay around.

'Thine will cannot be changed and the vileness that flows through your veins might only creep and batter forth. Of little worth, of little worth as your words might be, glutton, walk around and see yourself immersed through their ranks.

Let them grab a hold of you, there he stood.'

He thought out loud, long before he'd been gotten, exploited and pushed face-first into dirt, rubbed in afterwards.

He had to smash the snail beneath him and the leeches as well, grinding them into dust before shoving them into his mouth. He spat, he throttled, he choked but he got them in, spat them out, right into his hands, but lived. They might've been covered in dirt, scum and worms but he'd live for another night.

Through and thorough.

Distance faded to gray.

They missed Ringer

‘I remember my son.’

The man who undertook the name of Keyringer, long before it, though it wasn’t apparent, he was remembered. Long before even arriving there, by both Filler and her; it was even more unclear.

Why he missed it in the first place, in the same spot. Always in the same spot, always painting the ground, in their small village, near the port, where the bells rang, long-before he took the cloth. He was remembered.

During a time where the camera did not exist, their lives being in peace, whereas there was no time to speak nor hear off, tainted.

But there was another side farther away.

It was a great plan. Aleksey killed everyone near the trunk. He ripped off their throats off, chewed their spines and spat their remains against the butt of their guns. Pleased by what he’s done, there was no wonder that he carried on the sole road towards home, known by something, feet were worn. Near another trunk, a fallen tree, of oak, his son, the giant ant appeared to have been welded to the tap of liquor.

Poised next to it and placed, he pulled the ant open and started drawing inside and away. He wanted to have a drink, unlike any of his predecessors, plenty of his reasons were obscure. Having had to rub it in, he could not mind it, not ever-so slightly until he pushed around the bush and plain. Not for long either, as he did not remain in one place at all.

He fell on his back and drew on the side of the road where there was a Dina standing by.

‘Been waiting for me?’

‘I’ve been standing here for hours. As a matter of fact, I thought I could seal it in somehow, if you don’t mind me saying, come in and join me if you can.’

Around the wheel of eight, he entered the house and stood there.’

She was playing with the troubadour, hearing lousy songs that shook the world he lived in. And he changed around and could not pace any longer before he could be heard through.

‘I could’ve made it, I was close to reaching the door.’

He spoke, threatened by his lack of hope, he was finally subdued. In the same way a man would shake his feet and find himself sitting. His heart was not there, but caught. Almost by the flash of the camera, in a reflection, not outside his body but somewhat still inside his Compound, though he could not enter, mourn or return. He knew his place and it was another man’s turn to come through.

From the Residence, through the station, into the chamber, no recession; there was no desperation gotten through. He's gone past infancy, belittled.

It could not be called on, one of the passages in the castle strung and onto strangeness fading. As the shroud would even mean a thing at this point in time, he knew of desperation as well as the hold which ruined morning. With its hold being strung.

Peculiar thing I see no better shroud in which you may stay. Hide yourself where you may lay. And thought and much, it spread about, it begged release but never met anything else.

As a cage a room, a planetarium with no planets that wasted as each eye detested or even tried getting their pieces together. Out of fear of putting themselves together, through cut-through transparency they, they stopped low. It was hard to make them out.

Large molecules surrounding one another, surge of paper, whitened by blood, torn apart with the rest of the room. It was displeasing to look at, most of all because it was wreathed in the same substance from which his lords were built out of. Somehow, they were disinterested then, as explorers. It felt scum-like, hearing, breathing near shout.

'I seriously can't think of anything else than killing them.'

'Are you obsessed?'

'Yes, I am, I can't think of anything else.'

I'm doing it in the morning, during evenings and closer to sleep as well.

I can't help it.'

It didn't help at all that there was an apparently well-known in the office.

On the street, it was hard walking. Through a straight-walk of twenty feet.

A turn-around there, in the distance only shone upon a light of a snow.

As they faded, yet they walked, as they shouted, yet they spared no second.

Nowhere near where it happened:

'I want to drive a fork-truck through her mouth.'

'All right.'

It sounded good enough, it was a plan.

They proceeded getting into the fork-truck after placing her on the floor as a plank, leaving her mouth open. Afterwards they drove it through her and split her jaw, gums, head, body ripe open but stopped midway before they go to her throat.

She had a wide mouth, the fork-truck was thence stuck.

‘I think we have a problem.

I think she’s dead.’

‘I think we need to find out what’s wrong with her.’

‘All right.’

They walked around her corpse over a couple of seconds but never considered pulling the fork-truck out of her mouth.

‘Poke her with a lighter.’

One of them took out a lighter and started burning her hair. The other pissed on her in order to put it down. It didn’t work.

‘Saw off a piece of her scalp.’

But there was no saw around. Since then they realized they were in a deposit. Many people were watching, not saying much of anything.

A young child came and dropped an ice-scoop cream of smoldering fire on top of her head. It left a pretty nasty looking hole that melted through her skull while pushing through her Precentral Gyrus, Central Sulcus, Postcentral Gyrus, Limbic Lobe, the middle side of her Corpus Callosum, Thalamus, splashed the side of her already calcified Pineal Gland, destroying her Hypothalamus entirely as it drained inside her Optic Chiasm and finally came through her Temporal lobe. Still farther than her ear, but since her head had been slightly disjointed by the pressure forced by the fork-truck, the neck cartilage had been missaligned yet still penetrated through, leaving an after-effect of it on the floor which couldn't be seen since she was covering it.

‘Should we put her out of her misery? She’s still alive.’

‘No, let’s go.’

The workday was done with.

What a caricatural thing she was. The lady of streets which drove the bus, but it was a secret thing, a secret covet they joined.

A bashed head opened and splashed its walls of glass as they entered and stood upon their seats at last, unable to make, meekly each way. There had been a fire in the distance, but it had been stomped out. Though it was unclear, at the point where they stopped, it looked as if they stood on a curved hill which led below them to an abrupt drop on which they’d be forced to drove on, falling and pushing, dreading not still. From where they stood, in the distance, seeing, a block of a city that was rounded at the edges, its focal point left so much to be seen from the front. As it only looked like some kind of weirdly looked upon illustration of a map, pushed around and distraught, deformed a bit but as it happened for it to be there by chance, none said a thing.

Definitely not Novester, nor Pockrl. Both of them were still trying to figure out where they were being lead.

‘Does this city have a name?’

‘Port Summer Ungophliot.’

‘Rightly so, I suppose it’s obvious what crime we’ve been found guilty off, I think we ought to have searched for a more deranged and yet more dangerous to look at hideout. But it will do nonetheless.’

‘Both of you are truly blessed souls.’

Short message on the board inside the bus.

‘That was it, huh?’

All too mentally exhaustive, barely any thought left.

And they were there. In place, somehow.

‘Sit down you foolish mongrelized tower-plant, I have finally put you under my domination, my control, my arms. I shall force you to cower and kneel to my hell and listen to him.’

For he spoke all of the sudden dumbfounded, never asking, nerves were rounded. All around his body pumping, he asked for naught as he looked as the image of his god of old.

For he was just a skull of man, broken in part with a single pipe-like steam carrier on the side of his jawless side that crested domes. Upon the point where he stood, upon the heat that elated him and the headless push, numbers came. All around him, tamed. And from beneath that hollowness came, only but a single depth, an eyeless hell which could only be touched by the machineless lepers, the ones who gnawed upon the iron-lichens that ruminated with their lumps.

Varied unearth

The forest held no man in place. It could only prevail if it was allowed to and it would only refrain from messing through, if only they were being quiet through and through.

He had to have been missed, otherwise they would not have killed him. It was what they did.

‘Off ye arse, the Queen needs to hear you pressing.’

He was delivered upon the court of strung, and midst of the day-light, whence the roses had already bloomed after being painted by the prince’s aftermath.

‘Another royal line ended.’

Thence the servant had been brought forth. He stepped around the work-wheel, whence he was promptly set to face it.

To fully grasp what they were saying, one would have to tear him open. See what he was made out of, why would he despair? For whatever reason he thought, for what was worth, brought only bad memories, most of which were of him checking every object in the room.

The lamp was tall and dry. He opened it and saw that the light-bulb was full with the frozen near-insides of a Middle-Eastern-looking man, after all, he would recognize that image and the scent everywhere. Since they were as fidgety as his own fingers when met with the sight. He opened them and then, John Long-trunk, and tried his best not to smell the lamp afterwards.

Note to self, never check it, again. Never check the lamp again. After a few more attempts over several years, there appeared to be a constant replacement he had not been aware of by any means. The same man, or what appeared to be a similar scent continued showing up just about everywhere, that being as insurmountable as one might think of it. For whichever case it was all too clear.

‘Someone’s putting meat inside my lantern.’

‘That’s a lamp.’

He entered the room. His roommate had a lantern instead of his head. It was one of the old vintage-looking ones, with the exception of the four-sided square crystalline power which kept bouncing against the inner walls, which, they themselves were made of someone. But that was something never told. Since outside, where the floor was wet, a lot of hangar-men were standing there. And they were obsessed, too obsessed with lynching a bunch of the kikes that were going around each side of the building, pandering to their slumlord patriarchs before putting some more fair-skins in their early graves. It was fun, it was pleasant. This was too addictive, seeing them ripped open near the side-walk. It was a good chance of pace for starters. Since their early state, their land of holiness had been torn open and left gaping.

The sight of burning tar looked like their insides. But that wasn’t even the start of it, since they were only getting more and more desperate to give birth to another.

‘Yes, what were we talking about?’

‘Race, we were talking about race having become an exploitable social contract. Nothing more and nothing less.’

For he had taken a keen interest in peoples such as Rousseau, Kant, Locke and Hobbes. Thoroughly interested in their ideas. Which is, the least of all, surprising, that he found himself sharing a keen interest in the matter.

The legless man appeared, closer to the floor and near him, standing largely, held by a pole that shot through his half dissected body. He brushed past the outsider and made it in-door.

‘Were we not talking about what race is, a few minutes ago?’

‘Indeed we were, and since we were, would you mind looking at the floor for a few minutes?’

That's what he clearly he did and he was largely surprised. Many of the carpets underneath them were made out of the Asiatic mongrels that had moved in. Near to their sides, and through them, mostly children and their organs.

'It's part of whom they are, you know? It's customary in their country to put their children on ice and harvest what they can in order to put everything in place.

Would you truly expect anything else from them?'

'Why, no, I suppose I wouldn't. But to be fair, this makes an utmost fashionable choice. Say what you want about them, but they're not wrong.

Not wrong indeed, I'd say.'

He looked around and would convey not a thing. The carpet was looked upon, so was the lamp at this point in time.

'A contract no less, as the terms of the contract are being disputed and renegotiated so that both parties are aware of what's wrong to say and what's right.

And whichever side finds it allowable, to say the least. Those in power might say anything, as they are the higher ups, so on and so forth.

So that, some groups might come onto power and might get accepted along the terms of the contract, so they might achieve their clear-statuses and say what they will. What they might, without fearing any possible repercussion that might stab them in the back.'

'This reminds me of something. Now that you mention it, I do seem to remember that this social contract had once determined the status of the Irish and Italian people during their initial interception amongst the peoples of the States.

Were they not treated as a separate entity over a long period of time until they proved themselves superior enough over their peers only so their contract might be renegotiated?'

'Careful there, oh man atop a pole.

You're forgetting something and you're already missing a point.

The terms of this contract are rather negotiable only when the biological requirement is taken into account. Otherwise, the basis of the contract would be meaningless and there would be no way to account for it.

After all, a Negro would never be an Italian by no means; despite their tawny and ruddy appearance.'

Twa's a jest.

'Nonetheless, when their homogeneity was somewhat near perfection, it was all too clear that the terms of the contract had to be negotiated since purity had to be maintained.

It is utmost important that the prerequisites of the contract are maintained, are they not?’

There was another juggling bolt coming into his mind now.

‘Why, I think the kikes understood that a long time ago.

They had to keep pushing and dreaded threading upon their control over this social contract since they’re the ones who benefit the most from the terms. Certainly it must be so since they’re the ones who most resemble the nations they’re part of.

Hence the need to push it on, as long as they’re on both sides of the contract, as long as they’re their own entity, their own group as well as they claim to be part of the homogenous group, they dominate the contract.’

They feared in some way, dreaded, even, looking into it for too long. Fear was a part of it, being found out.

The contract had to be given power by some means. The terms of his social contract had to played and messed upon.’

The door opened. They brought a conniving fellow in. One of those hook-nosed Semites, broken through, dragged on the floor, in the middle of the room, where he was placed and split open.

It was all too necessary that they searched for a heart. Empathy could only be found there if searched upon and looked through.

‘So, as I was saying, since it’s a contract, and they’re so good with manipulating the law, it’s all too obvious why it’s being threaded and pushed upon. Latched on just like how niggers tend to latch upon their swings and branches.’

Too thorough, he was too thorough. It was all too clear and made too much sense.’

His arms were lame, and he stopped struggling. Apparently, he had been lost for words and only missed the trance of gold, on the trail of which he had been drawn here to.

‘Repulsion is nothing more than a natural reaction to what’s been happening in the past and the present. One tends to look through the world outside with the help of muddy visors, regardless of how he looks through them, there will always be something he’s missing. And that appeared to apply to all of us.

Thankfully, for the rest of us who are looking through whatever piece of information we can, there is still hope that we might curve the rims of our visors and push away the dirt.’

He had little, if anything left. There was not even the slightest hint that he looked through his ribs but he was already done. A lot quicker than a surgeon in some way; as he had simply taken his time and even found a few dirty dimes in the most obscure corners of the body he was staring at. Of course he did not feel that ill-inclined to rip a piece out of him, so soon.’

‘We’re leaving now.

Come, come, there's still something I want you to see.'

On his way out, he pulled a pack of Maroboros, and offered him a smoke. He politely refused.

They passed the poster of the Queen and wheel, but their faces had been torn off. Torn between going forth and walking on, there were round part of the floor in the stretches of flat-floor inside their buildings; and although they looked flat, they were off-an eye. A check-board pattern that stretched on and twisted around the circles, even those being somewhat distanced from one another in close terms of twenty or fifty feet away.

Standing near an eye-mark, which replaced one of the half-bitten off black envelope-made like square, twisted below, there appeared to be a giant childish starrer below the floor. There was a basement there. Truthfully said, it was actually an attic since it pushed through and the childish starrer had something underneath him to stand on top of.

It was not fair, that beneath the curved look, below the dark, into the darkness he stood without a face, ripped away and dragged by hooks, to which there would be no chains, attached or pushed through.

He had no guts to come out. The other check-board patterns were off color and appeared to be green, yellow and other shades of purple, melon carts being dragged around by some nurses. Too many nurses lay there, yearning for release.

Despite the other factor being a part of whom they were, their legs were being drained by the various protruding surgically-syringical appliances that were connected to their thighs. All too obvious as it were they were not wrung and stared, unaware of the pain that they caused, blinded and unable to breathe, at last, many fell in their own carts, being pushed over like corpses in their own small unitary lust-caverns, towards which they drove to.

And though they formed various lines and only bore their crowded areas, they walked slowly and deliberately, as they wanted to gather as much attention as they could. Nor should they push too slowly or too farther than where they needed to land. Otherwise, someone might sniff they out and they might finally draw in the scent of their various pheromones. Mainly coming from inside their hunchbacks, until they could not look no further than the front.

There came a vile man. In a dark gothic armor which was cornered around his gaps, instead. No insignificant hole might be found in there, nothing close to weakness being shown as well.

'I am an evil man and I shall fantasize through my evil fantasies until the day I shall be taken down.'

And he showed up in a suit so dark that it could only feel as if he had come from a world when the sun had died.

'I am an evil man of an evil race, born evil and feel no disgrace.

But, this evilness comes only from my inbreeding and from the fact that I see others for what they are.'

And he had looked down upon them as well, in wont, disgrace, he felt his worth rise through the ranks. There, in front of them he was killed by another evil man, born not so, but bastardly he had become as such.

‘I am a viler man, the vilest that ever was, as there’s no greater evil to be achieved than that which had been made and fought for and appraised by the evil ones that shook the curtains upon which your ancestors bleed still.’

‘Too pudgy, I can see, my lord that you have lost one of your houses, down the Iles where the wedding of our lord once began.’

‘And I managed to show no fealty towards him. I killed his blue-bird, it mocked me for far too long. It grew a bit too fat for its own good and I wanted to slit its throat, the pool in which I swam.’

‘And you’re telling me that it’s there that you first saw your lord, wasn’t it?’

‘Of course it was, and it was because of him that I became corrupt and evil.’

‘For what reason would that be, if you don’t mind me asking?’

‘It’s because he showed an image of my parents being murdered.’

‘You were pressured into becoming as such.’

‘You did not allow me to finish. I was the one who killed my parents.

I stomped them along the curb, and I felt like it was the only right thing to do.’

‘What if it was a forgery?’

‘No, I’ve already done it by the time he showed me the image.

My lord only reminded me of what I’ve done because I only attempted to recovery from it and move on. It was a vile act I’m not proud of committing, but it’s too late for me to change.’

He drowned people in gasoline.

‘Focus now, knight of gothic armor. Your needs need not come first, make sure that you shall not despair when they show up around at your door.’

His needs were unmet. He was pardoned instead.

They walked together, unable to instill any amount of fear, the fright being rosy-cheeked.

‘Ah-ah-aha, you’re right, we shall go ahead and open the first door.’

They only neared when it was needed.

One man disappeared, or had done so before. He appeared now, it was Croy, and he was mightily looking around, indisposed.

Cut around the edge of the rib, he walked morosely up front. Leading them as a revolution would, unneeded and unending. Ever-pushing, up front, a given for he would not lose his mind.

Not to intrude any further, they were only hanging inside his room. The dorm in which he stood looked like an ancient gable, or at least the dilapidated remnant of a broken castle, which fell upon itself, appearing only thoroughly formed once and again.

Carried through, they saw no reason, pushed away, they wasted no time and asked.

Connory was there along the trim of a single door that opened about two am. It was a window, from which his master emerged. But the master was incapable of thinking for himself, since he had been worn out, and bored.

A few steps away, into another room which was the size of a galaxy and appeared to lead into a pocket of space.

One man named Eguho met another named Gjyhle.

Gjyhle was the main deity of the forgotten pantheon of Sphfleyhje, of the main bulbs surrounding the planet which seeped into the nearest planetoids, as it drew on and ate from their insides, pushing out their dreaded manifold channels through which a horde of symbiotic fluids hardened into what appeared to be long belts that kept the planet intact. On top of them, the ones that were dreaded by the side, the citizens of the benign were made to freeze in space of cold.

But somewhere in the hollow hold, the two of them stood.

Plenty of space could be seen, of, course of the fray. Most of the edifices forming across it made everything and every wall look like inverted hills and whales if they were buried underneath the ground, hollow on the insides and seen from below the ground-line. Which only seeped and only took the grit away, they spoke of salinity, dreaded reality and were hallucinating all the time because of psychosis.

And there were too many globes falling, of various colors, from time to time there being long strips coming out of them, only to form links, from the fat of which, little organic homunculi remnants would appear, shortly lived before they were pushed through the rows of dirt beneath the dirt, forcefully crushed as they were drawn in spherical holes. And their inflated bodies suffered an unfathomable amount of pain. Dread formed tri-dimensional circles and various four sharp-clawed bodies of fat-engrossing meat that pushed against each of their bodily-formed walls.

From various claws, of which resemblance to talons was surface-deep, there lay various metallic-organisms that started seeping in and eating their own. Only to fill their insides and push on, threading on smaller long-bridge like bipedal-primeval abhorrent tails, from their backs pushing ahead, seen from the side as nothing but twisted c's that rolled the fat forwardly in the way conveyer-belts would be placed in factories.

And the main bodies, upon which various masses were added together, looked like sacks that held an overwhelming amount of chopped human arms, protruding out from time to time, as they would hold the many rods that came out of the sack in order to hold the circles in place. Some of the creatures had the weird asteroid-like belt as far away from the sack as they manifested long-teeth which resembled large mushrooms that melted their sides and grew long veils and curtain-whitened perilous melting snails from them, or in the shape of which, their bottom feed tilted as would the belts, in order to avoid contact with the long teeth which would only seek to penetrate their own bodies, out of the inhumane desire to eat and satiate the hunger.

They were nothing but real creatures, primordial yet never caught, never looked upon by the inhabitants who had once come. Once the citizens were driven out, so had their exile ended; although they were mourning for their young, they lay slightly flaccid and could do little if not convey the lack of emotion as their heads were driven forth. Their anatomical structure was made to replicate that C, in order to carry the fat over as their reproductive organs were only carried inside their circular heads, that fattened, as to be. A mark of fat, and they were not interested in much.

But they spent their time there, attempting to hear, as to near an understanding. Why would explorers do such an unfathomable thing?

Some of them who stumbled once, not here, but in a distant, nearing place, they saw. And what they did to them so they might suffer was that. They placed hooks and ripped their trimmed circles off, then they ate them, then they threw them around.

‘Haven’t we plainly driven a few species to extinction?’

‘We have, well let’s do it again.’

‘I cannot guarantee you anything, you know that?’

It’s in my nature to lie, cheat and betray.’

‘Then stay in.

You’ve ruined the plains, you’ve destroyed the planet, whence nothing remains.

Stay here, as long as you stay in, as long as you sink deeper into the obscure, no one else might be harmed.’

‘Will you keep me company then?’

‘Nigh, until the time of my death approaches.’

‘What then? Who shall stop me from doing it again?’

He saw it too, as soon as there was a way to crawl out, he’d do it, without a second doubt. And there was no life he would see spared, no one unpunished for things they haven’t, nor would see them beg, before finally putting them down.

Hatred entered him, unappealing, it poisoned him like every being. It was impossible to deny its existence, impossible to ignore it so.

Though he was shelled in marks, his body formed into a cast, though perilously limbed, and only small giant hairs-formed limbs wreathed about, he still thought himself like them. And for that reason he knew that it would never be taken through. That he would be unable to leave, seeing how he could never help himself.

‘So what now?’

Do I simply stand in? Shall I never leave this house of mine even after I’m left alone?’

‘There’s nothing honorable in what you’re about to undergo.

It’s simply the way, you know, things ought to be. In the same way prisoners are set in, you should stay in. And they themselves ought to be handled in the same manner, apprehended and dealt with accordingly.

Especially since you’re one of the worst kinds; the harm you could do might as well be called upon as being insurmountable. Thenceforth, this is the only option that’s left.

Stay in here and never speak of leaving the place. Otherwise.’

He only placed a closely related emphasis on this.

‘You stand to lose it all. I know how difficult it might get for you to accept everything I said, but I suppose there’s no less to it than you ought to forget.’

But he doesn’t know, how pleasant it felt. How could anyone understand, those needs he had, all the harmful things he’s thought. Why would a god not lie? Why would he not pretend he’s something else and deceive its worshippers instead?

This was a pleasure which lay way beyond the realms of ecstasy.

And then, he killed the man. He could not help it. Although it was an act done in cold blood, although a man who’d do the same in his turn would be called a sociopath, he could not help himself. It was all too pleasant. Harming living creatures brought joy on his dull-capped lips. For how long?

It was days, weeks, months, in which he waited. Regardless how hard he tried forgetting in, it was there. His body lay not too far, before he realized what he’s done.

Not fit of anger would return the man back from the depths, and the chasm of death upon which his heart was broken, thrown, solemnly broken. Instead, he seemed unlikely to understand why that guilt existed in the first place. How come it suddenly appeared? He could not understand the reason behind it, nor why he mourned for the man he killed in an act more pitiable than the one he had come to be scorned upon.

With the rest of the halls in shambles, the primordial beings left the site, leaving the two of them and two but none. To ever refer to now, when he felt unlikely to be gone.

‘I don’t know what you wanted me to do. I could’ve saved you, if you left this place.

You shouldn’t have stayed, it was your.’

There was no one else to shift the blame to, and no one to lie or listen to him justify his act of dread. And there he stood, abandoned by an act performed by his own two hands.

A god should not feel that. Not one who ought to have powered through and ruled over a pantheon. Not one whose harm should be known, his blasted throne being a torn somewhere in places where the plaque of stones were all around his restless world. That being a remnant of a greater piece, of whose might unkindly dented, if only a shimmering piece of the ground that melted beneath him.

‘Why I’ve finally come to realize why everything’s broken down the road.’

‘I think it so too, but would you be pleased to find out that I finally made it through?’

‘To whom am I talking to?’

‘One but one of but one reflection, your echo master, of which flight towards which there’s no direction to be taken about; and for that you might listen and not be in doubt.

We have to carry through with our legacy and plain, until nothing shall remain.

Destroy everything to your heart’s content. You killed your only friend, a creation of your hands, your sympathy and that of which creeps inside your stitched-out heart.

I doubt that there’s something to your clarity here.

But hear me and hear me now, don’t stretch your heart, don’t you dare die out, or I shall take and claim and end your life before I might take you away.

I, the echo, whom fear shall become near your endeavor, I claim your heart when asked not for it, I shall do what I claim, I shall cast you in a pit of despair and never talk of the claims of evil that satiate the body you’ve uncovered.’

As of little importance as it had been, he felt like taking him away. His claim had nothing inside of it, yet he dared not continue while knowing he could’ve done something about it.

‘You’re a troubadour, you hear? Are you listening yet?’

‘Tell me what you want, I need guidance.’

‘But you’re a god.’

‘Please, I need this, I am lost.

Everything I’ve done, everything I’ve made and created along the way is damned. The images, the strokes, my hands are worn.

I do not know what to do any longer.’

‘Leave, step out of it, but don’t attempt to deceive or satiate any plain desire amongst your peers.’

They would not take him as he was. This planet was disgust incarnate. And he was not the same god of which conscience would tell of life told and put together, folded together ten times worth.

Outside the building someone got kicked out.

And plain of roses, flat upon the tall stalk, they stood upon the bridge that took them forward until the morning sun arose, from eastern borders where the walls were wrought, with bodies of the workers, invaders and those who had been tortured around their unfathomable harrowing border. Upon which they portrayed, their poor children and those that stayed. Well beyond, they've been brought back and slain in cinders, burned alive. No one would have to be spared and some would least of all convey.

It's all too clear, as to near a man and chop of his ear and hiss in there and kiss the bulb around the erogenous zone that started tainting the blocks of meat that formed his headless whim. That he would be dragged around and beaten for being sexual deviant.

Right around, and better lauded for the insight he bore.

'We shall kill you here and now unless you swear never to touch and pull.

They need to be strung, don't they?'

'Who are you talking about?'

'Them, them, it's always them.

The root and cause must be brought down and burnt to scolds.'

The same blood coursed in every vein which belonged instead to evil men. No legacy was worthy of the trouble and none could make it so without effort put in. There was too much to correct now, and it was rather obvious that, unless it was pushed through they would find no way to detect it.

'You're infested.'

'With what, a virus?'

'Bad blood, I think he says. There's bad blood in you.

I sees it as well. I thinks we got to draw the blood bath and make you sink. '

'But you can't force me to do it.'

Something happened earlier in the evening, while he was nearing one of the grocery shop he made a habit regulating at.

During his so referred to as session, he noticed something about a woman who navigates the Isles. Her chart was filled with groceries, as one would under normal circumstances be. And although this may not have to be anything but some kind of misplaced observation, the lady in question was of Asian descent, short-stacked, and almost a shade off the usual attendees of similar genetic quality or similar stock. Yet she's done something that appears to have made her stand out. As it happened for her to have purposefully aligned the groceries she bought inside the chart instead of doing so on the rolling band when her turn came as she approached the cashier.

It's a well known fact that groceries ought to be compactly put on the band while they're on their way to the cashier and not before that since placing them systematically in the chart would only yield nothing but a waste of time as well as a repetitive pattern that ought to be avoided since such patterns only seem to taint the mind.

One would have to think of that as a puzzle of some kind. A puzzle that's already been solved and made inside its box, which will only be moved from one side to another; while this may apply to this kind of context or conundrum, one could not be so much wrong in such a case, since it's obvious that the way in which she acted would more so hint towards a tendency of abusing already pre-made configurations before her knowledge was even put to the test. To better illustrate this point, the puzzle is pre-solved prior to the test having begun. In this case, the puzzle was solved inside the chart and merely moved on towards the test which is the belt that leads to the cashier.

As it happens for a normal person who ought to have looked after the way in which he placed his groceries in the chart, he does not concern himself with mere such trivialities when they're not needed since they represent a waste of time and the size of the chart alone makes it so one would have to be reactionary to the way he placed his groceries inside his chart while accounting for the space left on the belt.

Henceforth, one such person would then make order of the chaos he himself had created while establishing the best possible way he could place the objects despite their location only so everything would be perfectly set to fit without having to deal with a pre-made configuration and such a constrain.

But that is not the only thing. It's clear that the woman, of which phenotypic variance and height appeared to hint at a somewhat lower breed, yet that should not be taken into account for the time being. What should be taken into account is the fact that their conditioning appears to be present even in their lowest denominators and the worst specimens.

The creatures are not necessarily taught to think on the spot. It seemed as if necessity forced her to work on a model right before she even considered approaching the belt, which in turn seems to hint towards a tendency that's well known amongst their people. Exploitative as they seem to be, this ability has their claws sharpened in every aspect of their life, being ingrained in their mind, forced to act so as opposed to people who act, otherwise, by normal means in a rational fashion.

And I could illustrate the subject much better.

Since the groceries placed in my chart were more chaotic, by the time I stepped in and had enough time and space between my personage and the next one in line, I came to the opportunity to simply pick the objects I saw fit while working whichever configuration I saw as being pleasing this time around.

For example, knowing I would usually place the bottles of liquid yogurt as opposed to the normal types of rectangular boxes I had also purchase, I have taken this opportunity to take the separator from the side, place the rectangle of yogurt first, with the exception that it did not face the line forwardly. As that has been taken into account as well. Instead I placed it backwardly, as to face the person behind me who was standing in line, therefore making it so I would have a frame of reference to place everything else on the line. And since that frame was already set, everything I would subsequently put on the band would face the same direction, with some exceptions in regards to some brands which would make it so they'd be mirrored on both sides. An exception from the rule, I suppose.

Yet, this kind of pattern is useful since carefully placing the groceries to be more compact on the band does not yield any loss of time since it makes it so the person behind has an easier time placing their objects on the band. Doing so in the chart is meaningless, a waste of time and insulting to anyone watching. Since a great deal of time might be spent doing the in-so called in question groceries shopping, that kind of person would also do such a thing for no other reason than to show off. Which in itself is an insult to the other people who are in the shop, and to the people of the country in which the Asiatic person came into; that much is obvious since she was standing out not just because the way she looked but in the way she acted.

It was a meaningless action which achieved as much. Too ordered, being too ordered is unnecessary, especially since it's uncalled for. One does not wear a suit while attending an unfashionable even that might stain it, or bring any kind of mark upon it. The creature should be looked and stared at in pity.

Although it is hard, to be certain, to truly read them since their tendencies make the Asiatic people rather emotionless.

That's not to be called upon the fact that one would rather choose to be surrounded by Negroes or Semites, since, in any case, it is better to surround yourself with peoples that are just as civilized as possible. But at the same time, that is not necessarily how civilized people act but rather how people who want to act as if they're civilized act like, hence their tendency towards cheating and their exploitative nature which may be observed as being present around other species of similar kin.

Was it all real

'Wake up old man, you've been hit at the back of your head. Get up already, it's getting late and you've been out here in the cold, yelling at the faces in your sleep, I'm told.'

'No, I don't want to. Where's my daughter?'

'Oldman, she's not here any longer. Do you understand?'

'Where is she?'

'You know where she is, she died in your arms. She died because of your obsession, which almost drove you down, far beyond the point she lay in.'

'Where is my daughter?'

Then and only then he let go of him. Both of his arms unfolded and unable to keep a single hand wrapped around. And his life was being ticked upon, grabbed upon the point where his muscle became worthless as he could not intone any word properly any longer. It was thoroughly done, by now he was a heartless thing with no mind, in search for her, unspoken to.

Whence he came upon the door, and entered his home, he was greeted by none. It was hard, harsh, impossible to breathe, as she was nowhere near the point of sin. Where he had touched the handle and found her in a mournful stance. Where her heart died, where his hatred finally subsided, pages blank; during the time he had finally realized that he had not written anything at all.

Upon each turn and each stare, he had revealed to himself that it was nothing, nothing to tell. He refused to believe it, for in his absence someone could've tempered with what he wrote. But whatever pint of blood remained in that pump could only seek her grown. Her locks of hair? Anything to make it seem like it all happened, though there was no point in pursuing something that wasn't there at all.

'Have I gone mad?

Has anything I've ever been written been there at all?

I can't understand any of it? It's all gibberish.'

His heart almost sunk. Nothing he's written down made any sense at all.

How could this be? He wondered, without ever daring to make himself feel any of it. Why was it so? Why did it not make any sense? All of it, bitten, ripped, spread across each sheet he tried wrapping his hand around.

There was no excuse any longer, not to see. Everywhere around him, saddened by what he saw there. Nothing, it was nothing. All that work for nothing? Living in a house of dirt and rust, being lost despite having lived there for the entirety of his life.

But for whatever reason, he could not stop. Even after all that happened, even after finding out this, after seeing how flawed his hands were, let alone his mind, he simply returned, stood before his inclined table and rolled another sheet of paper. There was nothing left for him to think of other than.

The reason for each stroke and ever blind, and every pint of ink, underneath the candle-light, for once he realized that there would be no other reason than that.

'For man is God.'

He put an end to his story of madness and then fell back.

'But at the same time, I fear not. For whatever might happen after, I shall bring it upon myself and I shall be met by no fear, and might.

Light shall be set upon my words, instead and I will never be touched by them.

Since nothing I write appears on sheets, I may as well say anything.'

And there he said, without facing anything, not even the slightest hint of despair could be drawn from what he spoke of, let alone would he take the slightest hint, and field of wheat, and burn despair and be aware of their inexistent anger. He knew that his heart would be anchored and taken down with him. Desperate as he may lay, unaware of any, let alone would he fathom less. He knew that of limits, none may bring him down his knees.

Since the gibberish he wrote about forced his body, full of tiny fleas to emerge from inside the hole he had dragged himself into, since it was unclear he could not control himself any longer. Dreadful, dreadful in some way, he wished it all gone. Before they caught him past the day of reckoning which drew forth, unimaginable, to say the least. He thought himself a prophet, a sinner, one whose life was drawn by chariots in the sky, for he was met by his inability to read what he set down.

‘But lo, and lo, and answer me so, how is it that they have read what I asked of? Why is it that I have lost and at the cost of it, they’ve read at last; if it be so, why is it that I am not greeted by no man?’

Do they not know who I am?’

Where was this mansion from and how have I arrived to it? What is this prison made out of and why am I caught in it?

For this long time, longer still he waited there. Longer days that never came.

Search the brain and feel some pain, some bumps have grown and felt their way.

Out of fear, out of the lack of might he may have shown there, he delighted in as much. He wanted to start writing on the wall but all of the sudden one of his nails popped off, like a deflected bullet chipping off a chip out his shoulder as well. It felt as if the bullet was real, although there was no other man in the room.

The old man simply stumbled on his feet and fell down, knowing nothing and not being able yet to sniff again as the scent was lost. So was he during that one moment he finally came out. Marking his second or third day spent into the wilderness, whereas he knew nothing of what went through out there.

‘Have you all forgotten me?’

Why are you all looking at me that way?

I’ve written so much, haven’t I? Haven’t I? Answer me, I want to hear it out of your own damn mouth.

Where’s my daughter?’

But no one answered him. They ignored the man and walked away. They were out of his sight already, although it was unexpected, one of the women stopped along the road. She got off her carriage despite her husband and her servant’s protests.

It was in the middle of the day as well, a shameful display he thought. Finding himself bouquetted off around her arms.

Everyone momentarily stopped from what they were doing only for a moment in order to look back. Finally, they stopped ignoring him, the man thought.

Although by then, he could not help it.

There wasn't much else he could endear; she looked like her although his time had neared.

He spoke no word but died in her arms without having felt any fear.

'Dum rock, I will crack you open, somehow, like a coconut.'

'Need help?'

'Yell to us and we shall tear it open.'

'Right there, with your hand as well if you don't mind it. I think we all agree.'

'Help him.'

'But what is wrong?'

They could and would not speak of it but manifest monkeys, throwing them around. Falls were deadly, many in touch. Pain was plenty, always first to watch. How pitiful they acted, the old claims of man. He didn't ask the reason, as he was mocked.

'They're not dead.

They were never alive, you're only throwing monkey statues.'

'We're not throwing them, look carefully.'

It took the old man some time to understand what went on.

And he was stepping on dark stones and they were trying their hands and formed him somewhere outside the planet where he suffocated to death.

Earlier before his death, it couldn't be but he was yet to be felt.

Yet it passed and he was there, alas, holding the woman instead, as the old man's skin started pushing around her, wrapping like a coat, his skin clothes not only enveloping her but becoming part of her. Now they were together, unable to make the difference between the broken stones and the coconut-lobes that grew in his back. A she was part of him, eaten like a reverse-birth that made him stop. He desired this attempt. Only to give her a chance to redeem herself, but that could not be.

The woman then stopped flowing like a kite, and despite being attached to his body by pins that pulled out of his wrists and heels like the lights of deep-sea anglers, she became a tool for telling time that was ever-caught in flight and bled in the air.

And it was obvious that he was talking with the rock, trying to emulate it, standing erect only to have died a few moments later while risen and walked in circles, like rocks would. And because of flight and because of their weird yet the peculiar way in which they ate the pebble-like broth that was weaved in place instead of the earthworms and other earthly characters that dined upon their kin below the earth, he relented, asking for a reason to stay while satiating the forbidden knowledge of rocks.

‘There are many rocks that have been documented in part during the seismic toss which had come from above.

But I can only recall eight-three of them that had been spared by the complete annihilation that came from earth, which are my fingers now.

As in the thumb being a Sedimentary-Surpon, my pinky being a Yeuronite-Asthor, or my.’

Silence came as in awe. Agamemnon’s boredom only showed itself then. Every man in town had their heads smashed with rocks, crushing as far as they could push down the flatness of their spine as they buried themselves even deeper than that. Rock-pigeons, that’s what they were, and many rock-feathers fell from inside of them, making their way through little by little until, out of their coat, a cartilage formed beats of their own. Two feathers united and surrounded by a layer of transparency came out. Into flight, they carried little children of their own, in sacks. But the next generation wasn’t made of stone, but they were beings of their own. For no normal stone it was, as it was semi-organic in matter, making it so the organic sequence could be carried over. As they lasted even less, they painted what they could but could not impress themselves with the various nests made out in the abandoned homes.

‘You’ve spared the women.’

‘Anything but to hear you talk about rocks, old man.’

‘We could not handle listening to you or even paying too much attention or punish anyone, more than it’s needed.’

There was that famed pettiness, it was theirs and theirs to be, subconsciously, it was the filthy gift of the self-aware, of whose magnitude had brought despair. The old man knew himself to be attracted, that he would beat and reap the heap he had brought and enacted. But he would give them children and would never dread, not again, not before he pushed around and cut a flower of the bed of rocks that moved around him.

‘Soon enough, I think they’ll stop.’

‘Don’t give up yet, I see a dark fiend of space approach.’

‘Who, and tender?’

‘Ripped out of a piece of rock, there it shall come towards you.’

But it was meat if meat was coming out of a tender stone-like heart that beat. And it bore itself like a swindle, as its presence there had made the others bow. Various other stones were tricked into the servitude he had implored them to, and would not be. The trickery was only their and would not pass.

IT opened and inside of it, there was the room of a cockpit, but the journey had been too rough, as was the landing. The old man was startled after seeing the spewing acidic body that came out and moved. Hardened as it should and walking, stalking his stones. A god on his thrown of air, slowly dissipating until the after-image of a cloud remained, or something similar in the vein of a face that was ever-caught in despair; for its appearance resembled that of the last portrait of a dying artist, but from it there rose but a single malignant rose from the bottom of the earth. Although it looked like an earth lily-pad, it bore the message.

‘Made in the image of sad.’

What could it mean?

Agamemnon wondered, the stones did as well, as did everyone else, including, if not alluding to the worst signs, and blindly, yet unkindly, his heart rose, and bitterness frozen, uncouth, the slaying, this was the massacre he most feared, his heart neared, but stood still. It was not stone, not hardened but softened as it was something he most despised, as being something of his own.

‘Touch it.’

‘The rose?’

‘No, the heart, touch the heart-pit, look inside of it.’

The devices were inter-connected and crossed with wires and various other devices that looked as if they had been crushed entirely before the ship had a chance to even land properly. Also there was a man or the image of a man that was stuck inside of the panel. A humanoid dead body that had already materialized a rock-pigeon in his head, but only there as he approached, which started the old man even more as the man’s chest opened, heaved and from inside of him, a few more of the flying beasts made way.

‘Did you do that on purpose?’

‘Of course we have.’

All eight of the Agamemnons that were present laughed at him. It felt well, it felt such as it was, the mean-spiritedness that was theirs, and marked their pettiness and the way in which they acted.

But he looked on the lily-pad, of which rose-like substance and texture bore the sad. He had taken the sadness from it, claimed it as it own, but then he realized that because of it, he couldn’t get it on.

‘Oh, of vile depression, how may I deal with them?’

How might I save this village from destruction now that my incubation has been taken away from me as well?’

‘Take a hike.’

‘Leave then.’

‘It’s not as if you were doing us a favor, we didn’t even cherish human life that much.’

‘Piss off.’

And the last one was special, it felt likely that he would do such a thing as adhere to a reflection, or some ripple which saddened him. His vision thin but even more likely, never would he show a fealty that was unlikely.

He had been one of the tormentors of Mongol and seeing how likely he felt, he remembered him and felt somewhat nostalgic. There was something about that Mongol which he liked. Something extremely kindly put in sight. He was only trying his best, only to impress and least of would he caress his thoughts and never watch, not to mind his business after.

Weariness in the realm of the Violator

Fewer dreams like the machine that went. It wanted, as much as there was waste in the world, to desire so, to eat and strung about each piece, and destroy everything, drumming the turbine-bones into the moldering sides of the smoldering cones that fell upon its trashing. Little to its strength and power, shimmering through its mass of pyres, that it carried through, it smashed through bridge, building fell but missed the fiend. And as it came upon the stair it made, ancient buildings and of hole it found across the desolate planes, there were empty chasms, deep through with large saddened but forlorn bodies belonging to the giants set. Inside their strange or near cathedrals, or what the distraught buildings were, for even farther in the distance past the point where this so-called civilization were, there stood the empty cages on a side, many reformed and restored buildings as well as roads and servants which were long-abandoned and thrown, dead, but standing, only the metal having melted with no skin through. Hints inside the place bore thoughts of laceration going through and leaving everything to be even more deranged and messed about by touches that would not even slither but each hand that fell. Through and plenty more they asked to be destroyed but not out loud.

Forgetful there, of what seemed to be a single house of stone, apartments that were pieces together upon a fall. One of the shattering, most diluted metals appeared to spare none.

On a much father, darker none, of which sum amounted naught, there waited, spring a voice of metal that were still, upon the ilk.

Since there was so much to do, the Violator only started as fast as he could wrap his body around it. Not to be too marked off.

Yellow Headed Rider

Thence they spoke of him, watched upon by a giant servant of whose body was anchored to the peaks of air, on top a Lougger arched in despair, for he was naught else but the Yellow Rider, on top a horse, conjoined with him, abstraction. For what appeared to be, his every side and lack of arms and looks and charms mere strokes of bristle filled brushes, on top of cheap paper canvases. Put together, made of his, he rode through Tthrech and called on them, as if a whim made him do so.

Yellow Rider, Yellow Rider, standing on top of a crimson chair, a head of abstractedly cut yellow flowers, a neck of green scars, a body benignly twisted around it, but bearing on top of it, with no arms.

Of darkness around him, a single lane of many fields, of dark crowns and many roots that spread around his lost limbs.

A crown of twisted red, grown on top his horse n' bed, whose eye utmost benign could watch and prey upon them standing aside, much deformed and looking forth, from the side looked upon as if he was looked upon head on.

The top of his head rightly flat, the Yellow Rider had no sight, but guided by his mere will, destined to rule this world on a whim, he rode along, twisted around and lost the sound where none remained.

Servants of the rider came, as they could not fathom staying for too long in pain.

His horse must've been made out of bile, a remnant of the coagulated blood empire, from which all transfusion problems started. A phobia of blood enacted upon the Tthrechorous, of whose fears kept their wenches deeply sullen underneath their beds.

Morbid in his gaze, amazed by his servants who remained blow treacherous betrayers, stabbers in daylight, the morbidity of whom. Looked upon through a dark glass, in a room from which the Yellow Rider's portrait looked down upon him, there would be no end. To the uncomfortable appeal, to the fear and fright, delight in what was taken after that.

Incinerate the thought to think clear and banish all fear in that room. It can only be achieved so, the madness of which locks and flows and dreaded snow-tormented plows through he planted seeds. Of yellow pomegranates of many other hues of desperation, cast upon him, broken upon the direction that begged and yelled not to tell, the little plain maid who was there.

Entered upon from the door that led to the stairs that looked upon, upwardly, an inverted abyss. A lack of peace made her simper, as many bitter swollen sides.

'As many of whom we know.

A thin layer of glass snow.

May not hold the Yellow Rider back from entering our world through that.'

She was trampled as he entered, through, and none may stop him, as well as he could get himself as well as others, on cue. Entered his many marching perilous hordes, and neither of them understood, for better or worse, breathing unkindly when not asked for it, barely kept alive, his servants, the abstractions, disturbing to look at. As they were presented against the beauty of mankind, one could not look at them and understand from whence chaotic place they came out of. Nor the artist for what he's made. For what remained of his hands and the unsanitary plains he's pained.

All too innocent, naïve, made by simple strokes that left bristles from whence he came, as well as he remained in doubt. Never to have known what made him that way, or where to; directionless he went without plain. Emotionless gaze, one that spared no one of what went through them, as the Yellow Rider, he himself, belittled emotion, and was benign. He meant nothing, as he was no beauty of force. His realm was obscurely misunderstood and only brought the meaninglessness that was his of old.

And why would they scream? Who would seem ever more plain in heads, and tails of which colors only drew away from the rats deformed. Resembling tiny four-surfaces that made a single pointer with a hollow point in the back, from whence the tail came out of. Drawing them back, to the confusion, this land was now under the illusion of abstraction. No details were present there and no possible reaction could be noted off.

‘There’s a rat running around the room, and he looks like he’s wearing a giant cockroach suit, drench in something yellow. I think it’s honey, Almbert, Almbert wake up.

There’s a honey cockroach-rat inside our house.’

It was on the wall. It appeared out of nowhere, it was eating a part of the lamp. Its bloody body was coming off, it allowed for a few skin-flakes to fall off and fly around the air. And it spread its eggs that way, everywhere around. There was no way to control it.

This happened too fast. Her man woke up and grabbed one of the rifles from his gun cabinet. It must’ve been an old carbine that wasn’t working, hence he took the luger, an old one which had a long shaft that was as long as the carbine. And it had eight triggers but the man was deformed and had eight hands coming from the same hole that was attached to the trunk, from the inside of which they came out. In some way his body was a shell and his arms were a few snakes. And he loaded eighteen bullets in, then he started shooting randomly around the house.

By accident he killed his wife. He shot her in the head. It was an overkill that blew her scalp right off with a part of her spine and a quarter-inch of the floor. He almost destroyed the structural pillar that kept the house from falling in.

‘It’s all right, my dear.’

Almbert thought, before he resumed hunting around his house. He had to be thorough with it while making sure that he wasn’t dropping off without a reason to set forth. It was hardly his choice, but his mind was starved for the thing which made kings of men inside their homes.

The least of all, he thought, no more tasting nickels. But that was not enough to satiate the thing. His shot had opened up a hole from which many of them came out of. Like a rancid puff, a slight hint of that came after.

Seeing how he was going to be overrun in a matter of seconds, he turned the luger on himself, put it against his ear and blew, seeing a small blow to the side from where one of the rat-cockroaches came out of; there being no blood but honey. His head was a hive, thenceforth he could not die. Weak legs pushed him on, seeing the eggs for what they were, his legs. Everywhere, his legs were fat and moving, fingers retracted, all around the walls stuck. Tied in and glued back, they appeared to be on the floor, inside of, his clenched jaw and in the Moor he kept around.

His Moor slave finally arrived to the scene. He had his leg strung vertically out of his chest. He didn’t scream but he felt the pain growing and pushing out of him, being unable to struggle any longer. He ate a piece of it as well, since, as all Moors were, he was a cannibal.

‘Oh, did I forget to mention this?’

He had a curved rapier he pulled from beneath his sleeve, which was compressed in a flat position the same way a switch blade saw. With the exception that the hilt was his palm, though the palm had his face on it as well as every teeth fashioned in every direction, carved to look like tiny totems that looked like him as well.

And each tooth in part faction the direction in which the blade pushed and writhed in. From each side of it, his bloody stars that were crushed inside were only tasting the blood-pearls that went through the small veins that had been his many neck-throngs. Through them he saw the strangled, lynched and suffocated tiny cockroach-rat he had killed, wrapped around their throats, they never stood a chance against the man to begin with.

Soon he finally undressed the rapier, which twisted in as much as to have itself a semi-circle which united with the vein inside the Moor's arm. It grabbed and held, then as he approached him, Almbert finally started looking around.

He turned the luger on the Moor and shot. Click, click, without a sound; the barrel was empty and he didn't know about it now. There wasn't much time to do something about it. The entire room was being filled. His wife was being their dinner, he didn't understand what to do. So confused, so confused, where was the kitchen's knife, where was the bolted piece of the roof he promised to fix so he could at least defend himself?

My wife took it out and placed it near the shed. The bullets were wide-spread. Moor, moor, the moor was evil. He heard a song as he approached, two of them, they were taunting him, both the rats and the cockroaches, it was plain to see that he was seeing it in their eyes. He was going to be cut. Sweat ran across his face and eyes. Terror made the room appeared like grains. Hay tried pushing in his eyes and they were red, blood-shot. Everything was wrong.

'The man is strong, the man is strong, the man is strong, the man is strong.'

He started chanting. He didn't know, he didn't know what was going on and why he was being approached so sudden.

'Your old friend's sending you his regards.'

'But what have I done?'

He was just about a few buildings away from where he lived and where he performed his experiments.

Finally a few bullets, somewhere, but the gun was too long. He ran, but found the only door inside the house stuck, closed, unable to open it, his eyes turned around. It was all too much.

The carbine, fix it, fix it you fool. Lock yourself inside the room. Don't say a thing, beg if you have to. You'll be caught if you don't.

He did so but the Moor approached, grinning from every side. Oh god, he was so disgusting-looking and he came too near, sharpening that blade around his hands.

A clap on the door, he closed himself in the room and stopped breathing for a few seconds, trying to think of a way through. A knock followed.

'I'm coming in. I'm going to cut you.

You will bleed to death when I'm done with you, do hear me?

I'm going to skin you alive, then chop your limbs off and eat them just as I did with the rest of them, hive.'

But he was not actually the Yellow Rider. In actuality he was the Yellow-headed Rider because only his head was yellow.

Indeed, the Yellow Headed Rider trampled everything in its path. As delusional as it sounded, some of the buildings wailed and shouted and they almost convulsed upon one another as the Isles beckoned for his charge to stop.

But inside the room, searching.

The man couldn't help it, there was the carbine on the floor, nudged and locked, its shaft blocked and he was there, he was trying to get in.

The Moor started twisting the knob from the inside. His blade pushed through and had already left a scar from the side of the door. Slowly he was cutting every side which rounded itself around the knob. Desperate to do something about it, he almost dropped a joint-ball off his knee. He entered the door and finally, he found a marble.

His kid once played around his gun-bait. Or his gun-cabinet, he wasn't sure of it any longer and with the lock busted, a part of the floor fell.

SO had the bed, coming right through as it left a dark hole that lead into the chasm beneath him. Slug by slug, he loaded it on.

Dark

The great Conclovince of Mithrithnogg lay in shambles as its vast recesses are but lain across the vast outspread reached of the domed-lost citadels of Pyn, falling over themselves as the mere hand of Pena'Gnath had reached the first age of destruction before its remnants lay outspread, being long lost and abandoned past the reaches of the Dark globule in the age of winter-blood.

A man's stump but fit the cinder, much to his person he was distraught for no other reason than him being there. He was unheard off, for more than a morose reason, his heart being somewhat grim, and lost to words.

Upon the lost shadow of the briar-things, from the branches where the dead-crow rings began wriggling around the house, there rose but a single speck atop the soil-mount. He looked upon the grave with little more than to this mind, he asked and whispered to it now.

'I've seen you rise before, there's no need for you to hide any longer. I will not tell of what has come to bore.'

From the large fall, upon the last whisper he'd heard in a while came the last beat of his heart. It rose out of the grave in the most unnatural hill that would but heave out of the way. Just as soon as he could remember the first steps taken underneath the light, he'd seen the moon wallow under the very soil he's walked on.

'It boils my blood to walk again, where have you taken me?'

One of the eight corpses came out the pit he'd dug. The coffin no longer sunken, standing in the coffin-carrier, surrounded by a sea of flight-machines, during one of the most hardened of days, where the sky was but a speck of black, thorn apart by the blackness of the rifts inside the air that followed just as soon after. The deformation already having began, the little obscurities following just as soon.

Alas as soon as the swoon was clear, the corpse got a good look behind him. It was as if he was carried in an ancient couch, with the driver in the front but swaying for a second more before he could have his hands grab what he could. It was an exemplary display of might just how steel governed their sights, yet they called them Flat-beggars, standing on the side, dark robes but dragging them behind, gray sand on their feet, pushed aside one of the tallest demolished junk-pillions that were entranced with the power baubles that formed within. It was a show of lights which drew away from the gallows. Where steel met the marches, they but lynched the people and shoved them into the shallowest of reaches, towards the only place they would be led.

'You're Handrag, aren't you?'

'Quite perceptive, I'd say, though I didn't expect you to recognize me, seeing how I covered my face.'

Him but much exposed, from behind but curtains blue, with little more than no shade to have withdrawn from where he stood. He was belittled by no more and none other than the presence of the corpse. He wasn't dead, no, not yet at least, but he had taken a liking to pretending. He's done a lot more than that in the few hours he's been thrown around.

There was a party waiting for them near one of the depressed concave-pressed hollows.

BT- The pupae-buildings are shaking. Little shades emerging from inside of them, creeping out. Flakes falling off them, yet in the heart of the land nothing could be heard.

‘Stop, you shouldn’t search him.’

The party went away; he looked at the man.

‘You may not be finely dressed like everyone else, yet, I’ve come to the realization of something. I’m not going to force you to leave that spot you’re in.’

‘Why?’

‘I, it struck me. It struck me just now, you’re the only thing with a soul here. Everything looks so bland, it’s set in stone. The architecture is polished, somewhat, close to perfection, yet far from it.

Bland-perfect, and the sharp spikes and the hive-hives, they’re but. Too clean, even your tombstone and the other corpses; even this car we’re in.

All but you; you perilous thing; and it saddens me, that I’ve been so focused on all this creation, on tracking you down thinking you’re some petty thing that I failed to look at you, even for a moment. In your pettiness, in your ugliness, in this deceit of form you’ve become, this crudeness of yours, even if it’s two feet below the ground, you cheat, you peculiar thing.

You’re the only think that made me realize this vacuum of a city is but a playground for children, nothing more; nothing beyond that.

We have to get you out of it, at any cost, before you’re changed.’

‘Close to it, degenerating, the body is degenerating at a rate that’s getting closer to failure. And failure cannot be disposed off entirely, it’s been long since we considered it.’

First of the lore-carts was stopped. There were pliant-books and various obscure architectural-word shapes that appeared to contort the city’s entire, if not nigh-entire history in one thing.

Twenty more of them were present by the mid-day, always but coming around the trenches, always moving, they had to keep going. The buildings laughed at them, seeing how both had but little to nothing in turn.

Mercury and Joint were but crossed together on their way, forth.

Who might forget of reminder of flit, and what little of it, and let alone to seethe, there was no wonder, what just came after, there was just as little, and no more after.

A little speck of a man.

It appeared out of nowhere, he was dressed in white and looked alive, or so he seemed at various hours.

‘The bearer of evil cannot fashion himself no longer out of scum, he’s done what he’s done, his halls are filled and I can see none the better, I am.

I am so confused, I’ve never been as confused as I’ve been now and I do not know what to do.

I look at papers and I cannot understand what’s going on.

It’s as if they’re there but they’re not.

Where am I?’

‘What is to be done about you in that case? You cannot track anything any longer, you’re but made to roam around wherever you’re made to go.’

‘It’s senseless but I cannot help you, I’m to leave you to your doom in that case.’

There was definitely no possible way one could see it, since the disappearance could only occur on mark. They stalked each other’s long bile marking which came out of.

‘Does it matter what you’re after?’

‘I don’t know.’

‘We’ve both missed the mark.’ Poutrattle but moved ahead. He’d been trying himself.’

Lo and there it happened. It’s as if a huge stone had been lifted from on top his soul. From that point on, only one thing could dictate his fallen heart, that is to say, only time could tell of what came after as well as he could not but falter at the vein words that flowed through.

Whom could force to shatter the bonds, reality was but curved around and made of things, wingless protrusions, dark within, as came the hour when they walked on the dark webs, through lights of red and many others that followed as well, through cancerous gangrene remains and others that followed through as well. There was terror and such likes, there were forgetful things that followed through as they came back to them, as deep-sinew.

Dark generators making for the mad wails, what followed after were unnatural grains made out of the fighter shuttles.

Who would step for it and ask for more? And whom to wager in anger, and of what followed after, so much so?

One of the most wretched things appeared to be, whatever agony that’s been inflicted upon it, nothing could endure to be set, nothing would wager whatever was left to it.

‘Who shall lay here in that case and whom shall open the bowels of the earth as to communicate with it when time may be?’

Questions were asked but thrown around, incapable as they were, they appeared.

‘Eleven dark men passed through this adorned city, once. I’m afraid that there’s something you haven’t told us.’

Enclave and Other

‘I am the great Albo’D Boat, I am a great merchant of hope. And it’s free.’

‘Then how come no one’s buying?’

‘Well, this is simple enough, look around you and you shall understand, I think, or at least for a while.’

He wondered at that.

Seeing how they were below, one of the houses that were underneath the main city, below the Enclave. On their left, there was that distant toweresque standing figure which bore the way into the upper reaches of the floor where one assassin had gone and come around.

A stairway leading up, a locked door, a room from which he went up, though this could not be seen from this angle. It was still a cozily depraved chamber though. It was even harder to get through to them.

‘And why do you suppose no one’s buying hope?’

Somewhere there lay that strange, perilous tall-house, where, inside the main door, through it, there lay a pit, where men-beasts are being starved below.

But of which dark knowledge, the uncanny verse which might defile all, one might not even come to dwell upon each passage of bitter throng. For what reason would this be.

There lay peril in thinking of it, or daring to say, for this was a place where the Centurion had lain and went along, and walked once during ancient times, though many buildings were.

Outside:

Slekkedur was but going around, farther than the bottom depths. There was some friction in the skin animal pouch he was carrying on him since there was no reason within him to make it as he went along. Ruffian-scoundrels, evil sounds pushed and made everything going.

‘I shall cut your finger, thence I shall make sure you’re done for, lend onto me everything you have.’

‘But who are you, little tiny-dark creature and what’s there on about you that might threaten me?’

‘I am a killer of hope, taker of life, slayer-unfathomable and I shall have your sight unless you stop bothering me.’

‘Better be weary of it all before it starts knocking down again before the chance starts going on again.’

And before he had the chance to open his mouth again, he lunged and slit his chest open.

Farther away.

Although it was perilous to get through, and with as much as it would be allowed, what walked forth was but a strange thing that came about him. Long-squared meat-rascal, shaped like an explosion that had stopped growing upon forming a box, of which back looked like the cast of a large diving soldier wearing an old deep-diving suit, with all his shattered open-helmet contortions providing holes from which its limbs to come. And large neck that were curved like the waves, would not, if anything curved back and throw about the heads that could never look straight, but staring, desperately in search, dragging itself as a morose laughter-cry emerged with hope that it might find a way, to push itself and cry, out of the way and leap on-over. And try itself and eat the filth off the road. For its own sake, the creature but reached into one of the nearest houses and grabbed and heaved, it pushed uncannily so, until the last of the inhabitants gave their lives to enter the throng in which it waited with the waste. As it so happened for it to eat from them, as if it were a crib or a cradle, thence it pulled them out, the father, in shambled.

‘What have you done to my children?’

‘Ah-ur, Ah-ha-ha-ha, Ahnda.’

And from the forking square, from the box of despair, there came a long leap into the air, right before long, the creature leaped about and ended up stomping the man repeatedly, without even daring to taste him in wrath. After that, it started only drinking and sipping after a while, spitting what it could, uncanny. A tall child came out of nowhere, tall as in the quarter of a mountain-pass, and thin as he could come about, as sheet-wrapped tendons barely allowed this inhumane creature to barely stand. Passed around in the worst possible ways, this inhumane almost made as worse of sounds as the thing that stood about it, trying to get, if anything, at it, for those, of worthless, calloused, looking daft, he wanted to behave, but wrapped about, the creature sprouted some curtained-wings.

He didn’t say a thing, uncannily so, after all, he was, if anything a despot for mirage, he saw only features everywhere, the kid was mad.

Once wrapped into the curtains, the child was adopted.

Despite the fumigating mouth of blood, filled with the entrails of a daughter in the father’s stomped, there was this uncomfortable emotion that made him appear, ever-so drawn near to it.

‘I need a claim, that it may be so, but who might you be?’

‘Your step-father, made in through.’

Thence the pseudo wrappers started covering him up, in the same way a righteous broad would suddenly ordain a mind, although uncanny and better be called off, there was nothing even better to be added. All too damned and pushed about.

Though the child, merely a young man now, was not a culprit whose hands were white, he had been a culprit who had his was and sodomized, plenty a children before slitting them off, pushing them around, humanity in doubt. For he had shown so many traits, that would be uncanny if they were taken for what they were, much worse and even so, it could not be account, never to be taken or pushed through the disease which inflicted his mind, in an utmost benign manner.

‘I shall kill some ants one day of decay when I shall bash their remains and push them away.’

One of eights and always wonder, he wasn’t growing stronger, nor could he control himself any longer since he desire to bash forth, and claim something of his own from what was going. It was all too convenient that people were in doubt.

‘My daughter, please, my daughter, have my daughter but anything, don’t make me be destroyed uncanny. I wish only to live.’

And there was a reason to set through, and they were, if anything beaten and made to suffer, and pushed around into the first sand-castle made of steel, bashed around, he sought to feel. Anything would make it so, he could be beaten, if anything went right. He sought himself to be pushed around and eat a piece of himself, there.

‘I will look for a reason to walk.

As far away as I can, in doubt.’

Before and plunder, of bodies wrongfully acclaimed and pushed in wrong diseased reigns, this unfathomable hole, which was no village but the end curb of some distant off-shot in the plains. Floor as yellow as hay, some houses here and there, an old tower-broken here, and there, past the watch and a wall that had been shattered by time. Silver-stones and many bricks, all lain back and pushed around, in peace. There were clouds that had been lost and weird things about everything. Like the fingers of a man whose entered the first wall, and entered a tent of spikes and ate many knives in order to avoid being battered as that thing came.

And although it had been strange, the weird tail which wreathed, as the cast shown it as well, wore the hands of man, primate-stretched. It was senseless for there to be grates but no man out there would know what a deep-diver looked like, as he downed as well. And even the meat which pushed through the vintage gaps, through those empty shattered holes about could not help it but feel pain. Moving through it, bone-cartilage plainly beaten and distraught as well, oh, that did explain, why the constant pain and the way in which it would remain, as to cry and never move from it, as to feel the pain, desperately so.

And the upper region, from the box, from which the heads had been, distraught, only took away from the limbless stance, the curved necks were diseased, and they did not like being forced to turn their backs in order to see. Or how at times those curtains came out of them, like the after-skin of snakes, bloated, then fell away, diseases, misspoken.

It wanted and had dreamed of flight, or to hide inside a giant creature and set aside, whatever it had done in past. Destroying what it could before leaping in sight. There were two of them, at least as many, men of glory, had surrounded.

Pitchforks were dropped and instead they grabbed rocks, throwing them as savages.

‘Young man, of young worth, get away from it or you shall come to be claimed as well as we shall do you harm, forth.’

‘I am a child of the lost, despair reeks about my soul, I claim it so, leave me be and I shall not think of it.’

Then they simply let him stay and face it, rocks fell and bashed him, as he berated himself with such pain as no man should endure. Not one like him, pushed through, and rather, would he have anything else, other than to be bashed.

And upon a claim, and rocks unmet, once he had, if anything to get, thrown aside and pushed through. Left to stand there and be put through. Nothing would fare worse than the hare-side which followed in doubt. Whose strange-look pushed about, they were not ready and shouted back.

‘He’s leaving, we’ve done it men, we’ve driven the beast way, we’ve driven her to walk, and sought about and pushed in.’

As much as they could help it, so, there was no pointless and pushed through. A leverage of blood was given though, which was to be given and missed, and passed through neck.

‘I’ve seen him about, before.

The creature has only moved, as you should know, as it ought to be called, as it’s settled about, in droves and many flocks and many herds as well. They’re always going together, always claimed and pushed about.’

There was the sun, it came about. Texture-like in gore looking, but blue as there was only a blue sight, a globe of ultramarine with a magenta eye that had an pink-white aurora around it, unfathomably made out of white boils and small patches of moon-like forms that had grown on it. And there were other flying rings that entered it, almost bereaving as they entered in vain. Pushing through and cutting the edges out of the finger-like long extensions of which width and stretch made them look like the dead unfathomable strangers that were wrapped around them. Many a while it took for them to breed and inflate their bodies inside as they planted their celestial children in. Looked down upon the planet, the Ultramarine sun looked as if it bore hairs.

Sweat ran through them, making it seem like it was finally time to rain. Though there were other mouths which were attached to square-like two dimensional eighteen edged star-like flat regions were mouths were rounded and put in groups of three. Flat stars of a blended green-blue of which mouths were moreover pinkish-yet dark, tawny-like.

There was one of which growth would not stop, his head was but bile would to be cut sparingly before being abandoned, made to be brought and sacrificed in the forest where he could be brought to the justice. Whichever the reason for that might be, there was a gluttony of filth-disease.

‘I see.

So you want me to believe that rubbing this on top of my forehead will somehow make my skin emerge, would that be se?’

The Flayed-Burnt-Melted Man Fayent spoke. He rose from the sea and threw a few coins.

‘There, have it, whatever might do to serve me, so shall it be. I do not care any longer, for what is worth, I wish to settle with something that might help me fix what’s making me.’

‘Worse, your condition is only worsened, from the looks of it.’

‘I know, ever since that fiend, that mongrel of skin the square came through, I thought I would’ve lost my life but for.’

‘No need, I know exactly what you’re talking about, here, have it.’

‘But now that I think of it, I don’t know how he’s done it.

It’s as if his mere presence here.’

‘Sir, what did that man tell you?’

‘He told me of some cure, that’s all and only asked for so little in return.’

‘I don’t think you’re well.’

‘I know, but it was that creature that caused it.’

‘No, it’s gone. Though a trail of destruction lay before it, that’s all, nothing to see, some men lay crippled but no fire. I’m inclined to think that the little man had done something to you in order for this to work.’

‘But I’m still skinned alive and dying, burnt as the likes of which I’ve never known.’

‘A vulture, nothing more, he must’ve seen the creature come in town and right about the time it left.’

‘Aroused or not, it pushed ahead and got lost, that’s all, no need to wonder or say otherwise. I’m afraid that we can only put you out of it.’

Misery came a long way, it stopped right before the man could convey any kind of emotion that might make him shout, and scream about the place and grin. He felt so much in so little a time and could only feel his body light, getting lighter, so much lighter, unable to see the freighter that had pushed away. His heart was something that had given through. But now that it was left, the beast would feel itself, sinew.

It followed on a trail of many a tear, which would drown and plant itself inside the ground. Growing and spreading, roots of glass, melting unevenly as they would leap about, some flower of plump disease, a reprise uncannily pushed and pleased by the acts of cones. Many of which shone with dark lights of segmented yellow, which contrasted in a night of blue.

There, when stars went missing, a chrysalis of sinew. It would fly and it would be settled, like some kind of reminiscence of some kettle. But it was long lost, at the cost of which, evil pushed through, alive.

It was presently hiding below each part, of each forest-shroud the uncanny blind men stared. They appeared out there and bore tunnels that lead not at the back of their heads but in their guts, right from their cavities, leading inside, until they had become somewhat unpleasant to look at. Too thorough, they took turns and checked the burnt ground. Taking what they plowed, being nothing more than some uncanny row of strange malign, ever within and ever closer as if they were but pushed through and drank from. And they had settled on the mark, trying to out-do one another as they hurt each other, putting themselves down. The drought came before long and inside their meaty holes, long serpentine forms made out of their innards came out in search for food and some kind of sustenance they needed themselves. Whom else might look for them and fiercely follow?

A trout was in the air, soon to follow, set in flight. It dreamed of darker days but it could not, for its own sake understand on what it had been drunk, tomorrow.

Indeed, tomorrow was the day when they cut, little patched of bloody-skin, replacing them with anchor-filth, so full of themselves, they were.

Always look at, always but peered on. They could but control themselves if one but asked.'

That dysfunctional creature rose, it poked everything it could before it lost whatever thing there lay to hope. Its body lay, barely out, wreathing as if was closely emerging, barely put in the strange fetal position it stood about and wasted so. From its depths, where there lay, but single bottlenecks, there were things that could but lay yonder. It began in front of their eyes, they could not help it but try taking bites at it.

'Too winded for your own sake, I see, I see. You wanted to but to take a bite, and pull through straws but meat about the throat and gulp it. You're but a man denoted to eat and become, something of a glutton and something of a boar.'

He was fat and getting stronger, as he became but a filthy bother, all too listened, put through a grinder. Back then, it was just so. Eat their feet and you'll become it. And you shall do as you please and become a part of it, the shade of willows, and flying butcher's gloves. You could be set in flight.

'That man came out of nowhere, lay under siege.'

As he rose, yet none froze, for they were but in the plains but sitting.

He had walked, gloves about, all but pierced through, calling, and a moon, better swoon, and a face, on each face, where they touched him.

They had missed the chance to live in there. And what remained of the kingdom was but a tiny flare, a spark of its former self. Brought and thrown around as if better inclined into a seeing grown, upon. No shouting, of little worth, it could be known, everything else could be thrown around as if they would have it, set in stone, and wreathing, everything taken apart.

'I am but Evrown Worm of lice.'

He came about and would bring but little thrice and here, but there, where? He could not say, not while they were at it, yet again to tell.

Long ago, in the distant country side, there lay. But a strange fellow without arms but a long neck formed out of a trunk which be taken out of the way. Would be as such as it was taken, never to be released from hold.

A few homes

Down the lane there was a stretch. Hours passed, and into a borough but a man-shaped bell, made out of fireflies, used to see and trade but what they found.

‘Twenty of these in exchange for your pearl.’

‘This for twenty leaves?’

You most certainly undervalue this, simply look at it, with this peal I can capture the sun and put it in a ball. Then, I could simply push it around and after that calculate the entire rotation of my fingers between the moon as it comes down and destroys everything I will it.’

‘Twenty one then.’

‘I will not take anything less than a puddle of potatoes, I need them, I want them, I am them.’

Undefeated as well, in word of plays, there he pulled but the means that might convey. Flashy colors, he had sparkles in bottles, lenses he might wear.

‘Have it, have it!’

Little Shed Wellrough said. He continued down the line. Now ailed as he walked outside, no wonder of what he was doing. Between the post and the first homes he stumbled on, there had been a single heart he thought about talking to. He froze just then, unable. The inhabitants were so peculiar, disabled. But drawn along by strange charts that were dragged on and would to become the catalysts for the thumb machine that wore four round pillars bashing the ground up and down as they carried through something in the air; there it was gone, a seagull was eaten. It chokes on the dusk-speck. It lose all the light inside its glimmer, and the face. The machine was not spoke off but every now and then, as if from the body of eight stoves put through and through, small through-fronts, large boxed, little legged but with a carried in the back coffin-shape seat, there stood but the bodies of the men in town as perfect as they would look.

First man stepped out. He greeted the man he talked about and spoken to. He was peculiar, meeting someone who seemed to be forced to stay.

‘This could be you, if only you abandoned the upper-shape.’

He spoke of his maliciously inclined, the body of a distorted man, benign. Which turned.

‘You’re not invited to this place, are you?’

‘He’s not welcome.’

An old figure said, whom wore but the robes as dark, turned around and covered around his head and yonder, he wailed and stood with everything pushed around, as he stood. But with a covered face, only his eyes could be seen but his face was carried in a puddle that was confined in a bowl of thunder-light that jumped around, strapped against his metal-chest, and grinded. As his gears became, they were bloated and out with it, below his chest. He revealed a most peculiar way to move. It looked like a puddle in which a man stood with his arm risen, constantly melting, for the treason was but his.

Wellrough came to him. The old figure approached.

‘What is the reason for this?’

He looked around and saw everything painted in gold, silver, green for plight and other uncanny colors which almost took his mind.

‘What do you mean? Can’t you see that we’re not forcing anyone to do something they wouldn’t do by their own free choice?’

I’d rather think, no, I know there’s nothing wrong with them. They chose these replacements I brought them.’

‘So why aren’t they pleased? They look, unhappy.’

‘Insignificant details, nothing more. Irrelevant, even, as you should know.

But just so we’re clear, since I’ve already glimpsed into your curiosity, I think.’

The many figures started surrounding him, now they looked like him. It was a fancy thing, but he was indisposed. He would rise if not he rose from it and simply ignore what went on there.

‘These appliances have taken a toll on their bodies, in some way. They cannot live without them, they cannot live with them, so, it’s only a matter of time until there won’t be any toll to be taken and they will have been claimed, for good riddance and for eternity. Shallowly-dead.’

‘You tricked them.’

‘As I have tricked you, my toy.’

Before he realized, with the stained-things he had traded, but the joy has been taken from his heart. He took away his visors as was given but a mirror after that.

‘You tricked me.’

‘Don’t be a child. You knew what you were doing there, I made it clear to you before as I have done it now.’

‘But you tricked me.’

‘Enough of him, you may apprehend the ingrate and move him to the side.’

He was bound to an apple tree and forced to lay, he watched them being taken and changed, one by one until every single one of them was wasted, and wasted away. Years passed, and eventually the old figure left the sight. Most had run out of fuel and stopped moving eventually dead. Some had tried making it past the shed, only to end being seen on the other side of the road, where they remained until they could not be seen. And that was their fate thereafter.

Taste of wood

There were things that could only be experienced once. And it was then, when one were met with the eyes of a child instead, he were to dream of it, in a fantasy that never ended.

Dead memories from a world that never existed.

There in trenches, made of men, many lumps had but formed their sights and were but largely benign as they placed they wrapped themselves around the gander. And they called upon the strength and lend upon it, but false maps ahead, upon which each man walked towards his doom. He was but a gloom of the head and would to walk again.

Depressed and drunk, eaten about on his way out by his old hound he had become. Wrapped inside a flying verge, upon which he plunged in order so he might return from where he was going.

‘Deviant, he’s getting off it. Cut this man’s throat and let him die off. He’s covered himself in syrup just so he might be eaten by his hound.

It’s clear we’re dealing with a madman.’

‘Then cut him then, who’s stopping you?’

‘I don’t know, perhaps that’s something we should both find out.

What do you wager’s in his belly?’

They put his down-down, dog-dead. Followed through and pinned him down, until he bled, then they opened his belly, look inside.

‘It’s a door.’

‘No. You’ve cut through him, the door is on the floor.’

‘Oh, right. That’s what I was walking to.’

‘Talking to.’

‘Rightly so. May I follow through then? I’m awfully indisposed as this hours and I cannot.’

‘Josephine’

Called to her, Nogren fading, fainting but a slight disease, his toes were cut but he, plain to see. Was but fashioning a lamp out of a wooden log he would carve the receipt. Paid to be and paid to see and to record but everything. I should hope neither of them forgets the uncanny and would to be the lesser and the many words I'm but to be paid by. I risked my life as well for them. He thought but would resort to nothing, as to tell them so.

It was fairly odd. Walking along down south nowadays, especially when on the country, there were so many things that did not sit right with but a man. Act before think, crushing fingers on a whim before they're looking. It's not likely anyone will find out. If you look away for long enough, no one will hear.

No one wants to hear it in any case, not the heart of it, where they stay. Two more off they went and they were but unable to understand what, whom where was the wrong-do.

Twenty men-a-bottle dying, twenty of them, always trying to go around, they could be heard, in the distance, seen in a most peculiar thing. Neither of them listened when they were called to stand. It was not a reminder that they were gone.

Down a loin

There were a lot of lays they stumbled on. The beauty of the hillside to be dreamed off, it were, where they walked and talked in peculiar strange tongues they were, but the bottom-bone, and the mass of a mule which only shone as it were ripped and put in place. The man with a face, approached. He had worn clothes, and was un-naked. He shone and wore fingers. He had a suit, and legs. He had two eyes and from the back of his hear there was a head condenser made out of eighteen melted hives he found about, where the hybridization between the living spatial-wasps had created a vacuum that drew on the magic that was in the sky, like little luffs, little puffs and little snuffs of blue that entered his eye. He was a happy man.

But then, one malignant bright day, there came an assassin, shown from under the pass. And he walked towards him and brought up, a what? If not a single large heart-contender, meat-cleaver that was pushed out of the snarl he carried around and would to throw black clouds upon since its innards were just as puffy and puddly as blue. He took the man's life, and fell. Stumbling down the insides of earth as well until he had been yore to ask for, in a land that was as spine-splashed as the torn out rocks were, everything put about the place. Until there was but one majesty relented about the place. That of certainty, someone had to die in the next hour there; not only had he survived the onslaught but he was met by a fashionable lavish floor and carpentry and neat to look out tapestry of blue charade and peculiar things that pumped around them, kept in check. Steam could be seen from distance and many chambers that were dragged through, streets uncanny moved and put as hue but encompassed them. They had a sun. And they had a moon and they were but living in seclusion since this town had been swallowed by the earth during an avalanche of flying stone-dirt sleeping touches that had grabbed them as well. Many earth-like hands could be seen to have lain their hands about. And they only adorned them and would celebrate the fact that, despite the vile world that was outside had allowed them to pass, they died. He realized that there had never been a thing to eat down there. Both of his legs were crippled and he could not even lift a finger either.

All this effort to have made the city automated gone to nothing. They were carrying corpses through troughs and most importantly, he had been abandoned there, then withdrew from life.

‘Damn that man, he had nothing on him.’

Nasty creature that he was, too greedily, way too greedily put to ask of it, but he looked down and saw what there had been. Coins, coins, many coins, of which was made everything, oh how much that petty little creature was caught by the sight; for what else to drag it below the earth but constructs made of little coins at that?’

‘Who speaks to coins in the midst of daylight when the touches of plains and when the cold but reigns and when they touch remaining by grasp of warm hands, as of fire with plain fingers of iron while grasping for air out of a shower beneath the spring, from dust taken by winds in the distance while the storms erupts, in a land of sand, through your forest taken and now here underneath a village taken by the earth?’

‘I do, but a mere cutthroat and I’m not forsaken by touch and I don’t feel ill for what I’ve done and I would not recede back into the hole and would not do it until I’m home.’

‘Well then, well, well, you shall accompany me and wash your mouth. Below you there’s just about anything but no coins, it’s but alamn, but ludicrous metal that looks like gold. And many had fallen for it down there and were taken, the lives off.’

Although he could but spare, another arrow, loaded, aimed out there, he hadn’t the slightest ill, the ailment to consider within. What might he do if he found him so, ever so dangerous as if to sow what he stole, claim his hand, take away his pains and make him still bedraggled as well? Whom might take pity on him after? He considered just the distance and this. Tall and but pointed not with lance but with a weird device, which had been attached, through his arm but on the side, two holders like to hilts out of his fore arm and arm, and beneath his fingers but metal string that entered his pins. Though it was as long as one, it looked like it could be shaped in any such prowess as to communicate. Of some days they told, what was pushed inside of him, he wreathed and sought. Through word no wonder. He was of mighty inclination after to tell.

‘Indeed, it says what it says. There have been many creatures which had bred with it and got pulled in just as they lay, near their deaths, offered to join it, in a reality inside, where they were but sought. Would to be bred inside, would to make children, but drearily die. And it swollen, I’m sworn. That I ought to gather more.’

‘You’re weird, but I will join you yet.’

‘Down with your crossboard-bow, at which the wideness ends and tables bloat where the chess-pieces hold your arrows.’

‘Fine, take it, claim it so.’

And as he threw it, largely defeated, it was not him but the horse which drew down to eat it. He but opened a mouth, but throat in route, and put himself through to vacuum in, through a single gulp, of shark-like depth and fins but teeth inside not out, instead, it swallowed a piece of the ground a swell. But covering for the breaking beneath them; that’s but how they dealt with it. Such pleasantries by the looks of it.’

‘Was that hard?’

‘Then I suppose that I’m to follow through?’

‘Only if you want to, but then again, I’m nor forcing you to stay, but to crumble lay away.’

And he almost dashed forward, having taken, much dismantled, with as little as it could take him, better after. He but asked, and watched, ran at last, to catch him so. The Horse had a second horse head beneath the tail but with enlarged eyes, gulping largely enlarged eyes, red eyes, big and contorted, flat even as if the entire skull was so. And there was only a half-a tail cut as not to hit its faces. And there was the mouth of a young man but always smiling. And he wore a small black-iron ringed shirt on the back of the horse as well as its black legs which had been severely burnt. His back was iron, the man was but built to pound the hearses. Hearsay after.

‘I’ve decided I will follow.’

‘You’re no squire but my victim, you’re my kidnappee, I claim you so if you come after and I will never let you go.’

‘Do you claim never to allow me leave?’

‘As it is.’

In middle-track he stopped, and only turned and look at eh.

‘You will take the place of the second horse.’

‘The second horse? Was there not a single head there?’

‘Don’t be silly now, there’s but one whole thing in it and more, you’re so humble as to trick me with your naivety, that I might be inclined to. Eat your head myself.’

‘Then I shall enter then, whatever fate I may meet if I return, without a weapon of my own might never even come close to what you might do to me.’

‘That’s is precisely what I claim to see, now enter thee.’

And there he entered, taking but the spot of the mouth, being eaten, largely inside, and they rode in the distance thereafter.

But lo’, what is that in the distance if not a disaster? What could there be? And whom to see and look upon such strange a walking lead of petty flowers, which grew upon what appeared to be a hell-fire which had been grown, on top of old-worn out talons that were spread, inside the hold of the cold-pip, and where they stood there was a well in a few homeless kids were fishing in.

He approached them.

‘Here stay, here stay, I call upon you weary children, I come upon your way.’

With a bow and one that would be so, he called himself Mouhlon Hawhak, and he were but an eye for these kinds of things, although he kept his horse back for some reason wouldn’t be.

‘Ah, you must be starving, won’t you come for diner and roof until the night comes?’

‘You would throw us out during the cold harsh plains when the sun bellows somewhere else?’

‘Wait, where are you going to house us, mister?’

But he did not look upon the child’s eyes.

To be certain, or precise, the way in which he had been eaten, the assassin would be inclined to say that the far end which had swallowed him so all of the sudden extended as if to be the entrance to a great cavern pushing about the size of his entire body or that of two buffaloes taken from a herd, enough to have enough space to look around. While seeing the one in front of him so; it was mightily peculiar being in there, lost, although he hadn’t a mouth since the lower side of his face was after all claimed and put two and two a piece to the other horse whom he realized to be nothing but the only thing holding it closed. A finger-fat put in. And that was all one needed to know on a whim; bastardly said in any case.

Mouhlon invited the children, whom were, not precisely on with the idea of riding on his horse. Whom stood flat on the side and looked but like a cut-out. Weirdly so, to be precise, its head and neck would turn as if they were glued to its shoulder not attached to its chest. It was a horribly mangled vertebrate after all.

That much put on aside.

‘You married one another?’

He but stood there in shock. After all there were two young girls and two young boys whom had settled to repopulate the broken town since life had ended but with them.

‘That way, we could take our parent’s place and make it so no one has to suffer again, never. And we will be happy, forever after.’

‘I don’t understand.’

‘You will protect us from now us, won’t you?’

After all, you offered to house our dear family for day. What if we employ you for the rest of it, then you could be on your way.’

‘Until the other day, of course, then you will return and guide our hands.’

‘I think you’ve all lost your minds, having witnessed such a great fire, there could be no other explanation for what’s been happening here.’

‘Of course there could not be, but you are wrong, after all, it is not us, but you, who’s mad.’

‘Punish be thy lords whom had died before your time had come. I beseech you to stop this impudence and march upon front and become my kidnapper as I take you yonder to my hidden hold.

Know that I shall not suffer you to go any other place than where I call upon you to walk. Know that I shall suffer no insolence whatsoever just because you belong to the kind of a child and no less than it should be fathomed, I shall not allow you to walk over and cherish whatever piece of land is left.

I call upon you no less now that you may surrender and confess what you’ve done, children, so I may judge you so. And I will take no pity whatsoever as I have never taken upon no man, as I shall treat you as such from this point of if such is your desires. And if your desires far outdo that of mine, then I shall allow you to set aside whichever impudence there is in your act, until I will have forgotten I was ever here to begin with.

You must know that you are undertaking a grand task upon you, that which might turn your kind into that of beasts. Know that your way lays in peril for you are dancing upon a grave of your grandfather and grand grandfathers as well with such mischievous ways as to fill the gap that is not yore.

At most, I seek to escort you upon the nearest town, as I may not give you the same treatment as I would to give a little petty dark thing as I have had. For I am not one to serve in such likes as my servitude calls upon me, upon which I shall dread to no end if I were to find out you were claim.

And know that I have said just so that I may banish you from my home during night instead of stay just so you may ordain some kind of common sense that might finally wash away whatever senselessness has come upon your way.

With that alone said, I furthermore await your answer with some hope that you may be restored, to a normal life in a normal home upon farther away plains that are not to be haunted by the char of death which shall remind you for every second of your existence and that of your children of your failure to get through. Therefore it is my task to claim you by force children and lay my arms no longer upon such fealty as to be missed. I will not wait any longer, for I have already wrapped the four of you with hardened rope and will not let go and will not allow you to speak until we’re there.’

Therefore and from that point on, it was only settled that they would be given or lend upon the nearest plight, of a city. Of a little town, a village that may be accustomed to be picked upon and laid to every side and be put upon, as every house that was fashioned there was of such beauty as one could not endear. To look upon it without fear, one could only taint to be, to have himself blinded and meditate upon the agony men ought to have went through, past recedes in past and whichever reason might it be claimed upon, so be it.

And they were sickened by one another, see through past. And when to last and what to ask there. And when it happened, and whence, to be called.

‘Ah, I see, ah I remember this land, oh children you may be so.’

They stood near him, side by side, albeit uncomfortably so, by the means of which they may not be able, by any means whatsoever to rise from their tiresome spots and better not to disturb any kind of mindedness the city called.

For they were greeted by monks whom had received them during their reveries; ever present as such songs as their likes to never have been called for, when it doubt, for their hearts were not that of insects and their minds were but the most uncanny, insignificant destroyed, point of much joy and worthlessness such as the likes of their faith could ever endure. As such they put laurels on the mule, and they put laurels on the boys and laurels on the girls, whom were called upon their findings, as men and women yet in named.

‘Is that what they call themselves?’

Asked one of the monks who was in doubt; as he could not understand how could such a vein creature make it so they were of a mind. Of their own wrong doings, of their own wont, he told them. Although none of the monks made it around to have it be revealed. And neither of them monk could see the appeal of such a fortress in a mule size, where he hid but cities and the likes of men his horse had but swallowed during evil tides. And though he was no good man, he was peculiar and would not speak of it. But they were nothing like it either. They were peculiar as well. Brown robes only masked no legs and no other organs but the fat, which was only as to serve as a sign divine for their consumption. Of their ailment little was known as well as it could be said about, to have been thrown away, they said of it.

‘Lend upon us their lives the, we must wait for your acceptance, first, so we might raise a chapel, so we may have it abandoned for forty days and nights until the forfeit comes. And until then we shall not make it so, until we’re called upon to answer.

And tell us dear man, what had made you stumble upon them.

Why have you done what you claim to have done in order to drag them here where it would appear we’re not blessed souls ourselves?

For we can know and we can only hope you could look into yourself, yore to see. There’s something in your soul speaking, your impudence unlighted, a hope that’s been contorted and would have it so abandoned. You are but a man we have nothing to look into when searched for, a saint would have it.

You have done harm to others and lain waste wherever you went, is that not so?’

‘I have, and you are as such, to claim that I’m of such nature, of which I’ve never denied. Not in the first place, nor would I have called upon no man to put me into chains as I am wrought about uncanny thing. I may not be a saint as such, a man of peril whom had cast, upon every chain and upon every man who faces me so, upon every perilous thing a glance, but flee. When had it me so, that my life would be claimed, I would’ve done it again.

But I have not come here in flight either and I feel no kind of shame from which I may be able to bear my lay and get away at a time as such. I’ve come to bring about but lost children, on my way out. For I have long since made my peace, never to have known paradise. And I shall lay inside my horse when time called upon me and I shall make it so, it so devours itself as we lay waste upon our home, upon everything we brought and upon the lives we claimed in there.

There shall be no one left after of my kin to share and all what I have been shall be set to waste, as one who lived such a treacherous life shall have it.'

'Then do you, sir, by all means and by all possible approaches subdue your will for, ever to be so called upon and even near until it's clear that the place from which it comes out of, comes from nowhere near but the bottom of your very soul? Where there's a chasm as well as there lays a claim upon our very own as there is but a reflection we're seeing every time we look upon you as well?

And do you, sir, by any mean claim that we should do such things as to enact some kind of antiphony, or destruction upon both claims and upon the children you've slain upon bringing them forth as for us to keep them captive during their passage in the afterlife?'

'But what does thou mean by that? I have not claimed a child's life, my arms and my hands are but of steel wrought such as a like to have become yarn upon touching such a soul. And of my lack of soul, which may be fallen, although to be pushed away, of which I have long said and admit, and of my wit as well, could not have blinded me on my way here, for I can say by every possible mean that I have not taken their lives there.'

'Yet you have done so by bringing them here, upon a land that's claimed, by which remains, by which were taken, and then again. To men of vileness, to us in kindness only to have found it so, they were not to be touched or lay upon this home. And for that reason we beseech of you that you may let us wreath them in the ground underneath the chapel, where they might pass through on their way out and might bless us so we may not be forgotten.

As we were good men once, such as the likes of yore must've been. But there's no reason to look after in any other case, for we have known you'd be so since. We've but tried and tried and would have your kind but be put to some kind of test as to remind ourselves.

For not a single man would travel far. And neither one would serve them as to call upon children's plays, of which there's but one thing that remains.

Must you know so, in which case I shall tell thee. Their souls had but matured in such a short time as to say. Although they would've been claimed as to succumb to such agonies of flesh as the likes of which man should never come upon, you shall but convey one thing, in our sayings.

Know that, although you may not have spared their lives, you have spared their souls from succumbing to such likings as to have bound their mortals souls to such deaths as such, not man ought to have looked down upon, for what they have become. As it would be, nothing unrecognizable from what you see.'

For long he tore but a piece of his robe, showing but the man a sight that was uncanny. A flat blob that had tainted the very ground it stooped above and yonder, where it spread and where it lay, and where it could go, out of its way, to put itself around and wrapped. Vicious amounts of fat, always put on top and wasting, as to cast upon themselves, therefore such casts as such one could never ever come to fathom. As to fasten their likes as if they had been ridden through. Put, through and through until they will have come but so overcome by their morbidity that they would face no better end but to feed the starving with their bodies, instead.

He had looked the other way and kept riding, seething yonder, only to be spoken as such.

‘There in the distance, stranger, know before you leave.’

‘I give you my blessings that you may build from their likes, whatever soul there may be left to save, you may have it, after that. Do as you please and don’t call upon me to be pleased.’

‘But wait, oh wait, you martyr, of which death cannot even be held, or be held for conquest, so.

There in the distance, know as you are looking upon it, there’s but a pocket you should look after, as if to show, but beating as of hearts.

Far thee go towards the trail of smoke and yonder and search for the pocket of evil and the veils which take away its wonder.’

Thence he went only where the neiff of his horse had led him to. And would he doubt but the quill on his way as to revere. Of stars and might he looked upon the sky, distancing away, as he lay there, but brittle as to bone, foretold, he stood upon the foothold of a single rowing boat that’s fallen and looked upon it, he had claimed a hold. Calamity of man in there, pointedly away, and asking.

‘Lord, oh lord I see in prayer and wish though wilt upon me to drag. My legs are seen and to have been passed on.’

‘But what hast happened inside thy ship and who is in it?’

‘Not a single soul as though wilt it to check, but I confess that there’s but something waiting past the mast ahead, rip of shrouds and anchor down, there’s but little and no doubt. I cannot for the likes of me show you the way that might enable you to find a way out once your there.

Here I lay, looking upon my lord, thinking. I’m but ripped off and taken, my crew is mistaken, they left me to be staken to the highest bidder of yore. For that I may not look no longer and wilt to show you whose, may be the strongest hold. I’m but afraid that I’m caught but here at a lost, unable to find my dear daughter.’

‘And who is she and where hast she gone?’

‘Kidnapped, as one could see.’

At which hint, of much hindrance he had but bit his lip. He wasn’t any knight of kind but Guardian of the Horse, set so alike, to ask of, in which direction so he may followed. So he could be pointed towards it, the right direction that might be rue the shallow, and the hollowness that’s inside. Whatever there is but a single pint to move aside, he point and asked again.

‘There, my lord, she had been taken there, not through wood but hill-a plain, where the grass roots but become ill conveyed by the likes of the yellow line, where the light shines upon their embed dykes, past the hollows in the earth where they had taken her.

In the depths of the earth.'

'Where all seem to live, don't they?'

'There's no better way to hide.'

But he had made it so the man would not die, turning without notice as to take him. Made of plain he had but galloped away, through the hardness of a broken world and the wool of old which had appeared, the ship throats cleared as he could see, the dear one, the girl was there. She of all, largely aware of what had happened, in the cabin which was there, not in a pit, not den, but something of wood that was kept by a few trunks from falling into what appeared to be black-burnt mass, that was nothing near what the man had told of him. No wonder, for he had but been taken by surprise, to see that the crew was there waiting him. Surrounded and of evil ways, he had but ripped off the throat of the legs and used it as one should lay; his arms put aside, they were set in fright by the likes of the demise he's shown. Of bloody rows they were beaten until they froze and were put down, one by one all set in fright by the mere countenance the horse had shown while still being alive. And yapping as it would do best, to attach itself to whichever piece, nowhere near a place to rest. Whatever it had so desired would just put it in the right spore, of which hold, the rabid thing that was kept on fell. Many men inside had waited as well, all upon broken home. Many planks were taken but not as a means to harm him so. But he grabbed the first hand and would have his throat, the horse head but breathing in. Slimly on his cheek, the moisture.

'Tell me of what yore have you come here to kidnap and to destroy and bequest the soul of a wicked man a like on his way to turn the ties of vileness that pushed on? I see the trail of smoke the calling and may not feel the slight inclination to spare. For the life of a single admiral might come upon me, unwanted, if I were to spare you.'

'But I cannot do such a thing, oh, master, tell you why we've come to play. We've taken our ship out of the sea and have carried here on our way. When once a man had but to sprinkle and to strain, and would remain in such condition as to lay. Where he was upon a plan was hatched, for dread there is in our arms and veins, dread is but scurvy, I should say. I cannot be held no longer by the same bounds, I stay my hand where it remains.'

And he had shown is to be on the side, not near a cutlass but a single strange of hair, that of a woman that had been touched. To have been used in such a manner as the hair committed, to have been thorn and tore to shred, of signs. He could not believe nor account for it but looking now.

'Was she in a cabin then? Where does such a maiden hid as well?'

'I do not know, my lord, for she's been traded, sold but a meskin, as our souls. Would to be put around and would to be told. I lay no part in it, may I claim my life within an inch of its passing, where I may looked upon a daughter of my own. Return to my home upon the barrels underneath the sea, where they lay sunken, waited for the chains to be lifted and dragged, so the signal may be taken and once again could our kind live on the shores, as the likes of my youth had never seen and had?'

'You shall be granted freedom as thus and I shall seek no loyalty from a man as such, nor for any scoundrel that might be called upon him to serve, or to look upon him as to pain himself as it to know.'

But I lay claim upon your locks and I shall grant myself them, and bring them on until uncouth and dainty.'

Thence he had but taken them and rode away, as the scoundrels spread, the locks but got out of his hand. And such a sight of morbid lights the play, had stopped him before he could return to the ship, which had been conveyed. But like a willow, or a flower speck, always in the air, a dandelion, spreading as they would become her grain. Where she stood elated, like a dark figure, upon the strange projected and looked back, always but falling on, would to be blind. And she would falter at each second as to fall and be ailed.

She were buttoned all around and grabbed a hold, and dragged about, where she may stand, be sworn to, of each ill behind a button laying, behind each twist there was but a black sea-ailing, soon spread all around. He could not see her until she had become the sky. Flows of hair and locks of black, on a land and objects blandly put of a deep blue, which had been him, the hull of the ship, gotten through. Had he lost himself to the blinds? Has he but found no hope to be set, in might to hear.

'Guardian Horse, must you follow the scent of the throat when asked? Must you near the village of youth when you may flow upon which doubt there is?

Of odors there's but naught awaiting, but you must entering, as I call is so, for there yonder, the sight is waiting.'

As her flocks had but set in flight, little birds made of her grown, were but put in plank and opened it up. There was but nothing stopping him after that, as he entered, as he followed, walking through, way-lain and put to thread on top of unsteady fingers that were sworn. Of broken shore there was but the blue sand, of the water, there was naught, the mast completely dispersed, the deck torn apart, yet he entered. Drawing forth on lain a stretch unkindly. Hardened as for worsened fates, of what had called him back, to lay. To ask of him but to follow.

The muse was there, unbridled and to gallows. There were fallen through and one awaited; of which heights would be of kinds, to be, unmistak.

On lain on broken land there rested, of which servitude and might detested, of which pride had settled to aside, and once realized, this could've been none other but the fall of the world, a planet-curve, at the edge of an empty wall, empty gallows, and pits of darks, at the end of which his throne at last. Upon a planet of sand that's ever present, like an hourglass, always pushing down, rested, none other but the vileness of which supreme, and malformed kind of black within, the likes of once-to-have been a king, there lain, a Centurion. Standing there, oh bored to see, with but a missing finger, always tapping, his suit of armor highly molded, always of destruction, as to his dissatisfaction but looked upon a small one to on lay.

But what to say to the little creature, other than, forlorn as to be told, as well; of which kind but listened, horse was stopped, for even it lay in fright despite not being reattached. In such a shock it had lost a leg with was put to a stop before a snap had put it through. Reattached as if sinew but yonder, stood at on the on lain wonder. Him, his servant but the Hair wench, Mylintha.

Of him but little more to tell, of which ancient eyes but empty, of which blade but standing, somewhere in the fall, for his time awaited to set the clocks ticking and be taken from the chair upon which he stood and watched. It was just something one would happen to do. And be called no lesser, through.

‘Ah, but you’ve come to ask.’

Let it be known in doubt that if it were not for the intricacies of the thing which had been in the chair, which, upon the stander were but attached to the strange rail, he would not but be standing. Wrought of no peace, to be landed there, he would but stare and see. Would to be called, to be seen. And this plain hiding underneath a broken boat he caused as well. For this distant part of the land was but on the other side of the world, as one could tell.

‘Ah, but I seek no more than to ask of what I want and more.

Do as I say and I shall be pleased; deny my so and I shall make it so you’ll find no peace. Do not travel forth towards the pocket and do not seek to touch what is not rightly yours to have obtain; for I will have ordained, no wonder, to have put you where I desire, under the reign of taken worlds, under the broken folded homes upon which I serve. There you shall be broken apart with me on top of your head, but crushing, until we shall be forged into naught and will have become one with the great mold of a cast, that’s to serve as a means to rekindle what was lost. For we have long lost passion for what’s to be seen. And would have long been destroyed if it weren’t for our kind to be’

‘What would that be?’ He asked as he’d taken a gulp.’

‘Shaken in our path by the likes of the Curator, unlikely to be called no less, thou I confess of the kind, you shall be accompanied by her and set in mind to follow through.

Avoid the countenance of the evil that seethes ever so and blind your eyes to be taken away as I call upon you to lo.’

He had but pointed where to charge. Past and besides the chair, the seat where he may be lost not to be called upon after; therefore he had but listened to such command, never to be called on and let alone would he be spared on that dreaded day.

Then he leaped in.

He is but a medal on the chest of a giant, him in the front, lead on as all man were to follow him and sing his song in lost days of yore. Him but a single shingle upon his brow, never to be looked down upon, but shine like a tiny star of destruction, making past every nook and cradle that lay there. Him but the utmost point of contemplation and wonder, how was it that he survived this far? Upon a fall unlike no other, only to be met by the breaking of a single daft strike at the top of the ceiling which broke the land beneath the hills of green and the morass; underneath each ill and through everything he could point within he rode. And froze upon the dark breakings which put the world but back together; snaking their way through, but pinned to look upon as they had realized with wonder there came. Again and again, aging as they came out through, between the wonderment and between each hue, what they desired through, their delirious nature, pushed and hue. Would be that which colors, his advent, through which tomorrow would but never come. A day was already gone. Met by the stopping thin, blasted upon a look and a whim. Their teeth were torn within, but a fence never ending, and a rail descending yet to come.

‘Ah, I see that you’ve come to implore me of such pity as to spare you of whichever speech I may beseech of you in order to get away with, knowingly that I will have taken you by a glance, my stance being set, as far as I can say, for I shall never know whichever hope there is for me left yet. There I may go but never to return again, as I will have been met by the fiend which sent me here in the first place rowing, through the sea of fallen gems, followed by her, the wench, with which I serve my due as I call upon you to let me set forth.’

‘Nay, sir, you may not come forth and you may not know of any worth. And you may not pass and you may not get a say, to last. For we cannot but lay no man allow. To get upon our throats, betokened with a must, if we were so, to let you go and whichever other force might, were it to follow, row. Past no further as we may be killed, and slain within and put down and buried in the ground, not to stay guard but be harmed by uncanny spirits that may destroy our wearied groans at last.

And be the last of our kind to bear, and not stay here ever away. For he and I and those behind, and those behind, behind, behind and those beneath us that must wait; and their brothers whom must serve. We’ve all but waited and we stood and did our duty as we should. Given upon hope and manned, upon the barricades we stand at last. Upon our graves but those who pass, shall take a piece of us at last.

But we have settled yet before, to die on our own walls and never to be torn, from the ground and from, we lay. We shall regain our spirit, then we’ll say.’

‘Both of us forgiven so and in our terms, we’ll walk alone, each in one direction waited, and in the end don’t be mistaken. For we have each paid a visit to the side, and law behind, descendants wild. For they shall find us when we’re old and they shall bring us, lay so-forth. Once we’ll have been set side, and death by touch and would to bite. Upon our call we’ll please to say. And we’ll have finally be taken away.

Knowing our sons have taken so. Will have stopped, wherever low, and petty to you that we have settled and don’t, again, sir, be mistaken. We won’t allow no man set forth, and we won’t, without pity lay ever so. Here’s a knife, a blade a dagger, here’s what but what you may be after, here’s an ax, a broken bottle, here’s a flame and a small disaster. Here are the means that you may claim, your life should be taken and you should stay away. And you should not care for whatever might be, and whichever reason might you feel.

I, who’ve been before you as I come. I, who’s been in the same place, as you should know. When I have come here in search, that I may beseech upon my father upon him return, I whom have been given the same, have chosen that I may. My life be taken away but still, my hand but trembled and I have taken ill.

I to join the man until it comes, I to sire someone and to promise that it will last, I to never have left this place, I to have disgraced myself, here, I remain.’

And ever so clear was it for the Guardian of the Horse, whom knew just as little as to little verse and little quiet, followed by the Hair-Wench which had stood now beside him spoke. Upon lifted their arms and would to be defeated, they lay in wait. Were prepared; and say, upon them and say wherever and largely encased, the tunnels as wreathed and wept, large locks as well. A darkened armor, for a dame, a robe within her veins as well, but pity on her face, he scowled. The likes of such a witch to disembowel, if only there was one to call, if only there was something better to be appalled; alas there was as such, he waited for a second, then the trenches-last.

‘Ah, I see that you are to be called, bewitched by me, as I have last. Come upon you as you say, with high orders from he whom lays. With each retreat he comes ever so, and he draws near until, as low as every man he stays, until he comes and push away. And come upon you until no longer, and not stay my hand, to stronger. Things as wings and blades, to him but, to, his heavy weight, and knuckle might to come and large foot that might come of plain and step upon your heads as, done. Upon each cider and upon the blades and upon where you may step, naught shall remain.

And I claim is so, for I have seen it happen, hitherto, I claim. Your lives at a stake of strands, and if he doesn’t come, I shall rip you apart and make it so, that you’re not to be found and lo.

I shall lay with son and man and soon descendant and bear fruit of your seed, and in evil deed, I shall carry only the disease that comes after.’

But travesty, travesty, both of them called, and they could smell and feel the deceit from the mile. There was but naught but an ordeal, as to appeal those whom to look and to seethe in fear, they would claim it so, in calamity during this show.

‘Lay an arm and let us set aside, stretch and pull, a blade would shook, before she’s done. First there comes the man, retrieve her, as her body pales, after we shall see, deceiver. If you lied, if you’re gone, if we are to hear sound at all, but until then, but to remain, but to feel at it again, raise your arm and let us charge and let us claim whether you see one.

And let the steel decide which life, and which descendants shall live for their kind.’

And to that the Guardian accepted, strapped and lowered, down from the horse, on which, the side, the maiden froze. Upon a look from him, as if from master, she wouldn’t dare, as if to cast him. Off from plain sight and where he lay now, and wherever he goes and what might go through him, at last, the time for spoke was done. They but raised each other’s arms and rallied. And a spin was but met by strike, and a blade at each throat’s demise. And they pulled then they pushed and danced around. And they fought for hours or what appeared to be days at that. Always but close, a deadly blow, followed by a throw of the back, a block to the side. To parry and to feel, the blade slip at a will. Conveniently fading, when needed, always but a mark, succeeded. Tiresome as it to know and sweat had but wrung the hour until deception was but forgotten off.

‘Then I declare you the victor, sir, that you may walk but you alone, unless you claim the maiden of your own, only so I may let both of you go.’

‘And what if that is the case as such. Am I to wed my horse at last? Am I to claim each life which lives inside of him either, and walk upon it at to call them out in wonder. And claim of husbandry and of wives, and many alike to come in disguise, as to fool a man that sees through all? Whom foolery only goes to show, it cannot work, but ever so bother, as to be waited, upon the other, I may claim her as my own that way. But I may have you stay away.’

‘From horse unknowing, we won’t watch, whatever ingratitude, you should catch. The noise has come, ever so near as to return. We’re made aware of the coming of our end.

You may go and simply spare, whatever foolish advice as if to wed. Since we return to which it comes, since there won’t be naught to be found, I say, go ahead.’

But the Guardian would not have it so. Although he proposed that they should be spared, they simply went away and went to lo’, hid whatever there lay. Not to say of wonders and what might come upon his way. He had but accepted as such and wed the Wench and would to do grabbed her by the waist. And not to waste a second more and there, in front of them, there he rose.

‘I claim her for myself and weary, I go ahead, a path that’s dreary. I’ll seek no woe and fate no better, but I shall carry but your nasty letter.’

To which was written yet in verse, two lives, two destinies, and twice of their own, made to last and made to waste and made to have been put and to remain. Made to be sworn and made to be, and made to be wrought, in forget to be scraped for after. For each son but just a word, for each wives but golden coins, and tiny jewel-pebbles that had fallen from abound. Then around the world they walked. At least underground; for hours wrought in nasty pleasing and all the way her wince, appealing. She was spared of incertitude as if to last, and of her beauty she could not see, alas, they were brought to a ditch.

And the ditch was but a pinch upon the brow of earth, wrought in it and plain of old, dirt in face and where to face and what to remain thereafter again; things of stone, made of their own, of little wreathing little men that had spared no den. Lays could not make so, to be put around and to make it snow upon the wreathing fire, from beneath a burning mirth of pyres. All but wreathing at command, all but plain to see as sand; many made to melt uncannily. Many others but joined as well, and structures ever-encompassed screaming as they down the gulps of steam and snore, of the slumber yet there won’t be called, and on their faces only, much to stall. There’s but eight marks and eighteen wonders, all but put aside, the blunder. For each man whom had made the cross, of danger that is put, alas, would but bring him closer to his death in fire. But to melt down there, would he realize of the mire, of where they went, but fire was put. By some wreathing spirit of which shook was but a command, it was not real after all, put on command.

They could not know of whom hid but beneath, a spirit of cold touch, within cold-bones held within. All but encompassed in chains, an illusion of fire but many remains, beneath a pool that’s not to be spared, then again, she feared, approaching as well.

‘Must we pass in fear and make it to the other side that way? Must I lay no courage, sprain my side and lay where am I, yet to die?’

‘I may not slow down for no man, we got no time, yet to spare. Whatever follows through might crush, you know that better than anyone. It was you that brought me so, today. And only with you, I think, I may live another day, and live after and ever as such. And live through whichever claim I may set on side.’

Thence they were but bled, upon each word of dread. And there the call of wonder pressing and over making, ever encompassing, he had lain down some day, and would to be called upon, to rise ahead. Where he walked and but to be met. By as strange fire from which the hay, would not be burnt as if to say, the pass is safe, the drop conveyed. And wager of the fall to follow, there would be but little more, too shallow as his heart would pierce, even, oh lady whom looks at him, but wench of hair and betoken of him as well. And fright of lost, the man at this cost. He couldn't be the last one to be charmed, but the peculiar white lightish figure.

‘Sweet maiden, I’ve come upon you and stumble on dark feet, I’m broken and lay for long, defeat. I’ve been dragged for long and I have sacrificed as many, a day to be strong, of which they call me so.

I’m to return to some place where they will known me, though. I ask of such, where do you call and where to see for me, at all. Do I lay there, in a cottage upon gray, do I lay here crushed underneath the falling of the day, do I make to lose across the path, may I rest when the times comes?’

‘But dear Guardian, you know such better, not to ask of me the letter, for each word pressed in and each of them, pushed thin, on paper there’s but lay. Their souls would not but stay, and leap around to follow through and death behind if you don’t follow through. A promise given you shall spare, and where to lay if not down there? If you fail to see, and where to be, don’t stop right here, don’t look at me.

As to hear where you time has come, only you shall know, of lady none. You’ve taken her as prized hold, you’ve wrought yourself and I should know. Of no better man than I’ve seen, although you have no soul within, you’ve but to cross and make the light, until it fades as I have.’

Within the likes, she had but cast, herself upon the rocks and round, with every drop only to have seen and within the fire ill, as seen it gone before the hour, and soon to be and soon to admire. She had lost her soul, and but illusion, and would the likes and the allusion. Where to spare and lay awake, in the lands, where they are chained; as they had dragged and wrapped about, and would not let her, as sake, run out. There to lay and fade away, until her beauty would not convey, and little more than bone and prattle and just as soon, as soon after. They but crossed the pass, in mouth at last, given through a tunnel, made to cast. Them into a mighty river one of riveting mighty shivers, of blocks of wool but darkened heads, and those whom moved and would have them. But brought upon a city watch, walked below on rail a latch; right around the foam and say, where too far beyond they lay. Not to be touched and not to be caught, and never, for the likes of them, to have been put down.

‘There’s but a single raft, we’ll cross out paths, worthless upheaval, where do you go?’

And brought before the summer, throng, where land un-dark there lay no sought. And there but colors of the sky, and of the ball of which to die; and leaves such likened, an entry to surrounding, where they came out of their way to see and where to be, another land, not to be seen. From the turn and not to watch, the city was avoided, then at last, their stop was brought upon a valley yonder, where the strongest of the mourners but looked away, and lay to wonder. But where to watch and where to be and how much beauty and whom to thee?

‘May I ask, of dear man, what have we stumbled upon?’

‘A river’s den.’

Then he understood the world. It was his home, never to let go. And here, at last, would he stay for a while, a place where touch would not defile. For look behind, and yet afar, from the past from which they cast at last. The way behind fallen under rock, a slit that fell upon his call. Way destroyed, without a loin, to be put upon and mourned, as for. The people whom may, well to be, and whom had fled, and what to see, all but crushed in the back, by him whom cast but he at last.

Upon the maiden but no wench and each flock, at last, but then, of yellow and of crystal eyes, of which but fairness there is but die. Not to forget and not to see, for whichever reason, there was no one else for me. As I lay with her, thought the Guardian of the Horse, upon the way in which they rose. He had remembered but as such, and where he walked and those he lay to latch. Upon their cells not to look such and such, but his heart but beckoned, listen, at last.

There were but letters soon to be. And which of them, never see, and whom to give and where to lay and whom to give, again, again.

He had but searched and walked but plain, would not to get on horse again, of a maiden and of son, of someone that he may give, at last.

It had not taken much, of whom was sought, there upon their graves at last. He had stumbled not to say, how he knew, where they lay.

But his heart, alas, would know so, for he had buried them, also.

With the last of the horse and the kidnappee', of which deathlessness was but eternal and he would lay in grave alive, to see, nothing but eternity; and done as such he had but lived, with no one but the hair maiden, until the last of his days, where whence to be.

Somewhere in the desert

Right around the upper crossing deluge, and the peculiar tributaries that lead to the upper lands, a few of them had gathered through and wore their heads upwardly erect. And from the peculiar big-boxes, from where all the messages darted, some even bigger than before as if to lay; and look-a-likes akin to old fat monitors, on top their heads, appeared as much, along the way.

'Careful there; they're searching everyone before the reach.

He will be able to sniff us if we're not paying enough attention now.'

'I know of Ill, you needn't suffer, I know the thing that will cross us after.'

They contemplated with their group. This was just the end of the dessert, or close to it, where verdure had begun.

A few miles away, around the ends, there lay the Patrol. Men dressed in armor that stopped at the trunks, no lower humanoid bodies but three giant bird-like metal legs instead, which turned about in the back and the front, forming racks upon which they moved. They rode on horse horse-skinnned horses of which bodies were shaped like mounted turrets, which the Patrol men's legs were wrapped around like pincers that fit inside their peculiarly shaped open horse tendon pits they dug in. At best, whatever they were bearing was primitive, yet those horses were hives for diseases and the men in those dark-covered armors were always dull-headed and evenly put down, following one another crawling like dead flies; for that was the entry to this dead land, Lump.

They were not dead by any means, only worn out, accepting only the most impoverished of people; the most disturbing and the most peculiarly benign, pathetically inclined to waste away with the rest of them, whom pitied themselves there. Verdure looked like that from the distance, until one drew near and noticed dead grass.

Every one of the magi but covered themselves and only crawled about the ground not to draw too much attention; for even such pitiful exemplar bore deadly means of such destruction, as to bring them down or drive them away.

‘Keep quiet, and don’t raise your hands too high, they might notice some of it and draw us is.’

Already in reach, they were but easily dismissed and seen through.

Horses laying down and put to bear, each other under way, seemingly incapable to lift, they but stood there and rested at peace.

Pleiske

‘Whom shall be called to spare upon us a single man to enable our means that might be brought to him, in time and time, when one could spare but a single and a single coin, and the broth of bread and beads of uncanny seeds and everything that might be given onto him so he could make the travel and go as far, last of our orders and what we’ve done, shall only come to be put, as far, as we shall ever know, to a test unlike no other upon glory which shall shone upon one very mark.

And every order and every man we’ve but brought from afar, to train and to make as plain as it could be, in the midst of our days, to be, and bring upon us no poultry upon which we may bring and death within our darkest ranks for him. We brought him food and we have clothed him, he was your brother and what hast you to say of him, firs of whom shall speak today, let it be called, I call upon him, Arrlain.’

And before them he stood, for a few moments shook as if to put pride aside, he being reminded of what was lost and what beauty was cast off this paradise. They lived in an uncanny thing, a wreathed pair of put together wooden towers, wooden planks, wooden houses, a giant tree and some other sticks, always wet, as to avoid a fire, always to face the coldness of never being clothed when the time of dire need awaited, as to be hardened, always waited upon.

‘Aye, I speak, and let us heart for what I seek. I need this be made felt so, of how far I went and how much I long to have made this place my home and in what seems to be, an end. You’ve made me feel as if I lost it, for a moment, always cast it, upon my ancestors, they yell. Wherever they went and wherever they fell, I feel as if my hearts is carried, they, to whom my land is married. They to whom they weep at last, looked upon descendant whom had cast, our world and every fair to be, in every pit and every misery, dragged aside as he had cast them.

He whom served to beacon of disaster, him whose spared no man of agony, of whom I seek now, alone to be.'

'But you may not be left out there alone, not to shine upon which sow; you have spared no wonder coming, ever after, ever manning, each sail and each, whichever it may be, you've done your share and now, your grave is somewhere else to be.

You can rest with all the men whom fought, of brave after and in distraught. But know that of a favor, drawing, you need to speak of his disaster, coming.

It needs to be spoken of, it needs to be drawn, we need to know of yore, and whence he show, of every splinter and every shook, of every blade and every crook we showed him along the way, of every whim he had betrayed and only then will your honor be bestowed upon.'

So settled the court whom wanted to hear, of the missing man of whom yonder disappeared. Not to show a sign compassion, not to show where he'd come after, and whence he's seen and where he's been and of which he had spoken since, there was little, there was more, where he went and whence he shone but dagger-dark in throat, of those unworthy, thence he said.

'Dead speak dead and that I know it well, for I have been in place instead, where he's gone and what he's done, I'm just as guilty to be done. Wreathed and put, of body shook, I claim nothing that neither of you know I would. But I seek, let alone compassion and bear to arms, towards him, no action. For him, a brother whom long may lay, I wonder, ever forth what to say.

Upon the day I meet, and at his feet, and when to look for him and where to see it. I want and miss, and will find peace only when he'll make it so, I seek reprise. For what was lost and where he went, for what he's given me to spare.'

'And what hast been given to a man as such? And if you claim to be of him, know that little more, you will not last.

As this court will judge you just as such and with your head we'll shall be done. Point us then and make us known, where he had gone and whence he shone. For his light upon which plight emerged, upon which even the likes of carrions in danger, are on you and they're seen through. And every ancestor, that might see you, will be just as disappointed as every man.

For no honesty might dwell in him, nor those that he had shone upon what knowledge tells.'

'But I fear, oh I fear so, what he imparted on me and what he'd show. The things that had been said, I know, I could not for the likes of me forget it so.

Of plight of man he'd said as much, of what he had imparted on stranger along the way, I stood watch. Of herbs, tradition and whichever more, I stood and listened, gone from his mind, I know.'

'And where hast this journey of his driven the man?'

To which they all had turned upon the point, all to listen to him foretell of what came upon him and what to say, some more. They but listened, of the last and would cast each other's destinies, alas, he spoke.

Again and told.

‘He was driven to the point of the cross, where vanity of old had cast him, thus. Thinking he would lay beyond, our gods forsaken, his mind but passed, he’d fallen through and there he ended, untouched and barely fended.

But I’ve seen him, heard, and say as forth. He had died a man without worth, that as much I can admit. Yet I have known he’d died the way he’d wilt. For he had chosen this path and made it through, and by and by, whichever, it may be true. He’s died the way he’d wilt it, he’s died a man but by his choice.’

‘And what of you then, in case, of poise, if you’re but him, a man of treason, a rat within? Whom had claimed yourself as such uncanny, as to betray us when the time had come, drag us forth until each broth, and many; many more will follow, if we don’t endure a case.’

And just as soon after, they had boiled it down, to have made of him but such an example, as to have him spread of man, of dead. And would to be called, within again.

No courtesy would be told and when it came, the fools did know that there was little to no chance to spare, and would again, come again, again, and then again.

Lump was a peculiar country.

That no one wanted to approach, unless they had to. A junk-plaster of dark smugness put in dirt and soil, which were bubbling about as if they were wrought and chained about in tar and smolder, and bone power, darkened after birthing, of those whom bled before they came to see and those whom died in agony.

Somewhere beyond it.

Tw’as but fair and never to be done again when asked to have received what they dreadfully wanted to be pleased with when the time come to approach upon their dire hour, when one of the servants of evil had called upon the shower of fire that had been bringeth from on top the earth, where it had come upon servant and servant to serve upon rock that’s brought, from the darkest corners of the world, upon which brought them. For those whom followed of evil ways understood that fear alone would not convey the strangeness which were to pass, when one had finally come upon the site, only to realize, that there, where they had come, upon the sight in might and whether one should light the way and whatever he might alone say, there was naught to be found and all around them, mist and shout had only brought the pain all yonder. Closer to their hearts forgotten, never understanding how it is that they had gotten forth and never stronger than the son of man whom followed from the depths of earth, he’s been thought and plain about, blunt and sprout, from where he stood about the hour, killed of men beyond the reaches, and where he walked of plains and wretches. All but man, of strong helm, had barely stumbled onto him the evil.

‘I’ve been waiting for your for too many years to even come to understand what’s been going through your last years through you may have given me the hope that I may find a man as I am, that might, upon the ropes of the call, the executioner whom is alive, my brother yet to be dumfounded, had found himself, of long surrounded.

And they’ve taken him in land dissection, where many man, or land-erection volatile have understood the lands are broken, they’ve taken plight inside the swoon and trunks, beneath the earth where they met the most concave, I fear, oh my lord you now appear that my wife be taken ill for the man who take her ill have yet employed the likes of women-coy whom might but scratch her neck to rub me. Ill upon the plains and spread her lightly, and have her ripped, by horse and mule, and take her when the time is come upon the shed that she might appeal.

A god that I may not know, he’s spoken to her as of lately and spoke of yore.’

‘Of me, a man you’ve barely met? Of me a strange whose face you’ve never seen before this face had standings, and put before you, that you may ask me, what have I done to you, oh little man with little to nothing that you may claim to me, of god to be that I have done as such.

And such a claim as to be brought before him, again, I may be pained to tell to you as such, abandon, this life of yours might not be worth the claim that may be put to share and worth so.

Theirs is but something you may never meet, better die a man than at their feet. As wench and spare, akin again, mighty take and shred your guts away, if you claim yourself to them, to her. Abandon both, don’t move, don’t spare, not even a light to a woman no doubt they had already claimed and put about a falsehood throttle, the god you’re after, he might just had her.’

‘But what if there’s still time to share? And help me on my way that I may convey, of rescue and of chart, I may do whatever pleases you, about the hour, needed, true. A mark for every minute, if in need, anything that pleases you, so you may help me from this wild disease.’

‘I’ve made my peace with your command, and there’s no need for you to shout. I’ve made it so you know, she’ll suffer. If you don’t close your mouth, it’s you I’m after.’

On but the front he was headed and there to die, like every soldier-man of no more worth, as he had sightened, and long abidened, little more than what he’s taken there. And what of theirs, again, unfair.

‘Think of what might happen after, if you do me this favor, I shall join you after; what’s the worth of another man’s worth if not to call me as such?

What’s the point of going there if you can’t have me? The one displeasing, in the fronts, to see me dead before the marks, before we’re to make it through, before being caught the rue, this is your chance to shut me through, once and forever while getting your satisfaction like a fever never brought. I call this.’

‘On which terms, I see something that’s just right, so be it then, we shall march forward and see what forth there’s for your maiden’s worth.

Let the call upon my face be so, if your life’s price, but better be known, to be that of a dead maiden.’

As he knew that they would find her.

Another pair, city unaware.

And lo', there was a man as such, upon which he stood and would, alike, be entered through a strange-like port. To walk upon, beneath it, grates brought home. To ask his friends, the frogs the rats, who invited him in and would be brought. To him he had but painted homes, some small and other, where they rose. Down his back, and where he took them, standing. Little mushroom-vile, never ending; little more, they brought and many others, and little homes were light after.

'I am the fire which shall burn your sole for I have come and stumbled upon your living quarter by chance alone and I've been made mad by the scents and everything that went aside, to have entered you when you have brought, but a piety to my eyes for I've seen it all. And I'm made to remember what had to have entered, without permission and deterrence fended I ask of you and what's of due. To have my eyes cleansed of you, I am to take but hot-poke irons, to have you blinded just as I will in order that I may forget of this defiance, now I order you of which I shame, to draw away your clothes today.

Run around the city, walk. Stumbled like the fool you are, unless you pick a frog, but to cover what's beneath your frock, I say to you, leave and don't return this place, leave as soon for I shall grant you no face upon which puddle-water may look back. To withdraw from your kind I would not see it last, I but seek leeway upon your soul and I shall pray that it may be found by a lord that could take your nonsense ass miss given.'

'But sir you've got me all too wrong, thought you may not look like a knight, I seem to guess. That you are not one to be easily impressed by such a jest as the such of which I have employed upon you only so you may be tricked that we may come on to such an understanding as to bow to each other's feet and kiss one another on each cheek and know of each other's woes for what we've done but here where I live I'm not near to the years that may be called upon me to put aside. That I may be set wherever you may claim me to flee of sight and make do with the benign as to abuse such a creature to which kind I may only consider appropriate as to have called a son of mine.

Yet please good sire, consider this, of which I've come to such an understanding as to acquire such an admiration to your person as to understand that you are such a force as to punish me to no end. To which I tell you, please do leave and take me with you so you may claim that you have taken a man from wherever ends you found him so, that he may be grabbed and whipped, but grant me, in the least the chance that I may show guilt and shame for what I've done.

I, whom I'm but a strange man that may never be found by no means and that cannot be put through any kind of quietness, of such peace as to have made felt so. I whom had been put through such forces as if to know what a true hellish end may be; as I've travelled far yet I return here where I may find some peace towards my soul, so it may rest. I've seen the cruelties of this world of which ends may never be fathomed to be so, yet never in my entire life have I considered as such.

As the visions that are set in trance by me and my desire to continue ever so and be made sure of what and such peculiarities were made to know by simple inspiration granted of their kind. And what they produced once squeezed enough as to release the flounder and of gaseous wonder that have entered and has cleansed my lungs. I of them now I belong for they have shown me, at such a time and such a way that I may look upon the true image of a god that may convey such images as the likes I've never seen sir, that you may not come to believe me if that is what the worth of my desire is as such. To which I only beg of you that you may allow me a chance to redeem myself and walk away.

But not until you will have sunken yourself in what I can convey, and see the vales that twist and become, like the creatures you see around, wrought and done and made of mounts as they are rid upon by such giants that not even our likes would come to recognize, in which case. Good man, if you were but a knight you would've sinned away immediately as to have been met by such twists as to not believe what happened here.

To that I call upon thee, ensnare or make your claim and take your choice for whatever there is left to say.'

And he had waited there in ponder, trying to look after, interested of such claims, trying to see what had come after and what he would say, if the time was righteous as to see, and what to be, he was displeased.

But he had taken such abuse as it won't matter.

'If this is trickery, I'll see you after and made court, claim. I will have you punished and made to pay, know that if my body isn't found, then servants are abound to fish me out and be lead, towards your den, to which many a man know where you have hid, and know your face. And they will have figured out where I am as well as either, and even if you keep me, I shall claim you after.'

'I knew it, good sire, so you have not stumbled upon my home by chance.'

'Indeed I haven't and instead I have found my lance of soul and made to see a man for a man's worth and come into your home to see and claim whatever went through my mind and now I claim thee.

But with that said, now I drink from the miasma so I may become concluded with the strange smells, that I may know what's in there and that I may look for a chance to see through your eyes before your countenance is set aside, during which I will have passed my judgment.'

As if he were not shamed, he would be flayed and if he were not, he would be put to beg, and if that's the case, he would bust cast him down and take to his employ but evil men to beat him down and see him through and put him where he belongs. Or have him whipped and turned to slave, or have him put, again and again until he will have become but an uncanny servants whose ruse would never stop him to improve upon such manners as to lay no further than the stubble.

Now that he took in part and claimed upon such vision as to be of each kind, he had but started seeing things in front to be. And much to the warmth of colors he was but in a strange place, a visitor, he. Would but walk and grab a drink of ale, as commoner upon the ways of which he had no meaning to intrude upon.

He stumbled upon such floors that such a man like him would lose a finger and have become. For his lower side and lower body but a strange canine jaw that had but pouted, taken each and everyone by force.

Killed whores, they were wolf-bore inside of them, all crying to him.

Thence walking stalking little lady, yore he couldn't believe what went through him, as he had grabbed and took her sides before she'd even come forth.

‘What have you done to her?’

‘Punished, she’s being punished, I need to redeem him for what I’ve done, oh mad man cannot you not understand a word of which I’ve done. These acts are not mine and they cannot be contained, please.

I need to be stopped, put me in chains, do anything.

I cannot regain my mind any more, of Yore, man of worth but listen to me, I need your blessing, I need you to cast me back into the place, from whence they’ve, they’ve.’

But he didn’t speak, poor man, blackened feet.

He whom wore the pelt of dogs but yelled back after; he lost it all.

He had lived like a hermit on the streets, or a leper that’s been avoided for as many touches as possible, talking in whispers of long forgotten songs speaking of the most dreadful happenings that crossed his mind; until no one could but understand just what had entered his mind after. It was a given he had to be saved by no one else other than a passing man, in the midst of the night, when he had suddenly, having arrive to the sight of the man he came to recognize as the Lord of Bouldemoir, he merely had knelt and offer him a lord.

‘My dear friend, but what had befallen upon you? Who had cast you upon such thing as you’ve fallen this low? To think that you’re a lord dressed in beggar’s clothes, merely acting like one without a mind, what shame came into you now?’

‘Little purple men, they want me, they want to kill me, drag me in their caves where I shall live with them for as many days as they will keep me captive until I lost my will to live. I can see them gather around each corner of the world, they are the ones who are destroying it, piece by piece and worm by worm. I’ve been put under no spell.’

‘You have, come on now, I’ve come to take you away.’

Leirs but pouted his nose, his cheek but rose and one of the servants came under way. He wrapped a piece of cloth upon the master, welcoming him in the house soon after, where he rested a few years. With as many of the man been made to disappear, leeches, all of them, right around their up-heaved brow. Would to bring ruin on him as soon as he was off their eye, when he, upon the hour, most exposed, his weak chest rising up and down until he’d come back home. But alas, he had not changed. He was still a man without a face. He was taken by the mind, blinded as he still witnessed visions out of this world and beyond. Everything which rose about him paled. There were still abominations everywhere, from which he could only cower, being dragged inside their innards-lights, forced to listen to most dreadful incantation brought to him by men of cloth. Yet they were dressed, and hooded in the most peculiar grayed howls. Signs of bears and many animals, sceptered-rings that made black noises.

All the while, he but froze when he was met by his servants, whom at all points in time were shocked. They were incapable of understanding just what had entered their master and what he’s done. When the time arose, he but stood and froze, again to be burnt by hot-poking iron, tortured by the ones around. Called upon, doctor after doctor, yet they could not heal him, regardless of the pain inflicted upon him, as that was done. A man came close.

He had but thought of it as a mercy but another rose.

‘Stay your head, you’re not to kill him until healed. You may not think it possible, as many of us akin to you lay in fear, but there’s still a chance we may be able to bring him back.’

‘And what reason should I come to pay to you?’

Why should I listen to such a man with little more to him than no mind? I would rather take my chances in the wild after I’ve taken my revenge upon a man so blind as to cast me away from where I live.

I, who has served him for this long may only be abandoned and made to weep, I know there’s but no chance to bear myself anywhere. He has abandoned us to lay in this pit of despair.’

To which, upon being met by many stares, as if they formed but a council to make it so there was a chance to push on, through worsened times and despair, they took to vote.

And brought him forth; tell us what you’ve thought.

‘Him, Cluther, the man who stands before you has attempted, in his lowest form, to kill our master.’

Great hunts were procured for many men

They brought in the great bear, they hunted him from spoil to spoil towards its cave. By the time they arrived there, its body fashioned but a single.

‘Someone needs to kill them now before they start crawling out of their dark spots again.’

‘Huh?’

‘I said, forget the hunt for a moment will you?’

I hate them, look at them darks.

They’re everywhere, they crawl on me like infant-deer but I had them.’

Little dark insect eyed simian lepers, they were cancer, the cancer of the kingdom, they had to be stomped to death.

Forty eight years passed, in the midst of a second. Eighteen hundred thousand wars took place in the blink of an eye, which took place only in the first year of those forty eight. There was a black walls, it was painted white, upon the mountain peaks. Many men carved holes and lived inside the wall, creating the great Concave.

They lived in peace with their families, their women being sent deeper into the caverns they made, in order to be protected by the evils of the world, their own task being raising children, as they ought to. And there was no evil in their hearts on in their eyes therefore. And live was peaceful there for a long enough period of time.

Iron was found in time, as the first tool-wroughters were made to be. Great steam-engines followed, which only served to reinforce the wall, which stopped the on-lookers yet on site.

He forced the darkness inside him to obey. For what was worth.

Whenever the great lord of what had to have come after his whole distraught nature was but put into question, as if he were the only one that could possibly obey at such a time, to which he, whom had been waiting the longest in such a dark place as to call upon the darkest corner of the mind which will have called upon his very distraught soul when, they whom looked upon his form had done naught but to vaguely question the perilous ways upon which he had gotten but snared upon the most unfathomable yet benign looks he might've given to them upon the beginning of the dark sermon. When they the lords and the ladies whom looked upon him did nothing but to question but their very own needs and wants during such a time of expulsion as to have themselves thrown around into the darkest pits where their ancestors may finally be met upon such obtuse plains as to finally come and stumble upon them, calling upon the darkest days of their pasts as if to remember the youth of their losses. Upon being met by such creatures which had in turn lost their faiths in the most uncannily unimaginable matters, they had finally felt brave, upon the looks of which not even the servants would've found themselves capable of looking at, or in their direction as they spared not a second more. Hiding away whatever parts of their uncannily deformed souls were still to have been called upon such likes as beauty would be called upon them, as to, finally be set into search for that one who hid behind all, behind them, whom, of shameless ways but hid the darkest reached soul could but spared. Him but a remnant of such as guild of such a lore such as the likes of which, the commoner would've forgotten a long time ago for the darkness he bears into his soul may never be looked down upon, as to realize what he feared most. For it is not for one and son of Yore, whom, to have picked upon such greatness as to have picked upon it, the hilt of a sword, as to enable himself to follow after; though his future may be dark in such way, they, whom pressured their likes, to have put them into graver ways, and to have placed them into uncanny lays had been making them lay where their souls had been in search for one unlike theirs. Like that of a mighty knight like him whom chose upon his darkest days to abandon the blade and instead hang upon the outskirts of the darkest planes of land, in the most uncanny facets as to forget whom he is and of what kind of forgeries he may stumble upon. As he fears, after all, like all men who find themselves of his age, what kind of piety they may put to him. He, of whom heritage may take away, does not know of his likes and who the men of the worst manners, and whom, the people were before he had stumbled.

He had come upon a great plain, a plate of armor made of living growths such as to grow like oaks out of the body of a giant man, of long heads that reached the skies and of their feet-length teeth, and incisors as much as he could not abide, he had given himself, lend onto the beast and finally had come to ask of it.

'Please, if you be so kind as to finally come upon me and stumble upon the darkest corners from whence you come, to where you shall return as all dark beasts alike may come onto one another during their struggle to survive in the pits where they were born, and what comes after, to which I mourn, I ask you this, of you, great beast.

Spare me, of what kind of evil, youth that may be put inside. I see him rotting in your body, I know this cancer that I've come to recognize. It is something I would wish benign, something that may be set aside, to be thrown and let to live, do not throw it in the heap.'

Yet the creature did not spare him of no trouble, as it would come again, again then come after. It wore itself as to bear evil eyes, all of which, the kind, and kind. They came in, utmost, worthy manner.

The beast arrived, or had it stumbled upon its very feet, one could've lost himself at the mere sight of the deceit.'

'Why must every bore and every single one of you that come forth change in shape?'

As the creature had but shaped itself in kindness making, like the dark being inside of it, fumigating. It was no child, but something worse but a leprous being, all torn-up and cast in verse.

'I've come to kill you dear night. I know you fear the sun all bright.

It shall burn you by the time you came, upon the last breaking and the slipping forth where you shall come and stay.'

'Nay, I cannot be killed, I need to lay in heap, no longer will I way in quiet.

I can defeat this poison that ensnared my veins, with you in my mind, I shall remain.'

'Then open a slit, and slit a cut. I shall warn you that before I'm brought, there comes but a single thing, it is no deal but a graver curse as you will have devoured me. To have absorbed my inner will and power, you will have been changed beyond belief. You will have become as evil as I am if not worse than that, upon the heaps and upon the plains, you shall spread but nothing more other than the colors, red, black, green and white of pus. Of children and animals may I not say and of what comes after, that's the place upon which I shall lay.

Always but on top of your memories.'

'Then I deny it.'

'Bet it so.'

Then the beast but shook itself, it froze, then it disappeared, never to be called again.

But night, oh, night, what a dull a thing, it feared what the beast, of whom dire things might've called upon such an eclipse as to save and rue, and not to dull, to have been done, and seen right through. There would've been better days, somehow as much. He knew what they meant and where, to watch. When darker days but settled by.

And when the cavern opened, as if to show the first sings that he would die, he leaped before and went some more, always deeper, never to be worn. In the makings of the quiet, he rested. Not like the night itself, but largely demented. He feared to approach all. He couldn't move as he was distraught.

Whom to fear such a thing? Where could he had lain if not between each single weeping still that appeared everywhere? He feared for he had known, as much, that he was unaware of what was going on. He feared of the lack of future, he feared for his child. Of leper moon that would not carry on, even if it were a bottle, or any kind. His message would not rise and spare, he would not fear, yet again, there was no reason, he seekt to live. And within the falling of a cloud, he leaped right in.

Fire burnt his body before he knew as such. He was just brought before his time came on. Such endurance as he'd ever known, was but of a legendary stature, as if to throw himself away, uncanny.

Out of the ashes came a birth, such likes of which were barely known, to have been thrown around like heaps of leper leopards, as the ones that were skinned and walked with the most peculiar caught, and most distraught of riders whom had come upon them. For what was the good deal of walking, and a good deal of talking between the great spirits which had shamed one another as to be put on sides, as to have been known without having themselves tried, they spoke of no contrivance, praying to one another as if to have been broken, spared. No more would they wait, until finally they spoke with the soul of a man.

‘Night you’ve come to us, you stumble so. I feel ever so likely that you’ve shone upon us as to have been called. You’re made out of an uncanny sturdiness that’s less inclined to have been bent and worn out. You’re a grand survivor.’

‘But, oh, great spirit made of light, you must come to know that I have failed.’

‘Yet you’ve come to our sight, though you may not have been made aware, where you stumbled, from the likes of it, no longer should you spare us of the pity talk. We know who you are and of what you’ve been wrought.

Know that this is not as simple as for you to have been placed to us. To have been brought to such an uncanny matter, know that we are not distraught.’

‘What have I done then if I did not take my own life? Do, I, as such even deserve to carry on, through such plains as which remains may do, to be met by such beauty that in other terms would be obscure, grand things, I still feel undeserving as to be long called.’

‘Then listen to us and listen so, that you may come to understand what’s kindly right, that you may do so to your feet be cut, that we may take from you.’

To which the spirits measured.

‘Only but a tiny cut, we need it to have formed the tunnel, it will be wrought to such a funnel, and you shall wake up in the body of a frog and you shall be sniffed along, then you will grand a peculiar man such vision as he would become the likes of a beggar. While he’s distracted, your soul shall float away, then it shall enter the weather, there you will cause a rain, then you shall throw the bolts of light by the time they stumbled upon home. Where you will wait, in the body of the stranger’s servants, enter as such, make a false diversion, insert a falsity that shall have him brought, to such knees that while the other men are busy and as such.

When you come to realize that you've driven the man mad, then you will undress him and make him walk the streets, escorted, contorted as to be laughed at, only to return the favor the same man had promised to another.'

'For what reason?'

'We're going to kill you otherwise, as you're not truly dead. We're going to disguise you into a pear, then we'll have giants eat you, all right?'

'I think I would not enjoy that.'

'I thought so too.'

And he considered it for a moment. It was hard, whether or not he'd come upon this decision and whether or not he'd like it. This peculiar proposal did seem rather uncannily, well, morbidly, he did ask for it.

'Then you shall be disguised into a pear, then eaten alive by a giant after you're done doing what we asked you, all right, Night?'

As much as was clear, as each card was dealt, one could not forget, ten of hearts, had to remember ten of hearts and not give up on it for no reason in the world. The card was but an anchor, it had to be, for some reason that could not be worn. Whatever agony would be encased, whatever thing as to be impressed upon them, they couldn't tell of it. That card alone was buried deep, through the planted roots and the most peculiar chips which were eaten by men. During such a day, during such a rain and most peculiarly, they didn't know what happened there.

'A man is stranger, upon which he talks no friendly wager that may come upon him. He is but a blasted antiphony, he is but senseless, I know this man, get away as well, or I shall beat you all within an inch of a broom's spell until you will have bled on streets.

But, oh, poor little one, what had happened to you, and who had put you down your feet?'

'I lost my sense, don't look at me, I cannot rest until I stumble onto it again, where am I, oh sweet reminder and who are you to look upon me, a man who is no stronger than any other man who had been him. I fear, I fear that I may've come to near the wit's end, that which takes away from man.'

He was elated by some reason. For some reason, this was great, for some reason his mind was elated, a man near him. That he was, he just finished reason a dreadful tale, right after a few months of starting hundreds of them, and going by each and every one whenever he pleased, yet displeased of such a pious life, he'd come onto this elation that was almost orgasmic as to make him feel so kindly, less distraught, he felt like god. He was god, that person who was eating outside the inn, where he'd been seen, he'd finished the last page, he was it. The greatest creature that's ever existed; so proud of himself, he felt so proud of himself for having finished something. It made him feel great, even though he started at the pages like a bumbling moronic horse riding mongrel with little to no brain in his head. He couldn't explain why he felt this way. But it happened, and there was happiness, he felt happier than no other man alive, he had been distraught yet this had been his day, he was after all a god, a deity, a supreme lord who felt as if each page, could turn. And do as he pleased and do as if to mourn. There was nothing stronger than this feeling here, which burst through his heart which was on the yearn of which the likes of men would never know of until it disappeared. Then and only then they'd know, of the lesser things which entered them, after each throng, for hardly fought and better knowing, all the part of his mind activated as if he's been thrown the gauntlets and the robes, him no longer but a lord or lousy man but something uncannily supreme, an essence of its own that could not be put through. Such essences as sinew, pouting, the servants mounting, a crowd amassing as they worshipped him by the streets; to the surprise of which, from the dark corner, that not even Night himself could understand what happened and where this utmost peculiar disorder had started from. And there, in the distance they saw, and asked of the man, who just came to life.

'Great lord, whom essence appears to protrude out of his body, listen to thee, I need to be listened, listen to me, for I've come to ask you this.

Your power is might, your destiny has set you on a path that's right, and since you've stumbled upon such a corner of this world as to be inside our town and look upon the plains that may be called home, to so many of us, I am the first to ask of you of this.'

There was an on-going parade around him, on the streets. People were celebrating.

'I am Hawk, a man who had seen it first sight. I know what it can do, I know of what light get destroyed and benign, twisted and tried, tiresome as to escape, from the pocket.'

Which was in turn but not a cauldron but a peculiar chest that had been bloated and appeared to grow, a prison to fit the creature inside of it, that even then grew in side and girth as to show. A chaos inside of it, hiding as to hide and please, whom hid inside and little matter, what settled after, the sight of plains and thorough laughter.

An echo in the distance faded, the drop inside the pocket, ended, for the great being whom wore them inside, he walked between this world, through this worn. Wherever his pockets went so would his giant shape, always spread, as to find a way in and see the world change. And every man would but chance sides, they would not see him until the moment of their demise. For only empty sockets could see him rose, from the spot he was one, gloated and perilous.

Dreadful as to move and stare, out of eight mouths that were burnt and snared, by a most peculiar many faced belt, all of which but laughed at them. The belt was the evil; the many headed beast under its command, of which body was rotten, deep inside. Hairy and chained, the white feet of a giant man but sutured to the rest of him, such an uncanny thing. The smoke coming from a dark cigar, a cut-through trunk he had smoke and put inside, for storing. He could not see the world, but knew, unknowing. That he was walking on clouds.

It was then that Hawk asked this man, who had, all of the sudden shown such an exertion of force that he thought it necessary for him to destroy it.

'You need to ruin his pocket and everything he hides inside.'

'Who's pocket?'

'The smoke being, that's better wrought us for the better time, from the dawn of many a lays and farther than any mind could stretch as to convey.'

‘Why would I bother with one that’s born of fire?’

As they couldn’t have known what was wrought on the other side or what would put them down as to thrown them in the most uncanny pyre. Where they would to be wrought, stung and tortured.

There were armless people with red bags on top their heads and bodies, which had coal-drawn frowns and incredibly detailed eyes on them. They walked incredibly fast and constantly stomped everything underneath the soles of their feet; they followed the belt of evil. Walking in flocks, hundreds of them, moving faster than flies; nothing could be spared any longer, regardless of how hard they tried pushing in and out, always heaving higher and mightier until everything was but put down.

What hid beneath the sacks? No one knew. Not wanted to disinfect the cries.

And there was their plot of green dusted pulps

No one wanted to approach, it was settled just as much as nothing.

‘I am the one who shall finish this world and make it mine.’

He’s made it through the most benign matter of woe, through he crafted but a sword made out of sutured mongrels, hundreds of them, thousands, of many filthy breeds, all asking for death, their heritage lost and weeping. The sutures hurt, they bled and worse. Blackened by eyes, and mostly tawny and wrought, scrawny and mostly swarthy, they were but put to good work, stopped from lazing around, to their better shouts.

Most uncanny of things it were, a giant thing that hit and swerved around, and lost to every kind of pain, thrown and tawny verses uncanny, wrought in such disgust and couth.

Elsewhere on the country side

‘And whom might I have the pleasure of entertaining this night as to have perceived him stumbled on eight legs during a time such as this when no one else will have stumbled upon my stupor?’

With the incantation already done as he could cherish his own heart being but the end-beginning point of a herd of big goat herders who had stumbled upon his secret home as they were but drawn by nothing else other than what he would call, unless he was so inclined to make a fuss or a point out of it, a grand charade where he had burnt lamb and wool as to have made himself an altar upon which the clans were treading upon, thinking themselves rather fancy as to say that whence and where the next reanimation might happen.

The resurrection was an insurrection which only brought the most damned creations out of their broken lands that they might beg such elation as to employ the coming of a near-found lay. Where they might stay there and kill the time.

‘There’s nothing going on in long miles, where they walk, where they talk and where I may do such kindness as to lay aside my mind for a time.

I want to drink out of the well, but I know there’s but a long drop there where. It’s empty.’

‘What is, my dear man and what would you happen to talk about when the times come, I want you out of my house, I want you plain in the head and of flights.’

He had his hear strung out and kept on a kite. It was still beating, the wire was but a pumping thing, of long appeal, and he was rather happily forlorn for he had done something, of much eel.

‘I am filled with such power that may enter me soon after even after I will have been gone, for I know I’ve come upon such a realization as to have made up my mind entirely of what’s been happening over so many days because I’ve stumbled upon a desire to know her.’

‘The maiden of your dreams that’s been ever-happening to appear inside every corner that might bring such appeal as to curl your sufferings to a stop when the times come and bring you back home that your heart might be called, so I could finally realize that you’ve become a man such as those I’ve seen in far more distanced lands where your heart would not fare well?’

‘Of course, I saw her again and I must tell you that I faked this innocence and surprise for no other reason but the mere shock as I’ve told you before, or may’ve forgotten to do as such. The well of my dreams had no water inside and I was but so happily placed that my heart but saw such wild embrace that I feel so rightfully forlorn that I am so much so set up such throne that I’ve brought but such a determination to my myself, having decided right here. Today, I shall leave the house.

I set out to search for that maiden that I will make my wife.’

‘But lo’, your journey is over before it’s even begun.’

‘And why is that?’

‘I’ve lied to you as well, my dear friend and I’ve got no reason to defend myself or make you forget about what’s happened in the past and in the near future that you may fully be made to last. I think it’s not for me to say anything or make it so there’s even, remotely any kind of nuisance to be called.

I’ve killed rats and I dress in hats made out of their corpses.

But one of the rats is actually the maiden.

Come, I shall show you.’

Both men being just as surprised to enter the room and be met by the table who had in the middle of it, nothing else but what? Exactly the scampy-nettle, the rat-hat which still squirmed, out of which a while one but stood there and mourned; for she knew her husband to be would eventually find her only to have found out himself that it was too late for him to have found her, since she was nowhere to be found.

‘That rat is missing.’

‘That rat who is my wife? To which I’m sworn to be wed to? That I have dreamed off throughout my life?’

‘Is there any other?’

‘My mother, she was but a woman of the human kind, her upper skull above the jaw was a rat, a lower one, and it looked peculiar and I think that rat only ate my mother and pretended to be her.’

‘Was it a giant one?’

‘I suppose it wasn’t since I could but judge by the frame of a small coin that she had done her fair share of eating, completely devouring her so.’

‘You must be flogged.’

‘But I am candle.’

And they set on searching from there, wonder, out. Until they’ve come to realize that she was no rat and that was only her coat, and she was revealed and torn, split open with stitches. Halnt but turned to Wontelly.

‘I’m sorry Wont, but I.’

Both men were stopped, an evil creature appeared out nowhere, brought to the scene by sense of evil, vileness much to which it had been distraught, it couldn’t be believed no longer, not that it was to be brought. Fear was in its eyes, but the tattered torn-up clothes it bore, they were nothing to be laughed at, for they bore, but little prehistoric miniature-blades, which were embed in the embroidery which soon launched and put an end to her suffering. Malefic foe, to which should know. He wouldn’t dare make a move, both men were but prepared to prove that there was nothing to stop them, nothing to put an end to their daring, utmost reed of destruction that might claim their lives as well as it could destroy and put an end to the blind spot which lay inside their hearts. Such cruelty served no one and would not bring no man to death. An early grave awakened, it was the sun, or at the very least, shaped as one.

‘Lo’, we are both weak and unprotected, for maiden we have ended, as I, Halnt but drove her to suffer of such cause, as my eye had turned to such distraught, to have made her suffer of the past and of the future woes, of the wrongs that I’ve earned my spot in the most places of agony such as which not even death would be as kind as to lay a song to my name.’

‘Keep your mouth shut and your songs for later.

Which one of you is Eustache? ‘

‘Neither, good man.’

Spoken out of turn, blasted with a needle rack which shot but a small cove, it shot through the side of his jaw, exposing his canines and the teeth on the side, from which he wouldn't rise today.

'I need a breather.'

'Neither man.'

To which he hadn't spared either of them.

'Damned these nasty instructions, there could be hundreds upon hundreds upon hundreds of countries spread within the place, I couldn't even bother to lose myself in such a disgrace. Damn this place, I need such leave as to find a place to be.

But where might I find such a place, where could it be?'

He found Assityus.

Who was bust resting on bark; if ever were the land green, and yellowish within the rays, he but stood upon a nasty bed of trunks, open and brought down, with the gaps being covered with their blood, and little ants crawling on top of him. Brought back to life but a pump, he looked dead for now. Open-exposed, his chest but rose; the pump entered through it, thrown on the side, yet the hose kept jerking like a snake. Should I do it? Thought Clesske, who would just as soon do nothing else, or to be brought alone, he would've done it and put whichever need to test. He had to do something just as soon, before he'd swoon into the old habits and nastily, of a wont, he started actioning the pump and froze right as the man rose.

'Who awakens me?' Assityus asked, looked around, the little pale-dark thing in his eyes. It was something that couldn't be made out, something that not even he would be proud of pushing past. To have him there, in such a place.

'What I've seen down there, follow me.'

From whence he came out of, he grabbed Clesske and they both entered bark, flight of stair, and wooden-grabs, of which fingers went around their sandals.

They were in wood and broken walls, the sky was dark-blue overalls, with little bolts of blue-salt, and runaround sea-air coming from the ground. Sea-sand with fish-looks and little eyes, on the ground, a dock-town but run through and run-down; a sad sea looking in the distance, waiting for the blue-heart to come, the harpy, but they didn't speak of it and from the looks of it Clesske took with him the kite-heart, with the tube-out, in a sky of twilight, a groove of boo. Phantoms see-through, but they were not there, not really.

'I've come to know, that you should snatch a little show from him?'

'From who now?'

He pointed at a quasi-white little domed-flat houses that looked like they were assaulted by flaying oyster-riding men with no arms, of which gigantic gaping mouths, and they had no noses either, spat giant seeds that were but crystalline and shattered in the air, disintegrating at that. It was beautiful.

Both of them entered the house. Their hearts were set, and grand. A great composer was busy working on a most peculiar pressure device. Each little thing attached to the great rack of stones produced a sound of the many put together pipes. They sung little songs, and they wore heads on top, of scum. Everything was unclear in the room. His body rotated out of place, and ripped itself out of it. Leaving a levitating head, pair of arms and legs continuously working while the chest greeted them; a great thing within itself and mightily effective, a toast to the composer.

His chest arose.

‘What have you come here for at such a late hour in the night?’

Can you not see that I’m busy, and you’re disturbing me? You’re uninvited.’

‘We seek a man to kill.’

‘We are?’

Assityus was up to no ruse and this peculiar thing but, truce. How could he kill, little thing? How could it? And then he’d seen, though it took a lot of thought action and a lot of concentration, he’d seen it all.

Shores of blue choral singing, with little sparkling gems, dark mountains everywhere, but blue of many hue. And little flying rocks as well; further in the distance, yet, they called this place the Quarry Lay.

There was evil beyond, but he was not to be brought there.

‘One of you must leave.’

The chest grunted, thought it could’ve just as soon embarked out of the way, and made it through just as soon as he could stay of a mind.

‘But, not before I tell you of the founder of the city.’

‘Since we haven’t asked.’

It was a long time ago.

Upon the plains of sparkling sand of jewelry-round there stood, across the precious pearls, and many stood and shone but verse. There rose one who stood benign, thrown upon the back and tried for what were but a few more years, incapable of losing such appear.

‘Thine pit from which you sprouted by such case as it could be, by all means was it, an unfathomable gulp in sand from which not even the most dormant of beasts could ever produce such a thing as to make it through it in time before their likes would be drowned by it.’

At the very least, whatever he considered casting up, for what was fair and for what cruelty could be placed on their backs alone, one could no longer turn their blandness upon such cast as to forget what set them on the fair path to least of all yet begin again and forget what kind of world they entered through up the other. When upon their faces and upon their dreadful marks there came nothing more and nothing else but most peculiar of all unnatural acts that could claim them during the night’s most foremost hour, when upon such dreadful wails they began appearing yet again as if through such existence as to be called. Whatever the reason one could not forget of their magnitudes of which, they stall before they disappear. From the dreadful world from which they appeared, they had neared such fates, all rose and upon the land they fell.

Always a trail, of dreadful roses for whichever reason they remain in pain as if to see, whenever they come into the eye, the reason or which they were there was rather sullen. And calm, they weren't even getting closer to putting on their skin-rats, on top their faces, these brats would not do a thing. It was insoluble, their might and what they themselves had least of all come to stumble and recede, back from where they started during such an age as they've been. Of all too much vileness they've been conceived upon the hour.

'We are met today in this parcel of might, where the last remnants of a conceivable light is dead, decayed, far from beneath the wails, upon which they stood, there before we even came to embrace the last remnants of this place, that we may come, upon being approached as the hour comes, to the last piece of humanity's renown. Of golden crown which torn in piece.

When the king charged the crystal beast, we know of what has come of it when the end of all but begged to come.'

'Who shall speak now?'

'We must hold our tongues, he rises, he rises and now he's come.'

And thence he rose from the depths of such gable and upon such marble as all to see, such remnants of a body, such as it came, upon which remains it may not walk through. Unremarkably, habitual-tainted, this creation, all so tainted had but come to life, incapable of holding itself upon the line, they wasted no time and came again, once again to approach in vein.

There were at least set.

Later.

'Dreadful thing what have you done with me and where have you cast me that I may not even know what comes beneath my path when I am met by such curiosities as if to know of nothing less than what has entered me after all this time I stand upon the shards that make the roof upon which I lay under, that I may call upon you when needed as I need remind you now, of all places and all there is to be, I've decided to ask of you this much.'

'And what shall be made of your promise and of our disparity once we are done of your command, to cast upon your back what was long done in your name, long before we have stumbled upon you and of your vileness as to know. What shall be done of the man you have sworn to keep alive when the time drew backwards as to be told, and be completely shattered and put to shreds, in daylight as through night when the incantations that are but mildly put and least of all yet forgotten when, you asked of us to come upon the grace of the land? And will you allow us to finally put an end to the vileness that he spread on this land, when lord of lord, have you come to an arrangement for what is there and what we came to ask of you, will you be pleased to find out in finality that we have taken their kindness in distraught as to call upon their unworthiness and disgust?

We of the men who have sworn to hang the most uncanny and most distraught of them have finally come onto the conclusion that they are not wont of living and they have slowly become corrupt as to be poisoned by their own blood which may be called as to be tasted, of the taint and much was wasted in their waking as the boils whom had become of them to which surroundings now we know off. Shall we not call upon them upon such time of execution as to remind you who owns these plains of might and of little more than there if left of the frightful quiet that is left after they're gone?

'But what shall be made of them in that case, if one such as you would call upon me to keep on my promise, upon the slaying of the man I spared, as to breed such vileness as an order of commands that, you of all should see that they had taken away from me, even before such time as which I have been born with and born so, ever so cruel as to take my claims away and whatever will I may have left by their taking, will I of all not be allowed to take what I can from them and move along? Should we forget such facts as they bother me with going along in such makings of such quiet that have indeed been brought to my putrid heart, to such forgotten days as I will be commanded to act with when, I of all will not even be alive for long enough to meet each claim and what's been taken of me, and long taken away might not even be the choice of the life-sparing or the life-taking as for what I've become, a servant of theirs, upon the death of which, what shall be of me and what will I be brought to?'

'You, a servant should know ever so much better that there has never been a chance of you, of all men, of all the servants that may have come and stumbled upon him to meet face to face, as if on equal ground, of lords who had become the land itself and are encompassed and engrossed in such evil ways as to claim whatever they can and whichever sign of life might be allowed to bear forth in the time of their arrival, would you not simply give in as to be the first to claim them upon the arrival of which but signals the coming of an age, the termination of such plague that the men, women and children who had once but spread along the plains were nowhere to be seen by the time they had decided to come in and finally grasp the tear that's been left behind. By everyone who's lived as far as to leave a mark behind them, knowing that what they left behind was such a beauty of a live, such as one could see the flowers bloom, life flourish as it's never been seen during a time it's been let go? Will you, of all the people that may go along and claim this destiny no one else seems to bother as to claim such frailness as to face such an uncanny tide, whom suffered many pests to live and have but become as corrupt as them on the other side, will you not give pray and let away whatever kin akin to yours might not be taken away? Will you not be the blade that shall put an end to the man as to finally lay claim to such destruction as to have your name engraved upon their corpse, a slayer that may be met as king, to men such as wit as to know that you've but offered them such kindness as their kind would never know?

And of layman that may follow through, fine to have decided what had happened as soon after, will you not allow them to come to a pass, as to allow their hearts to march on and claim what was their ancestor's rite of passage as they might claim upon such claims as to reclaim upon such pain as no one else has pained himself to go through, in order to get what is rightfully theirs?'

'But who's to say that's theirs to take and who's to say I'm one of many or lesser ones to be called as to claim the life of which sanctity might finally be ended, the end of which might not come under light but scrutiny of such end, which may destroy all if chance be so, when one such as you, upon coming to the conclusion of the age, shall record nothing else but false wit and vileness from my side as to paint the monsters who had claimed the land as good and frail, and me a vile thing, evil within but evil who wails as to have tried to kill a child, undeserving, you a scribe who's wit has always been proven to itself as to never be ending when it comes to the nastiest things such a rotten creature like yourself would paint itself with, such brushes with bristled that were made of manes, of men your kind tricked to sacrifice in vainness as to be claimed as nothing else but a falsehood that's been taken and that's been fair.'

'Enough of this pestilence, for I desire to hear naught of past acts and what's to be done, for I deem that what we've discussed before had already been come to be resolved, in which case I know and shall let you know as follows that you as a man shall do naught else but finally repair and to refrain yourself from such supremacy of words and of cowardly swords as to stall and take leave from something you were promised to. For, I know the better as for each claim of yours shall only bring you forth to the day of the suffering, from which not even someone like you may follow through as to cower after and make in flight, as such repository of disposition may be called, you of all shall come to pray upon your last days of suffering but you shall pray in vain as the boy shall be killed by your hands and none other.'

'So be it in that case, I shall never lose my embrace of quietness as to have lost myself in such fortitude as to resolve living with myself in such a dark age as you have claimed yourself to have lived through that might follow after, my own kind, be it blasphemed if it remembers me as such.

I shall do it and I stall no more, bring me the boy, and call upon your lord and let us settle it at once, then be brought to silence.'

In which case the day of much forlorn evil and distraught darkness had come after, without facing such malignant silence as to waste upon on the coming of the dark days when not even such countenance as may be felt could bring itself forward as to lain in such vanity. A fragment of malignant, such as there in this case, reality was but come to be in such a place as there it to fall, under the rooted graven cove upon which the parcel of land was brought to where millions of lords were but put through such sufferings as to be made to wait. Upon a scene of white pain, where both the Scribe of Ages past called Euphyras and the Man forlorn of cast aside Thlyete were brought for, to attend as such one may say, and pray upon the soul of the boy Myepias.

Such countenance as theirs was long before forgotten and just as soon after when the time arose as to call upon him, boy who stood upon his ankle froze, to understand as one in his place were to know what comes after and once again when one was to call and stumble upon each word that was put forth to the boy as to recall every crime as well as every joy he came upon when he was but a child as to an ankle sized thing when he was but in the womb of his mom, to recall her beauty and her kindness as to remind one of the innocence one may bring forth into the world long before the destruction but followed on, of fairness such as the kind of which he had never felt since, he was but reminded again, of her beauty when they came to tell. Read upon such rich parchment fading as to remind him of the flaying and of the praying mantises and of each rotten thing that crawled on top of it long before the grass blades rot, he was told of tolls he had to pay and of every little petty theft he had committed, yet there was no crime, as to pin upon such child as for the time they were called in, upon such plainness as to be. He of all would be remember, as to remind them, all, if one at all.

‘Where I walked and whom had claimed me, for those blessed days were but blessed in the making as to remember and remind me of what and who I am, when the time, and upon such blindness I wear but the cowl of destruction and let forgetfulness come after, but I of all lads do remind you that I was not alone and I, of all should not be judged as thus.

For when the claims had happened, upon such time when I was caught, I was but alone, forced to shone upon such dark plains like a single light uncannily away from the others of which such treacherous appeals would shine even brighter than I might come to feel. I of them am but one and of them I may remain as thus since there’s no reason for me to be, as they be, a little lad that’s trialed when one could clearly see that I’m but conceived to be as thus, a little boy to fit the mark as to be put under such trial as for show, and be at that, guilty without reason other than that I was with them at that.’

‘I grow impatient of hearing of this as thus, and I’ve decided that.’

Upon the turn, the other brothers joined him as all.

‘We’ve come to decide that all three of you are to be killed, without trial within the hour, we shall but belittle you with such disembowelment as to push your guts away upon such plains of desperation that may be made to be destroyed long before your time might come and as thus we’re not to offer you a chance to fight back as that would only be a cruelty that no one should suffer of.’

And within the hour they were trapped, disbanded, thrown to side and forbidden from moving on from where they stood. In regards to the decision which was taken by such keen sense as to arouse their deaths when the time arose, during such width of which their entrails might’ve been spread and shared between each vile man as to be called upon the first and foremost day when they might call upon each wail, then as it happened, there was little to no countenance for their vile days were over. Upon the hour, when one was to call, upon such deaths as to be shared between all of them who made the land in evil and to bask, they had dragged but everything in front of a mild-looking mad town that came to their mad-fruition, as they were but surrounded by evil day and little more than one could allow by such day, they were met by a kind man whose back was but expended many-a man’s worth until they pushed farther in the back as to make one count, upon each trunk that sprouted on every side he bore an additional head, until one could at the very least see that there were eighteen calling all rounds and to be called as such, there was no reason any longer, for what was to be pushed, at all, in the distance there being a wail. His daughter of such beauty was but chained in the middle of the town, in the air, held by two houses where her legs split and at her feet but children’s playing. Many of whom were saved. Of such thing that could be called away, not to be weary of what might be conveyed, there was as much as one could see, there was no reason to be anywhere else and not to be too cruel as to sing a song of madness and of pity for whom was also present, but the patchy-disc which was benign, underneath the town, underneath of which there stood but features of frown and various takers of the most malicious forms that might be tainted if one were to forget what crawled inside of him, the horn of many guts being just made in the shape of whom was the person brought to them. It was walked out of the Kind-man with such insolence as one could afford only if he was born out of some vile god and sworn upon such wild lances as to cast himself upon the flying eye that followed strands of glasses, which referred to not such a wild thing but the flying head that held within, such sockets as to allow just one. When the time approached, instead of what was worth and instead of carrying as one they but followed through with as deepening of such sinew as to never call and never be of worthless day, and not to understand what came after, he opened himself, upon a wail. The mad land but following their countenances as the men, women and their fangs, which is to say that all of their children were but infected without even the slightest remorse one could see the reason why and they could and might just as well accept that there was no return from what happened there, and for what was worth, the beast saw them from inside out and they formed saw-like blades that were but sprouted out by such primitive insides-machine such the likes may not be known. As fuel what they owed was to a fairness as the air that was around them which began the apprehension of every single little peg that entered their heads, moving towards it finally as they offered to take first cuts, to which he refused to pretend he, the first of the millions of beings cared at all, since now, the time had approached when the disintegration would bring such roach to heart as to realize that there was by no means any way out of what was bound to happen, no soon after, they were just as soon made to know that there was but no escape and there would be none as well as they but flayed themselves openly as to show to the villagers that there would be no kind of resistance that might happen after, in which case, there was a chance in pace, as the disintegration of the remains that followed through appeared to be done, in which case not even the slightest men of known regard might have a due of say, for lo' what had happened there that day, was such complete destruction that one might want to wonder what was in the minds of those who feared the beast that had but rose only to be carried on through such pity, then killed, then lost within the hour, not to be completely ruined but after they but had a fear and ate every single humanoid formation that was made of land.

Of evilness they knew about but would hear after, since that piece which entered them was but tainted and would only be as cruel as to destroy everything and once again, one could not forget what entered their dire hearts as soon as they were about the hour of the day in which they cast out, the first, yet the last, the ones that were but trying themselves not to laugh, for they were petty and they were little. Little, little fiends with no more than their bridle bones and eighteen limbs which were but formed within the frame of their backs, all of which grabbed what they could, be it briar stick or a rock, and they charged the village, them being servants of the lords, and their eyes shone with such darkness that it was brimy-red and might as well be called for what was instead. A putrefying thing that could not be called for no reason any longer, no more than it would be allowed, for sin had followed through.

'Enough, enough, I beg of thee, dark creature not to slaughter me at such an hour as I've done but little to naught to deserve as much as to ask of you, as I may now, to understand what's in my heart and know that I've done what I could and what I might out of fear for what your masters might to as to employ such pain and agony upon my house of wails that might destroy and call it off, that I may be brought to ruin such as I may understand that there's no such thing as piety to them, and I find myself guilty of the destruction of yours, and yours as well.'

But the creatures didn't listen at all, instead they had resolved to do as they might and claim the man as to be destroyed and be put to such toil that he might be gotten before he had a chance to spoil himself in heart, which may be ridden and put to waste. He of all would not survive such change in scenery as to see that they could not kill him, none at all. As they've seen that just as soon as rock hit head and joust with such remains as to attempt to end and slay as many of them, one could not prevail since they had absorbed the vile essence of their lords, in such uncanny thing that might not even peel the skin, from which such antler'things might rise and spread, not eve them, not even them, not even them could be allowed to push through and abandoned whatever wail there is, to put it through, as one could see that they could only slaughter and slaughter, upon the hue of which they painted the town but even then, upon the hour of which, every pint of blood having been done for, the men would be remade as would be their maidens, to which in few hours after this onslaught and this assault had ended, they realize that their lord was not ended, but now he was stronger than ever. For their eyes began to glow and their eyes began to glow and theirs and theirs, as well as well until no one would be spared for what was going on there, as it happened for every single vile man, and every single one of them to be called as well kept such might as to become the first and foremost symbol of such destruction and lost satisfaction as one could see. From the depths rose bitter-looking throngs and thorns and plenty of black-song cords that followed through with flutes and pipes and many organs would delight, while they were all become a legion to spare, even the servants whom become the land as well. With one exception being the lost daughter who simply stood there still chained, being ever so much as to be incapable of doing anything else, she stood there, knowing that there wasn't anything she could do about it, toiling with such hopelessness as to come and as to stumble upon herself, as there was no time to come, as to realize that her heirs were just as gone, her family being but distraught and done. But she, all of the sudden was no longer chained as she just rose there, released as well from bounds and became, no longer humane but in the chimes of the incantations and of the wails, she was but evil in arm and head and grew in the most peculiar shapes, as her throat expanded as to be a baboon-whale-like extension, with many satisfying elation, as those peculiar big-fated almost galleon like fattened thing but started drawing in what was left of her body until she started wriggling around, no longer being capable of pushing herself, then her time was but to come and be put to spare, as that man began groaning and became but over encompassed in hairs, which all pushed out and formed, the trench-like depressions that looked as if they were made by a comb, from which the skin-taps replicas but fell in such a piety as to create the bloated versions of which fealty called upon this reality alone, where the strange beings but knelt and asked of her to do as she would do in order to serve her seeing how they were met for the first time but such an effigy that not even their likes could deal with any longer, nor would they do as they pleased in order to survived the bloated nature that carried them inside as she opened and greeted them all, but not inside-inside of her, instead, from her bowels a cartilage like foundation but released itself and slowly descended as to allow them inside the cabin. Through which, now she revealed the insides of her carcass in which she hid the most unnatural things that not even her, as she wouldn't know, knew what was inside of her or at her feet. Too much evil in there, despite the flaps that were left after, this opening in her belly being nothing but a wild disaster, as a roast beef which was only natural for a woman like her, through which, beyond the cabin, shone upon them. But her many organs put behind and blinded as to be for every kind of woe there would be, as to encompass the dread and the release in satisfaction that one could see himself doing and undergoing into such attempts, to go ahead and butcher her head, only to torture her for hours, for what she'd become. At the top of her grand mule-like top which bloated upon a point formed such a structure as one would not dare meet eye to eye as to meet such decoy as if to die of such reason, one was met by just as much, with little more than it would be allowed, to feel such a coy device of long-torn formation, a wheel of mad emanations that only drew and spread, from every angle until everything was wildly encompassed and allowed to move ahead.

It was a subatomic platform with eighteen floating bull-like heads which were moved along as if they were metallic as well as they were moved by magnets, being lead into her body, it was her body without a head, without fingers or toes, spread in the air, floating as they began the most uncanny flight that could not be stopped by any means, there being something in the air, an unnatural scent made out of eighteen ship-like flying seed-shapes made out of many peculiarly torn-out of their cemeteries people, all of which but followed through, being shoved inside the flying structures, no longer being capable of stopping, having their guts completely incinerated in the quasi-dark hollow of their great shared-it bowels, where there stood but an uncanny flame as that of a stove.

Alas of poor words as their countenance could be said of such, they but flew away and out of sight, not to be seen or be peered upon by likes of laymen that may throw such countless wonders as to know, or to show as little of their lack of compassion, but a dark man froze upon the mad rafts from which he dreamed about being lost in place.

‘Dear me, dear me, will you help me see along the road, I wish as little as there be called, I wish I could find what I lost. It’s my treasure you see, a treaty I seem to have lost somewhere along the way, where the butcher’s daughter had swollen in, as to have sealed its marks with pettiness and liver.

I ask this of you, if you would.’

‘I shall boil your heart if you don’t.’

What was that if not an echo from the delightful face, blocked by a bars shaped gaps of a face. In there he was drawn and would’ve starved if it weren’t for the reminder.

‘I shall give you a threat Tholmen Hossermay. Hold onto this little cake I’ve baked this early, it should offer you the needed strength, when need calls but munch it up and you shall find a way.’

It was poisoned.

He did not expect that.

Hours upon hours he but puked past the bars, seeing how his nimble feet were at a whim’s end, after that. He was brought back to know, and would’ve shown some act of compassion if it weren’t for the very fact that his heart but beat in the wrong way. Tholmen considered as much, he could’ve returned and put an end to the man, snapping his frail neck after, but alas, he considered just as much what that meant. Wit only brought a wheat’s end, if he were to set fire to the grounds so he could have him starved by winter. Yet that was petty and he’s shown himself to promise.

‘This could be a hole in the ground, this could be just another trap I could shove myself in if I’m inattentive, which I am not.’

He’s shown himself to bring us forth. Little perilous things that were smoldering as soon as they moved on through bar and through fire and what came after being just as well, nothing worked as to be improper, the urge only drawing soon enough after.

He made through the bars with a blunt fist that entered through steel and past.

‘I used to be like them, you see? I use to scour the land and be, it wasn’t so, it wasn’t likely that I’d show but I see no reason to be there, amongst them, now that I know.’

‘Who is speaking from the wells that spill from the ceiling, I see no tell.’

‘Please tell me you’re hearing the same thing?’

‘I fell through the grates, I remember the poison having made its effect. My limbs were split, I see no feet and nothing that may be done as well.’

‘But of what are you talking now, good man since I can see that with all this solemnity, you’ve lost something of yourself on the way out, when you came and made it through and made it yet in half I knew you would return several times as if to prove us something we might’ve have known. Yet at the same time I can see and I’ve known that there wasn’t any reason and there hasn’t been one for you to show any gratitude of us having gotten rid of.

Our fair maiden has sickened you on and off for thirty thirsty years.’

‘But oh, how could I not remember such a thing? How has this happened, how could it happen that I, of all men, to bear no memory within the hour, what happened to my mind before you tell me allow me to come to no spoil and come as I may, please don’t tell me that by the time I will have made it through, I will forget everything you’ve spoken to.’

‘You, and you will forget, but don’t mind it for it won’t matter, good fellow, since now you’re to stay here forever in our gut.’

‘I’ve been eaten?’

‘For eighteen hours but now you’re numb and made to feel the sting of pain as to look in vain above of you as well, as to see the three openings that are my mouths from where you’ve been brought and where you will stay until properly dissolved good man.’

And with that he died, taken and claimed before his time.

But the nasty witch Leonora Pirrplebehst continued to lure as many men as she would.

At the wrong trenches stood the wenches

And they were ugly yet servile and would do anything but for a man who’d come at the with a shiny join to jiff something before ground saloon and on a swoon as to do with himself with her and with him when soon enough they were joined by a man with a doubloon that was shaped like an amoeba. He had come out of nowhere and but entered through the strange brothel, after he had seen himself after he had gone through one but beautifully wasted, bare chested with no pay soon after they had banished him without knowing and without say.

That beneath the brothel where there stood but a giant body, lost as soon, it was fat and many titted with no head. It came to either one of them, for man that would rise and would move and get out of his way as to be with her soon after, as to ask.

‘But sweet maiden, where might thou be taking me at that, since I couldn’t conceive of such a thing as to hear my heart beating for what happened and what did after, I seek only such a thing that might be given away, I pray that you may be allowed to come again when my pockets are but emptied and in need as I am, please, oh please dear maiden, give me something that I may shove my face against for I am but a man of lost faith that cannot but move from where he's stood before, I may not be capable of contemplating forth but I seek in desperate lack of concentration that I may be given and taken and be as it may, I'm pleased to say.'

'Shut your mouth and take me where you may If that means that I may be allowed such pleasure as to be silence out of taking and out.'

Out of her moth, flaking came a pair of daggers that revealed themselves after to have been the opening of a greater mouth from inside her bowels it came out and threatened to swallow him so, but the man was just as soon taken from the brother and put into a world where he was forced by the strange keeper, in a strange colored heap of wheat-litter that swarmed around the electric dome, rotating along with the bodies of those who shone in the afterlife now gone they were pulled and put in death-graves where there were millions of reaper-shaped tombstones that were but too expensive to be anywhere, as for one to afford such a thing, not that it would matter, soon after he but asked if he were dead, incapable of contemplating on his own, and wont, he was aware that just as soon he was made to listen and to care and ask away.

'Where I am?'

But the figure would not answer, instead it cast him a level prior, through the soil in a peculiar room as for him to toil with pebbles and to count them, wrap them up, put them in a jar then continue after what he was doing, without any soul yonder to discontinue what he was doing, seeing how he was incapable of swooning, he was entered through a door that opened through the jar split on the floor and on him projected, opened and came forth, father of the farthest reaches, whom had called himself Estkelion.

And he was tall and bore but horns in back and wings that spread his legs, they opened and become like cracks, split open with the rest of him but open, as to reveal the most uncanny of secrets which were spoke with the weird-shaped bodies that came out of him, contorted as to look geometrically abstractedly surreal, as to have their feet disappear then emerge out of their way.

'I fucked a child.'

One of them said, and it was queer, and unexpected, this soul tormented and made to suffer after, it had many but uncanny rifts but strike his heart yonder as they stabbed and cracked and made to boil at last, they would not for their likes of them take a break at that.

'But why must I keep you company?

Oh wretched creature whose bowels is but disgust, whose prisoners I seek not to communicate to.'

And the strange figure but put him back only to bring another one out whose done far worse than that.'

'I stumbled upon such a dreary village as to have myself uncannily but cordially sneak as to walk peacefully like a boisterous dog in heat who was in search for a salacious bitch, and there I lay in front of her but split as I may, I took her by the corner hay and had her before she openly lay.'

It then proceeded to recall, the premature birth she had, and how she helped her just as soon to breed, and what they did to her, then add the leap.'

‘But is this hellish remain and a torture I lay in?’

‘Nay, it’s but a reminder, these bodies are but recordings of what I did after I left my house?’

‘Then what are you, oh darting creature and what might you have done to earn such features?’

For he was not only bold but looked as if carved along and done below, with a tire-iron and worse, a horse had ripped him so, as he was tied several times and made as if to show. Made for such example yet put together and made to wait.

‘Where are we?’

‘But inside her, the creature whom had eaten you, she’s but waiting another second to spit you out, and then when the time comes, a tome shall be written in disgust for everything you’ve done shall be properly recorded.’

‘What of the children then?’

‘I’ve lied about him, not them. But how did you know?’

‘So you have?’

‘Not that I could tell off, but I have ripped off some, I’ve committed the worst.’

Reminders of what was unlocked and what happened as soon as he opened his chest, a peculiar thing came out, unnaturally so, it started growing like a box-made of cattle that shot after and they spread since they couldn’t help themselves but grow when they couldn’t be made to wait. So many of them suffering of the mad-cattle disease, it was uncannily tainted and they were fiends, that couldn’t do. Waiting for them, elation, he heard the damned voice but split his head open, it blew, like a little pop-pop, right through. It came out, like a peculiarly muck-covered filthy arm, like that of a dead man who had made amends soon after but ate and ate until he was done, again.

And there was the three vales where they stood before they could be approached.

Corkus Crowcrop was but finally set in place as if to stand before one of the broken pillars of his dream. He who had but tainted the world with a glove was but put on to stand for the time and watch his little hand erupt as they were to be joined within the hour.

Of labor known and wretched cattle some but followed and but to flow after for what was to be called and when the timber burnt upon such hour cast upon them they yelled, shouted from where they lay, upon such marks and carvings, toys that were forgotten, by children never gotten, alas there followed but one retriever. He had but come out of naught and had but followed, at all, after one but moment, let alone would one but shatter woe, as if to ask themselves but yonder, never to have crossed the hold. For what lay beneath them and let around-around in such grounds as there were made to lay, peoples that were paranoid and let alone would they beware, the darkness of each cloud of death that followed from the infernal sky that was but there, in a cubical of stars that approached from far, as they couldn’t have settled to forget for what was worse, if not their kind, the death?

‘Worthless thing, I see that there’s but one to follow and who shall come after if not I, of man who’s plain and never knew which hold might reign upon each cradle where my people lay. The ones with brows of diamond brains, whom settled on this land uncanny even before such a worthless age as it should’ve been known and brought and made at that, I fear at that that I may not be called, from the suffering where ended as I am, where to lay and what to say, I ask this at least, that I may be allowed to.’

There was a stop as if they were but frozen in the white marbled specks that lay beneath them, glimmers of white and blue.

‘That was what I called upon you upon such night as there in which I lay no longer, now that there’s still time for me to ask of either thee, or I shall see it as fit not to see.’

‘What have we taken from you in such case?’

‘I do not know, nor do I seek to.’

‘I’m going to split your pusy.’

‘Do that, split me open!’

‘Right around the trims, I will.’

‘Split me then, don’t stop there.’

He was alone in the room for a reason, talking to himself, a god.

A giant torso-rib caged armor around him, darkened as for arms of chains, ringed pants and a scythe as well. A ghoulish appearance with a paleness as that of a draught filled with cognac, or what happens after a man takes eighty shots.

‘We shall begin to obey, when once we are told and not to lay for long.’

They called upon him to sire and not to break another vile, yet to fire, large empire where the cruelest of men there lay.

‘I could hear such countenance as you may have sired when the time drew near as for it to have been forgotten long before my, oh, my the man who stand in front of me who had wrought in face and in quiet such sculptures worth of admiration during such a time as I may ask, what is there missing from your grand Arch Duke’s like charade of chance and many shapes that might be called, where and what have you come to stumble as there is, upon?’

‘Where I lay, my dear compatriot whom had appeared out of the nether bowels that I may be expected to dwell upon as to year upon such wretched needs, I am to be told that I am to tell you, master Abhor, that you must seek of wretched thing, of plainness but a painted vase that you may bring upon the plains of sacrifice and shatter for our lord of demise that may be looked uncanny as to be made known.’

‘Bore oh bore, I am but to seek no matter and look in no other direction as at least I presume, you will do as you’re told and when left alone to your own devices, you shall know as such and match nothing worse than worsened of such acts, destroy what you can, the bonds shall appear in front of.’

‘What is there? What lays beyond your simple thought and where may I look and behind what wretch may I, to call upon you again in time of wretch and need and what comes after?’

‘Nothing, there’s nothing you may stumble upon, that you may draw upon my never ending appreciation of what has happened and what called upon you forth.’

There were just as many reasons to be there, in place as everything else. But no man would call upon him to watch the broken posts and what had been wrought into the bowels of such a torn land as one might find himself treading. He was but sent and asked for shredding, a giant toe appeared, it bore the eye of a dead-leper whom bore upon itself four large stringed iron-rods that were projected in the front as to leash and put inside of it, for what was worth and what came after it.

Followed upon some wretched perilous gazes, they could not be aware, nor stay, nor stare, not to look in any case for what might call upon them, it followed.’

Wretched being of yore be gone, it was as much as it could be gotten then and done.

Much evil and vileness lay in their hearts, as they were drawn forth to a flight of stairs and gone.

Evil and various

It felt like they forced themselves down there, trying to move in the dark, though it was no spirit, merely a speck of a thing made out of multiple roads that had been cut and had almost fallen through out of the decay pushed through years alone. Too horribly set.

But there, there was but a hare of a wish, which appeared to nastily come apart, and rose upon meeting him.

‘You know that this won’t last, right? You know that you cannot hurt that man whom he belongs to, Di’Dorko, Glaucoma needs and beckons to be killed.’

He spoke to him all of the sudden, seeing how he was on the shore. Although Argus but a man uncanny, looking upon a hare named Thoullen.

And Thoullen came so, without begging to be put forth or ever the asking.

‘Stop bothering me then.’

‘I will do no such thing.’

Then, without a slight remark, without shouting and without being in doubt, the hare shook of all of the hairs around its body and appeared to malign itself into a hardening puddle upon which the small anatomically deformed body spread like the top of a blooming flower. And in there, from all the whites, of which decay looked like a mild snow which dropped from below, from which a song unknown had lasted. There blasted but a single rock, a hardened lump it brought itself up and faster. Rooted, almost but nigh in earth, the creature which came forth was but a battered twist of a long-pole of blasted wings and guts, mixed with fat and other chemicals.

It mostly pouted but from those flowery dead eyes, a red and blue pushed through as if to make itself known through before being forgotten in a moment's watch. There it stood, desperately in touch. Bitterly pushed and dreadfully away, lay but a quieted one, waiting for him to say.

‘What do you want me to do, Thoullen?’

We’ve shaken hands already.’

‘But he needs to die and if anything, you’ve got our support if you want to cut in line and push through his guts. We’ll help you set a watch and wait and rightly so, when the night strike past midnight, oer’ the summer hour, four, our people shall carve a way.

It will be with this much ease that we shall satiate the wonder and push through, advancing. We’ll make it so the man shall be taken by surprise and when he least expects is.’

‘You want me to be the one who brings his demise?’

‘Rightfully so, I think of greater chances, I see the still but I shall not lose my wonderment on a sill. Know that my people are waiting beneath the ground, planted and paned as mines, ready to blow on a whim, and who and what occasion might thy be to push us away on whim alone?’

After all this preparation and journey longed for, would you seriously consider throwing all yonder, never forth and never tried?’

‘I do not know about this, but what man would stab another in the back?’

‘One whom knows the best of fates, for people whom are aware, that, that man is of a barbarous line and what he’s seen.’

Of bitter ships and on the racks of skin when songs about the ones who listened, of blasted chain holders and dead who sink underneath the ground, they would be tormented. For some of them were still elated to know of it and be reminded just as well.

‘He’ll claim your soul and push you away as he did with us, mark our words.

Before of death and true return, he shall be our jailor as he understood. There’s peril in stars and we have seen it all and he’s seen it just as well as ours. Will do to put us deeper in the ground and plow us until the last of us shall have no return. Know that this is what he will do to us.’

‘You’re paranoid.’

‘You will not mourn us either.’

‘I’m trying my best here, but I cannot face a man I shook hands with, it is something I’m not willing to do.’

‘You need to look at everything but in perspective. Most of it, already done, as we just balmily planted ourselves there.

There is no return.’

‘Then leave me be, I’ll have no part of it.’

‘You arrogant man, you will not hear the end of this.’

‘I’m sure I won’t, then go ahead and do what pleases you, for I shall do the best and hopefully, we’ll never see each other’s worth.’

Thence it left and bitter theft turned into their pass, and they had, after a while, never spoke. Alas, the night had come, and in a flint of desperation, furnace burning, in the brim of night before the hour stroke midnight, Argos had beaten upon the door. No more would he be met by the snore and the sound and the layman’s nerve, at last, there came the servant.

Though rubbed with feet of dames, he knew but little to say at the arrogation. Damned as he were, he but shouted and shooed away the man in mind, although his expressions were largely benign and not to be seen.

‘What is there left to ask of my master, has he not told you enough, Argos?’

‘I beg your pardon, but it cannot be, I seem to have missed something, such as the likes of which you wouldn’t understand. But pardon my intrusion, that I need to call upon your master again.’

‘He’s indisposed.’

‘What might that be?’

‘He’s in the built-in amphitheater, not to be dismissed easily and let alone persuaded to leave his home.’

‘I but wish to talk to him for once and once alone before I make my passing.’

‘And your entry has been denied.’

Though by large he could protest and at worst rip off his chest, Argos but turned and left. His bitterness but serving as a way to protest. On his way, he stepped on crab, completely smashing its shell in while popping its little legs in every possible direction. Bird oh supreme, it flew, during the night in sinew. Out of the sudden, it stopped flapping its wings in time, as if worked upon and flown by a metal long iron pipe, it had been slowly directed and thrown inside Argos’ throat. And thence he fell on his knees as he bled until pain had stopped him and the clotted nursery arose.

‘I pale with pain,

From here now on,

Here I’ve lain.’

Then he fell, devoured as well but a hundred waiting hares which rose. One of them blew up and took part of his head, his throat and upper chest, which bled away and mixed with sand. Everything else had to be put and messed with around, as the bacterium and the other hares ate and dragged the rest away in sand, through the tunnels and into their small hiding spots, never to spout another one out there. He died away slowly and appears to have felt pain right until the last moment when he lay with them, in their bosoms.

Long-trunk

‘This is a dark room we must be staying in.’

‘Must I be the only one listening to her wince and complain?’

‘I’m already done with it.’

‘Then leave, no one’s asked you to stay.’

He satiated no one by asking. John Long-Trunk always got in the way, he always managed to stumble one way or another for some reason only he would know or fail to reveal.

Clara, Robert, Croy and Den, it’s what they had now. Only the four of them remained, and as much as they were saddened to leave the wild ran-through deposit poison ground, they had to do it, toe-toe as well, since there was always the chance of being caught too quickly off their track. Not listening when there were disappearing thoughts they couldn’t like thinking off.

But most importantly, the butcher left into the dark and they were in another room which looked like the entry into some mine, or the insides of a pit-maker. With every device in the front, a defect of transmissions which would not go on no matter how hard it could be pushed. Although important stare, uncanny, there was no way to understand. Of which sublime direction, therefore, no one understood what pained a man to do it.

‘Who’s taken the life of that man?’

Robert coughed, sickened as well as he could come about the place and wonder. Distraught even as he could feel his skin stretched yonder. He wanted to piece it all together asking, and wait for something, skin-a-mocking. There was but a reason his mind was but malfunctioning, he was but met by a similar figure of eight feet and of puffy teeth which came out like cotton. And a lack of beatings of their hearts in both chests, wonderingly, what had happened then?

‘Has someone claimed by brother so?’

‘But who is he Robert?’

‘He’s Mark, I seem to think. I think I simply found him after all this time, I can’t explain it why, but I finally did it.’

Though he was just as shocked as one might be by what was happening to him. His head leaped out, his limbs, the eyes, the chest, the lower side of his legs, toes, suits, organs and every rib as if he had been entirely dissected in a second, while the glowing devices inside of them began pushing about before they all crawled out by whatever means they could. There were two broken windows, eight of them in total on the sides, but they had been smashed in order for every piece of him to go out. And there, outside, in the dark, every piece of him floated and started slowly levitating away. Some of them began growing and becoming random chunks of meat eaten by rowing paddle-shaped words, with the full length in the back, of cylindrical bodies that pushed out and ate what they could before disappearing out of the dark in an instant.

‘I don’t think you’ll ever see your brother away.’

One moment, for one moment, the rotten pieces all grouped up to form his brother. And there, in the dark Mark floated with the back piece of a giant welder that was constantly blowing and pushing liquid-shapes that resembled him and fell through the lake only to draw the worms again from hiding.

‘Don’t look for me, Mark.’

He said, while he spat a child out, the body of which had been ignored by the worms, as they allowed for its fall, as to never be touched again.

That child was touched and would be too benign to be settled on. Somewhere, wherever he ended up falling, he most definitely splashed and died. And not even the worms would draw from that puddle at all. It was to be completely ignored and left there to rot and never be touched again. Otherwise, his brother disappeared as a giant ball of skin formed in his chest, expanding like a control explosion which stopped at the mark beneath his throat, shoulders, part of his lower abdomen, until it disappeared. From inside of him, in the empty dark-gap, there appeared but a small point of light that pulled everything in, although not normally. First the entirety of his body had become something akin to many eat-cleaners, sticks with puffs which were his head and what was left of his body, segmented and many of many placated things. Disturbed as he were disgusted he was drawn in and consumed, never to be seen again. He was made to suffer as well, as he appeared again, this time, one of the worm-paddles, which had been enraged by this mockery as well as the sudden course of a river made out of the strange people, had entered his head and smashed the brain completely, causing him to finally disappeared, but not before bursting in a splatter of red gas.

‘We should leave this room now.’

‘But I want to see my brother, I think I finally have the confidence to be with him and never leave his side. I think there’s still hope, while I still have this knife.’

Robert was free to have his own choices made as he was content with everything he’s thought and done in the past. Both of them scoundrels, yet they were family, alas. Everyone made way, except for Long-Trunk who stood with him for a few minutes.

‘You must realize that this is not the way to go. I’m truly sorry that you must go his way, but I see no reason to allow you to stay.

You will harm yourself more than any direct contact might do and you would suffer ten times worse if you were to be caught.’

Through and through, the latter rowing, he had been battered by pain. Disgusted even, as if to lay.

‘Will you at least allow me a time for closure?

I need this.’

‘It shall be granted.’

And he was only as uncanny as he were, unable to stare for long, yet he knew it as well. As soon as the Trunk left, he was simply out of it, and walked away. On the first flat-wall, of which window-sills pushed through, many of the working clock-work rather having cut aloof.

There was another peculiar fellow who came from the other side of the road. His mane was bright, he wore a lion pelt, a great armored sword with many bobbling heads which appeared to be worth ten times’ the chimes the wolf with the strange wheel inside its head wore, named Hleignher.

He came from there, yonder. And he was stronger and would be met by none the wonder, for what he’s done along the way.

For he grew up poor and saggy, yet benign, as his past were, pushed aside, he saved himself but unlike many. From the orphanage dragged uncannily, then walked his own, unstoppable, as one would know the hardships of this world. On his way out, a bunch of thieves about had tried him. But with a slick touch he but burst their knives inside their hands, completely shattering hand bone, fingers and just about everything right up to their shoulders as they ran in fear, nearing their bloody fear of the child. It was not right in some way, fear would not be conveyed in his eyes but pity for the fellow man.

The child learned young but he would not be spared. Of lights in his eyes, many, always knocking forth, alike, as he but stepped aside on plenty, disabled Mongoloid-like bodies planted but planted, put in vein and in broad daylight for all to see what went there. Two came forth, of great disablement. Vile in need, though barely malignant to be seen.

There was something peculiar about him though.

Too strong, and too strange of face.

He was shape like a deformation of vision, an illusion which blended with the sky and everything around it in a cone, as if he would absorb everything while reality was breaking. From that hole there came a sphere, austere of gray, which pulled like in and entered back from within its lair.

For he was but the body of the man, thence ended, absorbed and eaten away.

Her

Poor Dina, of all, a yellow flower, she'd been forgotten and misused, always pleased after a while and always would she refuse. To step in like and realize what went on in her own head. Always trying herself after, to grasp the courage and step yonder only so she might make it so. After a while, she might press herself as if to know.

'Where has my husband gone? Where might I find him now that he's gone?'

There was little to no reason to explain, the fear and the pain that entered her soul would stay and keep her awake at night. Always of a mind that wasn't her, the light stopped blushing.

There lay the broken foundation, where he revolved around. There was but little more left that it should be accounted for and little more than the day they emerged for it, vacuum inside the woods. She but died along, after walking out for more air, the winds but shattered her life after, with a single dart brought, a blow coming from a crook that shone upon her, light of dark. Of each other, lost, that much was what rose from her chest, in the last which, for she poured in, the last embrace.

There rode the riders, and blunt. Of which violent delight she had but woken in the midst of the night, her soul but vanquished, no matter the delight. Lost upon whomever seen, the streets were plain of glass, around a small quarter of a fence, a block. Leaped about it, with a young sister who had grabbed her now; but lo.

'What had happened there?'

'I lost my way and walked upon the rings, I heard the wedding bells and I thought I would be called before they put me in to plain and say, I can't remember how.'

'He lay there, the man you're looking for, my dear. Oh, dear but slow down, you're mourning in fever, you may not see him so.'

As she had but tried but checking for him in a tomb that had him cast in stone; where rested Aleksey, where he had lived to cherish but what little life, be short. Where he had went around and of plain old song he had forgotten. That's what happened to the man. He lay in bed eternally, asking for spare, of a heart that might help him beat and follow through the time. Of what to ask as well as where they went, during the war, when he had made way with but a bottle in his arm. That which had been cast as well, wrapped under and made to wane. He could but touch upon the afterlife and only be met again. By the time she approached, her life was but taken and would it be for the touch, the maiden fallen. Having admired this man but for a finger broken, there she stood erect and plain, where she had died in the middle of the night, when no one was alive between the two of them, woe to him whom had died in the manner.

Decay rail

Whence decay had but set in mind. Where they walked but set alight. There were plenty a place to go around and take a claim. Ah, there is but wild device, thou speaks with us but never moves aside when called. Thou art but plain, but don't remain, there's something in there, but then again.

There was but a strange thing, they drove on a Draisine by the looks of It, shaking off what they could off them, it drew near, like a bunch of rear-shots, every man trying to read the creature's movements as they set themselves off flight. Of days like these they were but teal, in neck, and throat open, though put through dread-tubes which rotated in order to castrate their bullet rations and waste them as they could. Set in the flight of flights, and in demise, they saw from tubes erupting but from the depths of a knife-fighting deep ravines and well-depths that were made, inside the earth the rail made out of them. Follow through by power-structures that lay beneath them, made out of thousands of little dead-men that kept splitting themselves only to be repaired and reformed out of some unnatural cartilage which granted them form. Though their cut limbs, thrown apart and thrown around would always be pushed out the tube. Fornicated about the hour as they only put themselves between bullet and between fright. An entire city would be forced to watch.

Oh dreadful words and barricades as the Draisine had but arrived in a city whose walls were made of the Decayed. And of the people who jointed, amongst them, whom were unaffected as their likens would be set in stone, they were but part of the most uncanny things, they watched. And would they dare be there? If they weren't protected by the strange diseases they already carried? For each leap they were brought closer to them, as to escalate the dread and would walk and made to disappear and appear wherever they walked until they could finally breathe, in part.

It was in some way incontestable, how they managed to float, into the foam-like formations which were worn around the tree-ladders that had brought them to the elliptical citadels in which winter and summer reigned, encased and burned the corpses as disease was but distress.

Each sight but shaking as they could not fathom breathing, yonder, as they had long forgotten the joys of youth, shaken but unable to understand, where was it that they failed and where would they be if not for the one that sailed in the distance and brought their military tank to be. Set, out there, the generals, the lieutenants and the soldiers greeted by one of the diseased. Whom wore but a little spine in the back attached and curved as to hold a single pot from which a flower made of human limbs, and little puddle-wings that had been molds of a girls' tears which were tore. But had a soul, for as wicked and as ugly as this creature was, there was nothing there and to no man that replicated that feeling which was then taken away from it.

One of the man but shot the spine off and watched as the Decayed but merely frowned at that.

'I must apologize.' He said as soon as he could. 'But that thing merely distracted me.'

He shook upon being taken by the holding cell in which every man was placed, invisible as it were, but pushed out of the way, he was but in a mouse-trap in the distance, thrown around in it and left there for the giant decay birds to nib on him from time to time. Although they were giant and were made out of billions of them, they merely opened beaks which allowed for little hands to extend, like cords or little worms that came, travelling inside and would to become there. Oh, such holy desperation countered every thought.

As the Decayed man only presented himself as Dechalleon the Galleon.

But he would to be called Galleon for what was worth, as he had grabbed some of the men, leading them to a place he felt as if they would call it home. He lived in a small container that was filled with little things he had collected from afar. It was junk, a lot of it, but he had ever loved it so and cherished it as plainly as he could, as far. As he would know, there was a refrigerator and a little stove and a little machine-man that couldn't act and a noise machine and other little trinkets he had taken within his journeys. And a helicopter that trashed. And most of the devices had managed to breathe in and out as they became one, domed upon the many roofs. Many decay came after them and together, in that city, for humanity and what came after, they formed some kind of groove.

And from Galleon's groove they saw each piece and formed the land and a large construct that would draw power from the surrounding area and from every one that was there as well as they could see and wreathe. For each light had but become a piece, a swampy ball, a sphere that pulled into a large domed antennae, then entered a tube being slowly lead to a big decayed formed tumor-like root that planted itself into the great machine in the back, sprouted in part from every wall. From which, the batteries were finally fed, within the second, there having birthed, in the middle of their groove, in the heart of the city, which was still surrounded by the rails upon which they had stumbled upon their way from the Draisine, as they. Had come to understand what happened after, just as well they watched, birthed in the middle upon a watch-rounded defiled ground. Which had been surrounded and worshipped by the beings. Upon which all tubes, cords and devices and vile roots and appliances lead to. Of which colors were such desecrated things as blue or yellow-green and teal and white which combined themselves, to glow.

From which as if the aspect of a large growth appeared, upon them, set upon long thin arms, unlike the likes of humanoids, they were but wrought about and formed the structure. It was no living thing but the jewel of their empire. And it lend its arms and joined the roots, and levitated amongst them, upon the place they shook. And the moon could not be seen any longer, as such had disappeared, no stars within it reach to appear. And there was dread amongst each man after, upon the highest structure atop its heads, where stood yonder but the last cut, as if it had once been alive but someone had wreathed the upper side of its head off. There would live but nothing as to be. Dread and agony filled every whim, as it was tainted. From it but pits and holes, repressions ended. As there sprouted the final piece.

And it was dreadful as it shook the sky, as if it were but a single curtain of cartilage which was but merely shook in motions such as the beckoning finger was but put under a dog's muzzle, as that was what it did. They feared on a whim, what mattered most, what it could've done to them if such it froze and to do as to say. Little people with little arms, thin needle-rack feet and little hanged heads which were made out of swarms of dark ants put together which took the form of cartilage bones that were shaped like praying mantises which wore their eyes like dark-ropes which were made out of thread but wrapped around and moist as to draw all the smaller, more colored ants in there instead. Their heads being black ants while the eyes being but fire ones. And the head-deformation making them mantis' like claws instead the uncanny things they were, feeding on the most unsanitary creations that loomed around and set themselves in the maddest of flights.

It was a webbed net that twitched and expanded upon the blossoming unruly skin-shade which had been placed between the wreathing sting and the uncanny point where air had been bifurcated into the most uncanny, unfathomable to touch, little frog-finger delight-formed pair of pouches that were formed around the sting. While it kept motioning from on top the watch, where it had been encompassed by a tower such as one would use for the safekeeping of a great telescope, with only a difference of fat mass holding it together as it stretched deeper into the air. And although the sky was somewhat completely pulsed out of existed, the clouds which had been drawn by the motions appeared to have been dragged together by the 'come here' motion which this peculiar pucker of skin-torn formation faced making. With every lump that had been dragged on from the distance having been reformed and reshaped into those little boiled globule-wrought little containers of skin-blocks which were conjoined and seen from the distance, forming. Within each, there having occurred another birth. In the middle of the ritual which, from the distance and from the closeness of the already encompassed by the coils great living structure, the having come to a point, where every living root-like formation only dragged the ones birthed so. Only so they made be drawn from above, taken, like little arachnid wrapped presents that would be missed, but given to the Decayed so they might raise them as their own, to seal. The most uncanny pact and seal a dark rip in the past.

And man had joined and stroke a deal, as to appeal to the most unnatural zeal that would be seen. Once the storm had cleared, the plains, dragged back, the structure still there and working its way up. They would but have to be lain, with millions along the way, they'd have to feed and make wonders. For, as opposed to every men, they were tall and mighty and uncanny and strong and feisty things that ever broke sooner than they should be allowed. Most were different and wore their arms in the back. Yet they kept so much fat to them that they were seen as little giants or some lumps themselves but ripped away. With the tubes having stopped in the distance only to regain momentum yet again; set around the railing and around the town, where they threw their never ending ripped-through gory limbs so they might feed as many children as there lay around.

Galleon had been the proudest for he had four grand lads. They were tall and mighty and were but made of tails which drove to skulls. Many to each and strength as if to carry on top their skulls, and to bring no peace and no elation, on a whim, they ate what they could. As the men joined them, as the Decayed as well, until they had but taken everything they needed and formed a home out of this place; life was just as it would seem. And glory would be put within, until one man got a gun, he was but the evil one, the soldier whom had but shot his spine and pot about. Once he looked out of his way, it was only then that he had realized what happened, fright, along and never wrong. Birds were set to leave, they feared; as he would appear out of the most uncanny placed, refusing to disappear.

'Lay your weapon down soldier, or I shall rip off your wallet off your finely tanned well done stake and put it on top your little grown-flutter, then thrown you into a ditch.'

'That or I can simply kill you right here and there, and I shall claim your heart and I shall eat you and I shall become the man that you've always thought yourself to be; since I can see that there's something wrong with your face and I will take away whatever claim you call of me this way.'

I will kill you!'

'You won't.'

‘But I will and you cannot stop me from doing it.’

‘I’m telling you that you won’t.’

‘And why is that?’

‘I’ve already taken your bullets out, cadet, you are demoted!’

He yelled at the young man, who tried, desperately, as he could, to shoot him about the forehead, at the laughter of all. Mostly the decayed who looked as if they were of pieces themselves and many of those whom were around didn’t have their legs and appeared to wear some strange dark grayish skin that looked deformed on top of them, with little pints that wore eyes as well, but stopped the growth of the creatures around them. Who they themselves were yellowish-green-magenta, with little pucks of pink eyes and long mouths made out of little organic trumpet-heads which opened to large spear-like tongues which bore holes everywhere around and from which came little flaccid tongue-lets coated with weird reflective textures that were shaped like their own bodies.

It was there that they refused to watch and looked upon each other, in such a piety as to bring themselves deep down to look. Open-cases of bloated acid-filled cockpits which were hid in tiny rooms that lay underneath each plate upon which they rested, waiting for each of them to fall. They walked around each other, trying to get their fingers inside their finger’s locked, cocked plaster finger-death masks, in which they but lay and protected one another all of the sudden as if to stay their heads as the colors of blue and a pasty color that looked like eight different flashing ones were being lend upon them, as they had realized that it was the structure in the middle of the city which had already pulled up its hands as it began waving them around as if contorting some mad-strange ritual of invocation, of which dark densities were put through, in which lay the moth-heads-shapes of large gelatin-wreathed out eating ballista antlers that wreathed them out. They but pushed little tormenting loops of colors which confused everyone before their time would come.

A dark pair of mouths had emerged, and ate what they could from everywhere around their reach unnerved by anything more than they should. Part of them were even more disfigured than what they appeared and what one would to stare at, even plainer, even longer, they desired to be there, even if it drew on for longer than it should.

Some more daringly, standing in bottles mending their losses, which were to be called, never-ending. It approached from the north and with a bobbling head they could not fathom staying there for longer, they had to move, constantly being on the run, tired than the likes would allow them to withdraw from what they were doing, only to be momentarily pushed about the place. A little scum-breathing past the heads.

‘Ah yes, not to underestimate you now, I shall take but a finger and a block of your skull until you will have become I.’

‘Why must I be tortured here and now when I cannot even for the likes of me understand where I am and why and what have I done and whom should I make to beat.’

‘Do as I say and perhaps I shall be pleased to spare you until you will have become, brought before my eyes as if to know. And I will take whatever I can from you then.’

He took but a single break from speaking, unable to understand the circumstances in which dead people thought, since they were dead could they not break the means of speech that had been taken away at their arrival.

And the soldiers who stood like tiny footmen in their greaves and in their uncanny things, of everyone, could they not but understand that this was the worst possible way they could end up in? Since there was no country to serve and no other man to look upon as they would but swear upon every need the others begged for. Could they not but break a single vow, a single line of their put-to-heart book and ask themselves naught, have we gone through enough now and how much will we have to go through until we will be at peace? But they could not dare ask any captain or anticipate any of their actions for what went through their heads was likely to be called. But it was no stranger air than it had been pitiful and misunderstood and there was little more than the peculiar rivers in the distance which were but affected at every hour. And changed in the most mischievous sights.

Frightened by what appeared to be, a single man appeared to be in the distance, working his way through a small compact box filled with fire crackers on one side as well as a bunch of flares on the others. He was but making through the run with them. Fowl things but after him, on a whim they followed with the most peculiar strong machines that worked his finger.

He was so tired for some reason, something was missing out of him. It was talking. It was tackling him against every wall he passed near but he was outside, there were only a few relics of the old towns, the ones that had been destroyed. He missed blood, putting him in his veins was hard enough already.

His fingers were picked on by little dark insects with many hairs and small bird-wings.

‘Hey, hey, look, we’re droning around your fingers.’

‘Stop it, I’ll drop the box and it will explode.’

‘Yes, it will and it will blow off your head. And we’ll kill you after.’

‘After I’m dead.’

‘Twice, thrice as many, dead, dead dead.’

They sang and danced around and would look at clouds of brow-green. It was the devil in the sheets which played a flute, and peculiar bushes in which hid within strange beings which spoke to him as well.

‘We’ll get you, we’ll get you, don’t come here either, don’t come in hiding.’

Shot after him, they immediately shot after him, not giving him a chance to get away. There was no power, only a sound in his head, or was it ear? Was it the year of the yarn?

Could it be so, has it come?

Entered a match-box in which he’d beaten, seen a boiler-shaped egg-kettle in which he but beat a few times, he could see larger one there. Were they in a swamp? Or was it the pool which spread as it had decayed all? What was with this house and why were they still shooting?

Ahead, they were coming, soon to approach. And all of the sudden, from it, inside they froze, and would come to be. Near him, near him.

‘Please let me come in, I’m tired and I’m afraid. If I fall now they’ll get me before I’m soon to be put to bed.’

He’s done his choice and would have his little feet frozen where he shook them off, never understanding the plainness of the act.

‘Ah, I think I should be fine for a few hours.’

Invited in the house by a peculiar man wearing a pot with a flower on top of him, split in halves and grown inwardly, the insects hiding; speaking of how determined they were to get him killed.

And it was a rustic inside. All plain, a tool and a shed, a carpet with many squares and most importantly a hidden window to look outside; some were staking the house from the distance but no one dared approach it from the side. It was dinner, to be fed. The stove was alarmingly hotter by the minutes and a ring could be heard as well. Someone called the bell, they were still in, although this could be even more dangerous than it should, he felt it lost and would see it, an eye for an eye was to die for during such a time and he had killed one of their leaders, fading.

It was wrought

How could there be a chance to hide it now? Could they not think that one would hear of such incompetence, as a lord of some abandoned castle laying it there to lay? With each servant allowing for his children there, of which pure blood but beckoned them during night, during the advent and fall of night when no one were to make them see, whichever hidden agony, whichever plain of sight, unruly, and where they were.

‘There, I claim this castle, truly.

By this claim of the land, by this deed on which the name of my ancestor is written, I find it.’

Gone, the master wasn’t there, the servants were ware, all but long decayed and staying, stare. All tormenting him until the end of his days, the castle moved, at night it shook, but always but a chamber changing. Always but forever tormenting; that was what had made one decide, of which true character was the torment which was decide.

Someone hid inside a coffin

A man was alive for twenty hours, at the very least in there.

‘We buried him alive, do you not get it?’

‘What have we done?’

They pulled away and called of sounds, they were but followed, cast away.

‘We’re on the island of death where little men are but pinned.’

‘Nay.’

Ghoulish figure witness of his maker

He was but stranded for a moment, deceived by nothing plainer. In a catacomb-like dungeon, where all but servile, a library was where he stood, and there he spent the vile, days in the continuum hold, he grabbed himself and would not be told.

They filled him with the travesties which were but visions, not real ones but whispers from beneath the book forts they had crafted, underneath the cobwebs, everything but put in place, the servant with no face unlikely, there were several skeletons inside his bade. And there he stood in bath of salts, when the time was come but steam would bring his skin about the surface. Where it mattered most, the servants were gone in rove, incapable of watching it peel and melt within the hour as they nested within him.

‘And that is how we’re made to like.’

‘What must I be on about?’

‘Do you claim to see me then, oh dire? Are you implying you would admire such a thing as there’s my form?’

‘You’re but a crop, taken from the plow of the land.’

‘SO there’s hope.’

‘Not any longer.’

And he was claimed soon after, made to rest.

Dreadful paradise

Of puckers and of peculiar disguises, in which they hid and formed the land; once they're done but a moment out, not to be seen as the giants' skeletons that were put in were made of bile. Nasty hold they lain for themselves, the laymen but were cowards in disguise, not to be trusted by any means, not to be at peace when it didn't matter, when it came for the reprise of the dark. There would be no hope at all for any man to make it alive. That's when eternal death but had occurred, and there was some to lay, wherever the obscure.

There's not a single passing day where I have not considered killing a woman. I cannot help myself. I want to experience what's it like being a man like Ted Bundy. I want to slit a bitch's throat. I want it to be sloppy, I don't want it to be clean. A random target from within my neighborhood, no further than that; eventually I will do it, I know I will because I am a timed bomb. I need to kill a woman, I need it for myself. Whoever might judge me, know this. You cannot stop me, I'm already gone. I must be a torture device, women must be peasants, that's the only way I can describe this feeling. A boyar with too much time on my hands, I must fantasize about their entrails.

How could I be satisfied if I were not to see a woman ripped wide open from the inside to outside?

Will I be pleased to take a break, and split her open without nails?

'I never knew what it was until then.'

The moment he saw it; it was a take with every split end an opening of peculiar skin-substance of dark purple. It shot little peculiar hardening, it shot through his head, imparting, knowledge, power, knives.

He died of entrails growing out of his head until they had become a see-through insect back who carried all of her young before they emerged out of the hatching-area. There was no dignity to be had there and one could see despair in their eyes while being unaware of what was going on around him. That's what he felt like.

There were grand lord made of the lands themselves, yet they floated with the land mass itself to which they were attached to. As if they were flying upon carpets and they were cripples with only their upper-chest cavities in which their skeleton bloody heads were shoved in as they grew inside off, as the back of the patchy back there being fleshy tadpole-like tails forming large maze-like air cloud-scratchers, they resigned. To evil fate they spoke of Yore, and would to be kind, unblessed and worthless. They lived inside the giant skeleton bodies but sometimes they planted themselves on top the malignant laboratories which were spread around the place.

A great stone-wood plain dark wall, filled with dark surroundings brought them to a stop. Inside every fleet, there was a man who didn't know how to count. Most were petty, others were illiterate and incapable of doing anything by themselves.

'I often considered whether or not I would go through with it. Slitting a woman's throat; or a young girl's throat, I seriously do. And I don't feel guilty about having these thoughts whatsoever.'

'I am a fair man.'

I would not take a female life for no reason whatsoever. I would strip her naked and put her on another, split open-lady that's a stump. She would be open around her body, then whipped around. I would definitely start slicing their tits off, with as sharp a blade as possible. I would start shoving iron picks through their nips, and drink them, over and over. It would grab her by the neck, throw her around in dirt.

I would do some things one could not even dream of, I would split her open, put her girth inside an acid puddle, then make her lose some of the weight off, fat pig. Nasty cunt, split it open with a shot. Seen from below as to singe her clit; take a few shots, then bleed her in.

Bam, bam I'm the awful man. I'm going to kill you now, bitch, you're dead.'

'Don't kill me, you vile thing. I can't defend myself.'

'I know, that's why I'm doing it.

You're weak, like a child. I'm kill you, just like I killed my mom.'

'You are insane.'

'Indeed I am, and I cannot be stopped. I am the evil of this world.

And you are brought to pain and suffer. Your daughters as well, I'm going to kill them.'

'Why are you so vile? What made you so vile?'

But he didn't stop himself, drew in closer to her, then he started pounding her pussy, bloodying It with shots. He shot her multiple times, until her head started becoming a stretch, a floor. He walked on her teeth, her bore-through open mouth. He stomped her large forehead, women hate that. It's why they never want men to see them from the side-view. It revels in their ugliness, of soul.

'I don't think women have souls.

I don't think that at all. I think I'm going to do things to you now that will make you unrecognizable to everyone who knows you. Or won't.'

He wanted this, she wanted this. He could tell.

Her body became a middle-stairway, with his feet submerged in every step as he passed along her. She was done, he could go.

There were many gardens, and a of the plants were made out of her ribs, her hairs but split as she bloomed into a great peculiar box-like thing with an openly-extending mouth protrusion, which made her look like a pseudo-deformed horse which puked on the ground constantly before it rose.

'I am a list.'

'Who are you and why are you here?'

'I am the knight and she is my green horse.'

A plant-bodied horse with her square-head and elongated face emerged. Another one followed.

‘Come on, we shall drive father away.’

The skies were blue and clean. The hot-coal sun was but standing at the feet of the giant squatting skeleton placed on the dark hill. His giant arm pointed towards the rim of shine-through land. All was beautiful as it to see. The soul and agony of a woman was sacrifice for the birth of beauty.

‘You must understand, my friend, you must remember that beauty is given birth at a great cost. That is, one must sacrifice others in order to create. In order to achieve beauty, one must commit unspeakable acts. That way and only that way, could you reach the true paradise!’ He said.

And with that, everything made sense.

All was green and nice. He was happy for a great period of time, where there was peace in the kingdom, as there would be no war, no agony, no destruction, but a lot of dead women. Heaps of them, countless bodies that could not be accounted for; tortured in the most unfathomable manners; for what was worth it. This was a land made by work, which consumed the creators whom had given in their lives to make it. They, whom had been absorbed realized what grand sacrificed had to be made in order for this righteous place to be risen up. Men had often made do with the women by whatever means they wanted and that’s what made them men, for they created. Regardless of their acts of evil, that stood upon the foundation, it couldn’t be denied that the results were almost godly in comparison to everything man has ever come to create.

The sky was yellow, but a beautiful flat color, without clouds and without a sun. Even the giant skeleton was whiter and flatter than before.

‘What happened?’

Grand Manton asked.

‘A woman had just been killed, that’s what happened.’

‘Why is everything duller all of the sudden?’

‘It’s because the land is growing tired of having tasted the same dish over the last few centuries. It needs something else. Something to spice up its existence, before it turns back on itself and eats away.’

There are no rats

‘Why yes, I am made out of lead.’

‘I was led here by chance.’

‘Therefore, I think you’re bound to be a magnet.’

‘But sir, you are iron.’

‘And I’m box.’

The world was full of cats, which had no heads.

It was a fine world. There was no war, there was no pain, there was no way to see what they built. Of what shapes the statues were wrought to look like by any means.

Most of them were just as quickly put down.

Peculiar shapes began appearing out of nowhere, darkly wrought and shaped, put around each clip, around each bullet hole that had been shot from every side of air. Large window-like cracks appeared out of nowhere, just as soon making an appearance after they were sickened by the side. Large concavely cast, with many peculiar large tent-wreathed in antennae that was pushed in and out.

They lived on strange inclined floors like dropped-from-your-hand dishes. They were separated by a block of black. The walls were floating a few meters away from where they stood, and not a single edge connected, everything looked as it was torn apart.

They spoke from the walls, mouths open, figures carved. They spoke slowly, as he was dumb.

‘Experiment on him, little Mangler, maim him around the crest.’

Brought from behind by a few hooked men, wearing robes unseen, and where they’ve been, there was nothing putting them on whim. In front of them stood a table; which had dragged itself from the fall-pit, the blotch of dark which was surroundings. Many other half-wits hit inside the darkness, in that bleak deformation, that degradation of skin.

It was just as soon that they would live there, in a paradise of deformation. Little castrated mongrels put in boxes and little jars, all of which were being mixed underneath the table by a block-rotten rotator device. It had an act of drawing life from it, placing it in green surroundings, like little pools where they were mixed in, little pools of acid caustic.

They were eating worms, gluten after sack.

And he was ordered again before long.

‘I demand something out of you.’

So obnoxious, trying to put one inside of them; desolation of the brows, little peels of skin that pop and pop around, it was what they were attached to.

One day, the cats put their throats to the ground, extending their blood, which dripped along and flooded the world.

Men rose from their malformed starvation-guts, eroded by humanity, they walked along and answered to the strange wall figures, abstractedly painted and worn-out, they did as they commanded, never asking any more than was needed. It felt as if it happened in a moment, in a flash of an eye they were but asked to surrender their guts and the feline-race had but complied.

Weird colors for the wall, all were spread with red, green, yellows, and other textured bristles-like brush-stroke upon deformed humanoid outlines. No facial features, only the contortions, no limbs but some peculiar directions, all of which lead to the same point.

Peeling off the skin, the breather, make sure you surround yourself with them, they spoke as soon as he realized they would be heaving.

Against a black wall, as if there was such a thing, he glided on then rested against the stopper. It was a peculiar thing, nasty-looking, metal-brim a chest without arms, a helmet like a mushroom cloud, guts exposed and twisting like chains upon a cylinder, three legs conjoined, incapable of moving from the suit he was in, but bore. Little specks of clouds, steam came from inside, as the figure tried breathing.

‘You may greet him upon arrival.’

‘Indeed I may.’

Therefore Mangle simply stepped, with peculiar straps upon which crept little clouds of heads, always stretching their mouths instead of properly speaking.

It went just as one could expect it to.

Another place

Yob-kern was destined to rise from the ground where it stood now, little specks of eye-shot spears came out of its ground. It grabbed them soon after, chattering along the stretch and the mildly mad chattering embrace.

Day-rowing eighteen; written on a stoned that stretched upon chains around the fallen yarn-pool of thorns.

One of the first came through, he but splattered through as he fell through first of the dark ringed fingered-winged circles, dropped through, bottom-barrel broken pure.

‘I finally return home.’

He said. Greeted soon enough by an unfathomable speck of many eyeless wind-traps, all of which looked like they were constantly disappearing in the sky without any reason whatsoever other than them being brought back into view.

One of the plain men came out of nowhere, as if he had a thorn apart-exposed mouth in the back through it walked, that’s how they all walked, that’s how they all traversed space. They had giant mouth cylindrical devices that had wires attached to them that reeled them up and down, as if they were on a stage in a theater performing an act, flying up and down, where the device lead to a great wheel in the sky, of torture, a device that, if abused for too long as to never stop flying, it would drag the man into only to impale, break him apart, and abandon the gory-like remains into the gargoyles like statues that were protruding and put about the place, which would beg for a reason to be allowed to cut and devour.

A reminder that no one was safe; no one could see an end from the city. It looked too wild. Why? Why did they have to look that way? Wrapped like sheets of skin-parchment with wrapped around limbs, always walking, hovering, on top of invisible a few meters above the floor-floors, they had no control over one another's bodies yet they walked and wailed. Their deep remains before forced to come out when they couldn't help themselves any longer but begged to remind themselves what was going on.

'The winged circles but come and go, you should forget what you saw on the other side.'

'I've seen this place but tined, as I was in the after reached of the see-through toe of zeal. I've seen through it and my limbs were eels, otherwise I could not have controlled the sight.'

'You feel the fright, now are you not to feel it again?'

'I'm trying, but the world is being worn out.'

'Where are you, son?'

'Near the cage, I think. It hasn't died yet, it's rotten, we're on the back of a flying giant whose lower ribs had become the cage. His innards are the ones that convulse around and rip the very figments of space.'

Dark dream, the nightmare but spoke.

How could one chew the ground and what would he do to stomp and shout when time of all remains to see, when, it comes for it to follow through, and be there for more than few seconds, in the land.

'The ground Gourd, I pray to thee, I wish I could see more.'

Peculiar, it's been a while

Inside the sunken shuttle, there was but this put through, and put aside. A lost compartment that was as stretched as eighteen hundred miles from the main walker, where it stood and where they put the dead on the track, on the meat-hooks, until they were brought to the abattoir.

A single suited creature, with its body of a pool; it was by no means easy preserving humanity, nor should it matter when and whom did it, by any possible means.

It swam in their guts after what they've done to arouse it from the slumber it had been forced to lay upon. From the dark corner from whence it fell, what had happened to it, not that it should matter by any means, nor would anyone understand was but the string of mushy felt and much destruction, of its hardened shell and little filth of satisfaction.

In the land of the Decay they worshipped

And would but turn and wreathe about the hour, as many others followed. A great construction born out of the intersected bodies of the elders stood, always pushing out of itself.

But lo, their bodies were mightily forgotten, and one could not prevent them from ever spreading from where they've been gotten and pushed around. They were unnaturally sick-looking, the ones that came around. First came Fleet Admiral Cottonreed, who had been present during each and every last one of Earth's major disasters, having been through so many of them now meant for what was worth that he could not forget what made his heart as cold. He was upset for some reason, during the scene of disaster he remembered as much.

'I'd like to know what's been happening here.'

'I'd like to know that as well.'

Followed through the second cradle-head; second in command Watts; he was the man with the iron fuselage to his false wing, it shone out of his chest, popping through as if he had been lost for words before he came to show his rotten strands across the rest.

'There's been a change in pace, I see, I see.'

He pointed at me, the man standing distantly in the open field. Nerve endings made dark trees, but other than that barren. The mountainous regions in the distance just as barren as everything else, little finger-like regions being carved in, but lost to the loathsome dark figments that put out. A red sky and nasty wounded throats but followed.

From there

They had been stalking me for a while and I did not know how to approach them since they were crude, ugly, little and petty. They were darklings' as to say, they were but patchy and very much likely they didn't know how to behave.

'I will hang him if he keeps starting it.'

'Starting what now?'

'He's a bad fellow, looking for trouble, I know he is.'

'What happened?'

Little more than it could be brought, and least of all deformed at all, there's been a fight at the bar. They were incapable of making it out, hence there came the fiend, split but put together, both Pox and The Snake were become but Ponske the bootlegger, with eight legs and eight mouths adorned at his chest. He took away the woman's jaw, the Satyr at that and the rest of them whom were present at the bar, the fiend. He had done it, within the second where the cursed thing emerged, impaling them through the worst, he carried on his back. His many arms but pushed out.

Twice as many segments, Ponske's arms were but ended in their chests, the torsos were remained with the assassins whom had been present, the man and the woman, the two on the left side of the bar, now they adorned the end of his arms with their beautifully set bodies that were holding but the fall, the well-crafted falling end of the mine he carried around. He was set alone and walked outside but crawling. Holding his cell like Atlas would, but never calling on what came right after.

'Feed me.'

He spoke to himself, since there was no one else to hear him shout. In the heart of the moment, one of the torsos at the end of the arms was but forced to jiggle his arm. He scratched at the ceiling until he made a little hole. From above him fell but a strange liquor and there would be little more to drink from there.

'I was unaware that you made it through as well.'

Ponske noticed the peculiarly concave deformed. He was but Lord-Igg.

And he was just as known as pitiful as he were, one could see the many heads but melted like turning wax on his back as well, dressed like a ditch digger he was, and would but wriggle around if that was the time, and that's what he was asked for, if need but demanded of him then and then at all.

'I seed the bringer of destruction in my chest, he's swollen in like patchwork dens. I need you to bury your arms inside of me, you need to pull it out and walk with me.'

'Where to now then, if that's the case?

Where might I bring him and who is he to give me orders?'

'He's but an insufferable thing, I wager, he's been but laying inside of me, this little strange of whose horn is malign.'

'But wait, I want to see, oh sweet affront to humanity, I need to see what's inside of thee sockets. I see no life in them, but bloated chimes. You've been defiled on your way out.'

'The chasm ended, and there comes of dark retrievers.'

They were not there but split in pieces and were but flying in the air, all but on broken lands and everything beyond and in between but churled and chaffed and made to be. In the most peculiar pendulum-like twists in the airs, where all could see that they were bled dry. Remembering the past, every piece was but alive, made as if to suffer themselves being cut and eaten about the hour, would've been so if they were allowed to die, for just about a second more, until the shower of disease followed after.

'But how could like him be made to walk?'

‘Allow me to stuff him out.’

One peculiar wheel of steel and giant as a mill but came through a large swamp of wooden sticks and nastily rearranged brambles that followed after; they were but become destruction as they splashed through the two of them, or at the very least they had completely splashed and mustered everything. And who looked at them? Everyone and who was there?’

‘Nothing.’

And who did call? No one.

But what did they look like?’

‘Everyone.’

‘Whom did their features belong to?’

‘Everyone.’

‘Were they evil and vile, were they defiled by the overlap?’

‘No one.’

‘Was there but a survivor?’

‘Everyone?’

‘And beyond that? Whose matter was but made the universe?’

‘Everyones.’

‘What’s the map put in?’

‘Everything.’

‘What’s beyond everything?’

‘Nothing.’

‘I do not want to speak anymore.’

Regarding past aggression?

‘Let us begin again.’

‘Where did they die?’

Asked one of the malignant voices.

‘Right there.’

‘And where is there?’

‘Inside the world.’

‘And where is the world?’

‘Everywhere.’

‘And where is everyone again?’

‘Inside the universe.’

‘Where is the universe?’

‘Everywhere.’

‘Where is everywhere?’

‘Anywhere.’

Thus they settled with opening him up.

It was clear that the child survived. Having been placed in a stove like chamber meant that he would have become nigh indestructible, that meant that there was no way to destroy him.

And what was the child?’

‘A little fragment of the world, he was a giant with a gait, an infantile this one that now stands agape. You want to know why that is?’

‘Tell me.’

‘Because he was spared.’

‘By whom?’

‘A king, without a doubt, his majesty but chose to spare the little thing and make sure it will always be alive. It is the will of the chasm that something might seep through it eventually.’

‘What makes you say that?’

‘Death had followed us all, we don’t exist in here, that’s why we must kill the two of them before they speak to anyone.’

‘And what if they speak to everyone?’

‘That would be much, much, much worse, I wager. We would be killed and slaughtered and beaten and whipped, like niggers, like monkeys, like little-little abuse victims slain, and beaten and have people made their way with us, in the worst possible manner there is.’

‘Such vileness of you which you speak, what might I call you now’

‘You may call me Oswald Wreckage, I am but made, now I am. And I will keep this track in which I am.’

‘What conclusion have you come upon, Oswald?’

‘That for a short period of time, my dear friend is that my mind is to be made corrected, for the time being.’

‘What does that mean?’

‘It means that for now, as long as we Red, read, we need to find that person, Red. Read through the markings and finish them, our mind will sit still.

We need to remember that, all right?’

‘And what if we lose track and begin again, so many of them, all at once?’

‘We lose track and we die, or worse.’

‘Now I have full control again, I feel it, yet again. See this little bramble-child, look how much control I’ve gotten all of the sudden. I feel as if I’m made, as if I’m put in charge. I can grab him.’

As he did, and suddenly ate out of his head, and started chewing slowly after, spiting cradles of blood-disaster.’

‘It is rather mournful, isn’t it? Think of it this way, don’t forget for a moment that this won’t have sudden effects on us, my dear.

If we start again, our mind will be had, worse than dead.

That means that our mind, the two of us, our minds are rather broken, you lazily churning donkey-mule paddle, I see no normal water, bloody-muck, there’s much to do.’

‘I am but you.’

‘Indeed you are and for now we are Oswald Wreckage.’

And he was born in a dark armor, his face was pale and he was stricken by an amorphous anemia he could not get out of, gotten rid of. I am but the man of filth, he thought.

But it was not it.

There were darker days that followed through.

‘I see, you want to kill me, child.’

‘Who’s the one who spoke?’

‘The dark creatures from the wild.’

And all of mankind, which wasn’t there pointed at the floating forests, of many briarwoods and little swirls and curls of wood that were taken from the ground. It was no match for no evil crow made out scepters, connected by a most barbarous broken yet barely put together horn, in which a godly-like remain but floated out of its dark show.

‘So much control could be lost.’

There were gabbling thing about the place.

Flies and kings

‘Malignant man of disease, have you not realized what you’ve done?’

You’ve got no legacy to carry on with after your death. Nothing will survive, they will stop at nothing to burry you alive.

Enjoy it while it lasts, carry this diseased sack on your back for as long as you can, the make your peace and be forgotten. But make sure that if anything, your hatred survived.

Make sure you filthy hatred gets carried on, vile-man.’

And they called upon the vile-people, who followed him, writhed and torn in disease, filthy beast, rotten in side, filled to the grit, never meant to survive, ready to be put down at every turn.

Another one of the vile-men called upon him.

‘You could not help yourself, could you?’

‘How could I? Why would I?’

It’s in my blood, this filth is in my blood, of course it would wreathe its ugly head in and rear itself over when left unchecked. For this it not only a disease of the mind, but something that afflicts my body so; I cannot help it, that is so.’

The giant flies followed, the giant flies followed. Nose bleeding dark-gray, one of them could not obey. It fell and wondered of this work. Malignantly foretold, it was to be completely swallowed by the hatred and disease. A fall as such was hard for him.

As Olive thought of naught no more, he had been swallowed, his mind begged for it, ashore, there in the distance, wonder.

‘One could not shy away from such matters. It was inevitable, once we discovered it. Such joy, such joy, it cannot compete for the likes of it with anything, nothing could compete with it.

Can you not feel it now? Coursing through our veins?’

The flies agreed and only took turns to rip out their mouths away, out of which the Vile-people did not protest.

‘Vile, lazy, petty thing, who put you in charge?’

Our world is vile, it was defiled, your presence is like argile on the ground. You've sickened us all, you've put us to the glory of filth and promised us a future.'

'Gone on a whim, because so I willed it.'

'It is obvious that this disease shall never die. It shall forever engrain itself into my every action and act of vileness, through every spreading and touch.

I shall lay claim upon their minds, and they shall love and loathe me no matter what.

My dear servants, you are mind, in filth and in mind.'

He could not fathom no darker future than that his own.

Man shall receive hatred and threats from the empire of flies. But he shall learn and swallow them nonetheless and give in to their lies.

'Dumb bot-fly, stop that.'

Somewhere on the black-static encrusted fly-wing textured street, on one of the black pores that were formed like tiny protruding skin bumps on it, one of the bot-flies tried burying itself down there.

'Why don't you listen?'

Asked the giant Fly-Fly who was completely black, like a cast of a fly, but wingless and bore only two legs and two arms, which would resemble the symbiosis of a human arm, centipede and a harvesting tool, seen from above, a trench depression would push through, deep enough and curved outwardly so it would seem like something erupted from insides its arms.

Though the fingers were normal either since they bore the small fragmented claw-like formation of some long imperiled crustacean-god, which was followed by the transparency of a single flying wing that had become his transparent after-image; as the attempt continued, it wanting to shove a hole inside its back and enter its master.

Another after-image appeared in the same way God would appear as a vision to its servant, seen only by the Fly-Fly from the sky. It spoke two evil languages and not even half of its body could be seen. It wore a malignant-skin suit that looked like a trench-coat made to look as if it was completely made out of the mouths of the Vile-men. Whom had rotten and crowned its shoulders and moved one of the eight moons that were rotating at a strange pace and a weird distance from one another.

But that was contradictory to what everyone was seeing, since they seemed to be of the opinion that the moons were standing in one place, frozen solidly, making it impossible for both of them to be right about what they were seeing.

And in a moment it almost appeared on their plane, the ground and the buildings in the same way a mad apparition would, but just in the same time one would move in real-time, the after-image would completely be represented that way, everywhere around, on every object that was set in flight and bore small angular tube-like bolts that had no means of ever being pulled out once they were inserted into something. The amount of friction generated by the reaction and rotation started creating tiny pockets of skin-heat that were seen from the distance as some two dimensional rubies from which filth started pushing out and spreading.

While the after-image started fantasizing about abusing ducklings while filling their ponds with tiny bread-encrusted knives, from which the molding poison would make it so their skin would slightly dissolve only so the knives would become more air-like or like some kind of virus that pushed the metal atoms through the duckling's veins, while the main remaining almost rust-filled knife made its way towards the animals' lungs, the Giant God-like vision After Image of Fly-Fly attempted manipulating the tiny floating rubies that appeared everywhere around, madly trying to stop them from trying to verge into a stranded tiny platform from where they might throw bolts, long ones, made out of the friction tubes at the unsuspecting black fled.

As peculiar as it seemed, God was actually around them. And he was a deformed fly of normal size, or at least normal size of the common fly found in the normal world.

From the distance one could see the sea of blood that completely encompassed and surrounded their world, although it was much higher than the tides allowed one to see and from where one stood, he could see they only floated in the air, like some tampered with head.

Many orange beheaded Vile Mens' heads fell from the flying pools. Which were group in eighteen clusters that held smaller pools in them, made out of weird oblongs or circles, that looked flat. And left shadows beneath them. But this made no sense since, upon approaching it looked as if there was no sea whatsoever and there was nothing beneath the earth, nothing, or above it. For one brave Fly dug a hole and fell through the world, unable to fly.

'I think someone needs to catch the Orange heads before they disappear.'

'We cannot save so many of them.'

Spoke Fly-Fly's companion, a wheel. A burning wheel with a spike on it, but it wasn't a normal spike. It had a head impaled in it. But the head wasn't the one talking, it was the wheel doing it.

One could never be too sure about these kinds of things.

'How many stars are there?'

He looked above. Without the After-image intermingling with the stars, they were gone. Fly-Fly being left in an awkward position, as he only turned.

'What's that thing?'

Remnant of an old world, there was a floating noose, levitating in the air. It was made out of flies.

'We should make it past the street. I see a vehicle coming our way.'

'Yes.'

They walked away. There was a two-headed, eight quad-shaped, long machine with eight billion molecule-thin wheels which appeared to pop into tiny specks of explosion every second it pushed on. And below it, blood rang in their eyes, as the giant-sheet humans that were being spread and printed through died soon after, being constantly subjected to suffocation, being caused by the smoke created by the explosions.

‘We have to talk about something.’

‘I’ll order the drinks then.’

Both entered the pub. There was no one around.

‘Is this table taken?’

‘Yes, I think it is.’

‘We should take another one then.’

Most of them appeared to be occupied.

He saw no reason why it could not be explain, not to kill the paint off the walls, or try to order drinks of poison from the tall blob-like deformation that came after.

It wore its cyst around for eyes. But it never reached its son in time.

And if spoke of it and dragged again and again.

‘We’ll take that one at five and wait for my chamberlain to come on.’

First and second floors were occupied. The Concubine came there to serve them with a false menu.

‘Trying to hold up everything together.’

Some walruses-formed fly heads, on top of robust humanoid bodies wrapped around in giant fly-sheet clothes made out of tied together gut-ropes drew out of the room right next to the drive-symbol that kept pumping the tiny pests in their eyes. One of the Fly-servants came through. He wore a helmet of stone-filth, dark grayed out.

‘You’ve ruined it, you fool.’

A voice suddenly came from the distance.’

It was almost warmly felt.

Four faces all stopped, frozen almost as if in time, like an insatiable block of wax that melted through their thing wiry fingers. Torn apart while ruminating by the fire.

They droned out in a rove, all the flies being driven out of their home as their outsides melted. And those who walked back to Olive seemed obtuse, almost in the same way a man without skin would walk towards him.

Thought chest was torn, though most of them broke down as they approached, they fed, with deep-stricken flaws. ‘Couldn’t spare them, could you, of the noise?’

Your clacks keep popping every fiber of your mouth, you wreathe in pain and shout about the place, your gums decay, don't they?

I see the yellow thing in them but they already encompassed your mouth.

Truly told, you are one to be looked down upon, be gone from evil sight and don't look back. I wish I could devour your mind but I cannot search for what's inside of you.'

He rose and approached. His head was eighteen times that of his compounded fractioned eyes, bloated as they were, protruding out of his neck pestilence that the disease he carried forth, he wondered. Yonder did he walk, unable to miss his stunt and cathor.

'I want to eat, I want to eat, where's the mouth? I need it.

My children, they rose, please, I need to bacterium-frozen inside. Please, allow me to obey my children and fill them with the pus and scum of my insides once I will have eaten them.

The Vile-men, that's what they did to me. I suffer because of them. I cannot feel, I am betrayed, I am filthy, my body is made out of grains meat out of larvae-shrubs. Please allow me to feed them before they turn on me.'

Just like the dead dog. He was supreme, he was their master, he was somewhere out there, part of the pantheon like a mad-filthy expression of drool. The pool in which they fell was dreadful, as one could tell, there was no need for scum, about eighteen hours later, he died, abandoned in a tar-like bed where he was eaten by the round. They danced around him, unable to feel and differentiate between disease, it was long-due, it was long-due.

It was appraised, he could not fathom straying his hand, and focusing for too long, it was all too pitiful, the dreading and the ever-pleasant distrust that followed the gore-through.

'Past this line, no man might become a balloon.

The flies need to dictate the errands before you might be allowed to feed your children. Make sure that their needs are fulfilled first.'

Towel of black, brought on by a woman dressed in red. She was a Vile-woman who used to beat her men. Though child-abuse was evenly split and allowed as well as forced upon everyone else. Leeway to one of the cancer-blocks.

'They need to eat.'

And they rushed towards the Vile-woman and ripped out her bottom jaw, sharing between one another as they ate and ate until nothing was left of her, now. They ate some more, not to be a bore, they wanted to cut a piece for their children, more Fly-mothers came forth and started tearing her face and lower body apart in order to share and share some more.

'Vanity shall be inexcusable from this point on then.

One must break all the mirrors in the room in order to make place for everything else to come in. And in with good air, out with.'

The phone rang, but at the same time a door opened.

Twenty blister-filled yellow-dogs came in, neither feature visible out of their shape. They started barking and as they had, many started popping as they painted the walls in red and yellow. Distraught the man got up.

'Who let them in?

Show yourself scoundrel.'

'It was I, the man with no legs.'

He was long and appeared to have no spine, but leaped around as he was only a head and a trunk, jumping on a long pike. Bleeding out of his guts, saying.

'We had an appointment, no?'

'No, leave.'

'It's already too late, invite me and my dogs in your private chambers and we'll talk.'

'I'm going to cripple your stick if you don't leave.'

'Then I will stay with all my dogs and never go away, never and I shall flay you with my other teeth.'

And as if on command he started spitting them out, as he couldn't help himself but say and do the most terrible things. From the side of the room, where they lay, there was no more space to move in as the stood and lopped away.

'There, I think there's a green sun that's become gray.'

'You must die then.'

'For what reason?'

'You're not bright enough to see that the sun died a millennium ago.'

'But I can see it now, in my head, my dreams cannot drag me through it any longer, I need to eat before I lose my hands.'

And he was armed with two cracked backs, from which the leper which was his main-dog started dropping those yellow pouches around the walls. One of the pouches had almost completely assimilated his head, leaving the skull as it protruded out while making the most disturbing looking noises, as they were shattered past his back. He was almost done sniffing around, the gas was set. They were drowned already by the nosebleeds.

'I think this session should start then.'

What is your name?’

‘Gulag-cattle.’

‘Fitting, now tell me what happened exactly.’

Ten years ago. On wrongly-doubted plains where he could not fathom living past his yearning years, there was this, the madness which was work. For a man like him, as scum had told could not fathom working of trying to be. Like any other of great desire, yet to see a light from which the tunnel started spreading scum. He felt forlorn as he walked around. Roses were made of tar, there were other people around which had been born in trench-breeding machines which had been dug their long-deformed, nomadic masters. For they appeared during one morbid night and they could not fathom staying about for too long and doing something that couldn’t be helped, as the killing of chicks, of kidnapping of children so they might eat their ears, plunge some wire-tracks inside their brains as they would bleed them in the air.

From the various clouds of red that came from inside of them, finally they started pushing in. Advancing on a front where there were many fighting spiritless men, of whose lives yielded just as much as they could tell of it.

‘Dread and desperation, they’re damned or would be damned if they’re to serve him who is in doubt their masters, of worse flies, I see they rise.’

‘But you cannot fathom trying your hands on it, not as much, I see the evil that’s creeping into the starch and stakes of larvae, they made to be.’

They were different from the others, as they were vile men, unlike the flies they only did what they could in order to repair the evil done by their kin. There was a reason to sit there in part. No one could lay in doubt and reveal as much. So much so, there was evil when it snowed and they were only melting it by slitting one spare.

One man came forth, got off his horse, looked upon the slaved-labor. Upon noticing how the other vile-men got domesticated, he considered teaching them a lesson. In grace and in manner, the spanner of evil-cuts, the hanging and the lynching brought to their knees.

But he of all would see as well.

‘There, see of plain and watch me go at it again, approaching near-evil as I see. I shall swear no fealty and do no harm to thee but look at what I’ve become.’

And from his wrist there was a pouch filled with false-blood, and beneath it where was a pouch of bone as well. His fingers pushed and made their way, pulling out a false yet sharp bone-hook which drew away some of the blood. Afterwards he splashed the snow and made the lass dance around him.

‘I see that the Vile-women have already learned their place. Good, great, magnificent, I shall to with them and have my way. I need to breed with as many of them along the way. Otherwise, I see no reason to keep any of you living.’

And he considered as much, trying to push in after a while. It was tiresome, trying to think, and winking of evil sound, for destiny called as it had seen him rise through the vales and through the snow as he would spread his blood, which was nothing more than poisoned water.

Yet the Vile-people could only see the blue as red, as they were bashed around their irises ever since they had been born, dead or still-born in disease. There would be no peace as they were getting even more desperate to piece the world together. It was all too wrong, no one was strong enough to make it and many had starved off to dying. Such was the disease that drove many in their early graves and in some way it was all inexcusable, in others, it was well worn.

Farther through the Southward region, there was a veil that could barely be observed as well, and might as well be forgotten for more than a few obvious reasons. It was made out of the giant sky-formations, coconut-head tops on top of two molded-together hives. And there was evil going in them for they were dark and gray for the Flies that lived in such structures, as they had been on their way to their dark paradise could do nothing but face one another as everything melted.

‘Shall we speak of such command then?’

‘I can only hear evil going on.’

‘Then watched the flies set off in the distance, knowing you will have failed to reach them in time.’

‘And what is the meaning of that?’

‘I can see no point in talking to you no further, you’re but an imbecile.’

‘And you’re a man who refused to answer the call.’

‘To what exactly?’

‘To see them change, they’re not flies but something inbred, made out of the bodies of horses, in which they tiny ancestors mated in.

And through time they started hiding in their suits, I tell you, only because of being ashamed of what they are and what they look like.’

‘Your mouth is foul and I can still see no point further in talking to you. Dreadful thing that you are, I shall never figure you out, never, as eternity has become but a single farce to you.’

‘You’re not listening.’

And neither could he do it any longer. There was no way to prove it, but those Fly-creatures did abandon their suits in their giant private chambers and took on the appeal of the various animals with which they had hybridized themselves upon being forced to do so.

There was still that eternal-hatred in their eyes which defiled just about everything, to the worst possible admirers, could do. Fear had been a bastion for them to soothe one another as the sweat and heat inside the suits had given them their petty appearance, of suits-well worn. Hairs which were put on top of them and pieces of variously worn out and put through fallen shells; dread was an anchor pulling the down.

As the hive was not a hive inside but a twist, a repulsive thing which looked more like the body of a man missing his organs. Although they lived on floors, their chambers were cones, warped pyramid-like cylinders, with rounded tops, organic and bearing their wings, which they themselves had fashioned and faked as well as they falsified their pasts.

And many of their small-hut-like rooms were too tainted to be spoken of as they wore the speaking mouths, the lacerated inbred of their worst species, which had been melted and mixed with the very fly-suits only so they could justify hiding. And live through lies. Be blasted by evil in disgust and plain of nights, that took away whichever light there lay inside their dens.

Man of flies, upon a crown, set as he was a false one, trying his fingers cut, and brought to knees around. He wagered. I shall open the cyst and plant my children, as they lay in stranger holes, I see. There were peculiar things always glowing and pushing out, throttling every side of the walls, always on to abide. There would be another one coming. Of which blunt-hardness worn, it wore upon one another, as they suddenly started growing on their own. Some of them had come to breathe, as they could see and breathe without it. Tiny puckers but followed and would only cut and see another, such as the very likes. Growing on the walls, and shoving aside.

‘Here, take it, take it so.’

He threw but a single fat giant block of fly, a potato-shaped thing as giant as eight hands put together, set upon the cry of laughter that was disease, inclined.

There were others that were not spoke off before. Mostly since they appeared to have become contrived and foul, full on their benign nature as they had bore their wings in strains and wildly pushed away. For they were many and yet inclined, some fused with the mouths they ate, only to be shoved aside and sprout them on the sides. Always pushing out of the way, while always trying to themselves, not to sway and eat what they could. Around them, of a while, stood, but large protrusions made to last, pushed away as soon as they would be allowed to grow at last. Some were torn, off to shore, as long lost ships would to be allowed, torn apart on sand-ravines, they contrived of smaller beings attached. On every side and in the back, brought upon the world, every piece of every land, made in the wreathing image, the texture and the hairs, all dark and taken away. For the likes of the Vile-men could not even deal with it yonder.

Stronger and felt, they fought to no end. Territories were being shared or taken by force when none or little more remained of them. There, in a call, a few flying torsions came, at last. They bore the strange appearance of bobbling fat-buttons which had yet to be inclined, below them boils kept many of their children alone and alive. Set to strive, some would burst, only for the boils to grow back from whence they came, upturned. There was but a single chance to miss it in front of their eyes. Since they only appeared here and there, malignantly reclined to the disappearing specks and the flakes of wings that settled inside, there would be no way ahead to what they honed. Peculiar houses and weird fragments in which they hid their young-to be culled and slain for dissatisfaction. Since their monuments would fall, some of them already in doubt for what was to be called. Plain in thought and lesser beings, all too evenly put through and never seen.

A man with a headless watch had come, he was vile and would be inclined to talk at last.

‘I demand this pouch of land to be given to me by the orders of the Great Contrive. What say you of my claims?’

He was different, yet belligerent, missing his lower jaw, already absorbed and left so in the most peculiar manner. For his own sake, he pounced behind. There, right there.

‘I’m Tumor-Bolt and I will have brought you to justice by the end of this day.’

He shone with worms. Walked hardly on puddles of skin, his pouches were made out of bear-thin flies. He’s killed his way through and by appearance he was but soaked in their young. Green-yellowish skin with puckers on it and eyes, followed by a sign on his forehead that appeared to go around the spot. Brought to knee, the host of many a fly, which waited in the back hardly turned to see.

My secret, he couldn’t be known of it. He’s destroyed their suits, he cannot know. He cannot have found out that we’re but for show. And yet, the creature of malignant nature, which contrived, of this suit and better to abide, held, beneath his belly but many a mouth. Since they had eaten, stolen and took what was theirs, they drove themselves to become alike. Yet they were still lower, they had to be. Filthy and mixed, but piss through the signs of agony.

The Vile-men were still but short and in comparison to it, whom ape-like form the vileness bore, they Fly-suited creatures were of grant sizes, such as four bulls stacked together at the very least. There was little fealty to such a thing as well as pus.

Thence the challenge at a duel.

‘For his land I would rather face you as such. My arms may be wider, but it should be a fair match.’

At least from what he could tell, he accepted it, without being to swell in place, or look around, it was all too dreadful, after a mind. All too quiet, of a piece, thence they pushed on and found some peace.

As one eye looks in one direction, followed through by the other whose face is but a marked thing, there’s little left in common with a wonderer whose face is but a track upon which the filthy little men devour little things when they are hungry. He knew when to laugh at the most inopportune times and this was one of them. It was all too sad and hadn’t made any sense at all, why was he doing it? Why was he laughing? Does he not know you’re not supposed to laugh now? Does anyone care? No one seems to care about that.

Ah but what a vile thing, tiredness is. I see, but I can look, to be called so, and stare, of little more than I should say and satiate my wonder, I am but a stronger man than I’ve been yonder. I’ve become the first of the flies, the one who had set alike and all would to be benign if I will it so. I hold no secret nor may I talk, I am but a fly and fly alike.

Dominators of which awe is green

They shone within their scepters, on whom but birthing some inside the air. They shot each other off, uncannily, disgraced by whatever pucker was ensnared.

Their land was red and bloated, always pumping, contorted and completely submerged, bubbles red and men without disgrace enslaved. They were flying inside of bull-shaped monstrosities of which horns were overwrought and filled with twenty men each, molded as if swords were their hands, which, at the end of their swords came peculiarly shaped stings that gave them the appearance of born-out segmented claws, attached to one another, worked upon they would be. Each claw fashioned to be one top, another one placed, dancing. And these creatures were but the buildings themselves, as from the gut of the bull-shape came but a drop of a hive-like digested building, like those of man, cathedrals and rounded caverns pushed around each other's hands. Arms wrapped around them, ending, inside of them.

Contorted beings raking, on top of plains made of men, on plain flat floors which were pushed around and would be put around as much pressure as it could be helped.

'Will you stop that already, can't you see that this is not their destiny, to be tortured for hours?'

'Where do we go and who we are?'

'This is not the time to ask this, nor should you be allowed to, damn you.'

Man with a strange eye-hole shaped around the mouth, no lips, see-through teeth that were connected chompers, eating through long tubes that were pulled out of a large trail of long-leg shapes that came out of his gut, slowly being taken out. They receded momentarily but revealed, in their pole-structure many thin legs which dragged behind.

'You were right, we weren't prepared.

We found a woman dead inside a child, crested, around, with a strange hold. Blood upon the ceiling, and strange pyramidal weeps. Though there were nothing but the cruel heaps in which they stood. They lied everywhere, scents of pheromones in their eyes.

And what they brought one, was one in a million fattened, peculiar fat-dead people that were set in sight. No matter what happened, there were peculiar stranglers that were but lynching people in mass. They were dethroned, kings that were plain strapped and hold over, dragged on chains as they were put behind. Barely landed, the entire building was being evacuated before the line was set. Every fence being swollen, there was dread in sight. And they bore some peculiar miasma, and put through. Holes inside their guts, holes inside their eyes, eaten; old ladies in dead-sparks, they were put inside peculiar small boxes so they could be more easily carried. Some people shoved little pins inside of them. Saw-through as well. They wore their faces, and some perverts ate their OB's; as peculiar as it were, they were drowning one another with their blood and laughing.

'I am the great nose, they put me inside my hands, they want to use me as a blood-cradle and be put on a table. Listen, listen, listen, they will keep me there three days.

And females shall step on me constantly, I know it. It was prophesized, in two years they were put together and would come to show signs of the end. Draughts will be put and I shall buy myself by bits.'

‘Why is that?’

‘Because they shall sell me and they shall sell my feet. And my organs shall be trafficked, and they will sell me to talking branches. I am speaking to my bones and they are infested. They’re infected, by alcohol embed incisors.

They shall bite me over and over again.

Blood pouring out of their hands, they will speak of it again. Should I not listen to their words of protection? Shall I abandon my faith, my instinct dying when the drops of blood. And there being wasted, there was no chance.

Wearing themselves out, they will, and when the time comes I shall escape.’

And he had done so, for this event repeated itself eighteen times, always, him buying back, and they pulling his organs out. They were followed by diseased people whom were without finger. Shocked he spoke with them; eight contaminated brothers that were put under stress. For a few years they had been tortured, obligatory punches and hurt. And the light had only devoured children, for the sun was in need to feed.

And the sun spoke of evil and of tiresome things. Were to be put in cages and in little doors; constantly tested in pain. Every man who had been alive had been hit again and made to say in spots. For hours then washed, and made to listen as they were killed around.

Luckily for him he bathed in bleach and hen-blood and that of a snake.

‘I am an animal because I love myself.’

He prayed to eight blob gods. Ugly warm, worm, and all living in a cottage that was surrounded by dirt-roofs that were put together as to form a fence; and from the distance, the face looked like cars and faces, peculiar vehicles that were made out of skin, speaking within the hours.

They were all punching kids for hours, it was everything they were left with, out of the building and through the cold. They were stolen, their clothes torn apart and burnt to side.

‘My nose needs to be attached to onions and to red-breathing arches, their deaths needs to follow after. I could die just because I am revealing all of their secrets.

IT doesn’t exist, my mind doesn’t exist. I need to eat, I need to kill and take care of myself and kill everything as I weep to the globes.

Eventually their cottages will be burnt.

My temperature is burning, they were not to be called.’

And they listened to him prophesize of what was going on. What to eat today? I could eat him.

‘I will eat a cattle of cheese and cast upon the bare breast caste. I will kill fish and shove myself inside of them.

Lynch the kids, lynch the men, kill everyone.

You need to do it before they take me, before I'm claimed.'

Some men were immediately nerved, put to worn. Their shared-mothers were flat in the head and were made out of flour, salt and burnt alike, and were put, devoured, in their guts. Skinned alive, flayed after the sun. And worn out and killed.

And they were fashioned out of their rings, never tried.

There lay but a peculiar large match-box shaped large trunk which bore, eight hoses for every legs and the second body put through and leprous put to stress. A large throat the size of a galleon, the eyes on his chest long, snail-alike and put through what appeared to be an elevator shaped filed with skulls. In that empty space, sweat running down, the mockery of the men which were reflected on that death-box. Squirmed from inside of it they came below, and set in flight they revealed but many rows of flung-about snow-like drops formations formed of mountains, skin-like and sacked. They were put to draught and worn out. Then wasted every second, the pain was brought, immediately upon the use.

Rotten-head came from one of the flying-dead building peculiar torn-aside and put through, vein-blobs were flying through his little seat-weapon, a lock around it wrapped, he had completely ripped out a bicycle seat and shoved it on a stick, then welded. A disease-puncher, at his feet.

It was hardened around the chains and where came the peculiar stretch of needle-holes, there was but a single paunch Synch could look upon

'You've taken my face, you've defiled me, I'm butchered, can't you see?'

It was plain to see that the council had not, for the likes of them care at all.

They only drew on the device and noticed, but a strange peculiar board, and worsened, by the looks of which, they've taken everything. It was enough, for a disease to endure. It couldn't be called otherwise, for what was worth. They called upon much dreadful steeds which carried upon their ranks and brought within a lack, remorseful.

'But you are truly mistaken, are you not?'

'I believe I'm not.'

'And why is that?'

'Because my head is a barrel and yours is not.'

'Prove it.'

He split open his helmet and had it revealed.

'But you are mad, are you not?'

'Of course I am and for that I must thank you first and foremost since you are but the cause for it.

If it were not for you, then I would've most certainly had myself caught at a loss of blood.'

'Yet I need to see your barrel and I need to understand, what is it inside your head that pulls me towards you at such a speed.'

He was drawn towards him by such a power as the likes of which might've made him think he was but a man or iron drawn towards a magnet. Drawn without the slightest hint, without remorse, but to settle in with what he learned so far. He's taken the chance, now and now.

He had but split his lip then after, his eyes were whitened, peculiar creature worn and put aside. His lower body was but a peculiar drinking draught he could get away from, saddened by it, that he would shout. Mouthlessly he foamed with a surprise, his demise was in peril, and he walked upon saddened eyes.

And they had cast one another from the mad paradise they had been standing in for hours at day. Incompetently unable to make it through before realizing what the issue was in the first place. Battered through, they suddenly withdrew, and would see each other taken by surprised, heading the solidarity provided by the men who stood and waited in their little odd boxes. Which were everywhere, transparent boxes where they stood in, breathing, threateningly breathing. Bad air meant bad men. They were looking back. They were frowning disturbingly as they hissed at every passer in a most capricious manner worthy of no less contempt. They were put down, some of them shot up completely, eternally as they received a bullet and twice, another shot, then eight more. They ate led. It was sweet-erect, they died quickly, then they got up again, but no one questioned it. Every time they opened their mouths, a light, they were the city's lamps, which explained why they were just standing in just about every possible spot. Eating rice made out of mice, all decayed, no man repaired.

Beatings around the block and barrel-headed men but spitting blood; they puked it in and put it in a small gondola. And they simply put the paddles through the asphalt as if they were but shallow, hands were pushing, yet tomorrow. They would leave and lean against the wall.

'It spoke, it spoke to us. I see that it is come to our attention that our god is it but called for us to worship.

He is but to appear and deliver us to the land that is said to have been given to us by dark day where we shall lay with the other apes in the plays of stars and simians.

Where they shall be attained to be inside each cellophane-block of which body is his.'

'But Eihm Riis is but a man, his claim comes only after man and man is made to listen to no man but to man.'

And they dealt the blows of which they swore to become, the most uncanny gore in which they will shoot all the bullets, all of them were unleashed. And they blew everything and made the gore-creatures appeared whom bore no blood, nowhere near but wore the appearances of hound-heads upon humanoid-shaped beds whose chests are rectangle holding mattresses. Their insides were coffins and they opened.

Despite most of them being enclosed, from one of them he appeared.

It was none other than Eihm Riss, of whose touches were plain in wood which were trees-old devices that were partners which giant clean cut hands that had belong to giants that had written wires upon black talon-shaped tablets over a few hundred times. And they sang in flower for Riis, and would but piece back together what had been amiss, for him, oh mighty lord, you've come upon us with a mighty sword which was but a rod made out of Isle. That is what they called the very toothy smile which was carved upon the great danger, comer of evil from past. Out of his great talon nails, upon which the great Peoples of his kind lived, they died, only to have given soul, their entrails but dragged along to have become it.

‘Great rod you carry, so it seems, but what of its power?’

They seemed to spit powder.

And they were of no mark and listened to nothing but the wind and how at last, evil bird you are torn apart, to have become a thin child from the rod which was but carved. The nail-chitin could still be seen. It was smoldering with births and many animals that came in were but mixtures of put together, stitched men, of which souls but crawled.

There are harsh terrible winds that beat the carpets hung in water.

They are indeed soaked with blood that's been taken after they decided women would be allowed to speak. In the turn of the dark century, as opposed to the ancient animal-wrought people, their sutures would be removed. Many fed crime-meals, in which stood little knives and bullets as well as stolen pockets. They listened and they listened.

‘No one obeys in my court, thought I am the one who had prophesized what might happen after. I've checked the power and we've passed the limit that's allowable for people to survive through.

We need additional cords attached to men that they might finally come to understand why are there sand-people in the sky and why is it gray?

I am the man that shall call upon this world to stop.

And you shall worship me instead of Riis.’

‘Yet you're not a god, alas.

We're but doomed to live without hope.’

Their buildings were fat forts, that wore men-bellies like those of beer, wrought with little lines of cross black iron threads everywhere around.

They were washing dishes, in their homes, the men. They were men, after all. And they were punished for it. As the dished wore spike-shaped knife-hooks shapes that wore little cacti-pinchers everywhere around; the cleaning solution being a sodium that only affected them as well. For every dish washed a man's head would be fell and thrown into a concubine-washing machine where he would suffer after. Even if it were for a man to cook, he would have to cut himself and grill his own skin through.

A door was making a lot of noise. It opened, then it closed mid-way, then a man passed through the slip, me slapped the frame, rubbed his chin, eyed the place around, walked backwardly, leaped like a frog, ate from another passing man's throat, then he died soon after, abandoned to be split open. His chest heaved them straight open, only to reveal that he hit a piercing gate. A gentleman suited man that looked like him with a door drawn across his suit as well, as two eyes that were dark cysts, came out and walked away. Soon enough, he was followed by a line of those people whom, soon enough moved into the abandoned building from which everyone else appeared to have gone out of. They disliked what was going on there, and out of their canes they revealed long rapiers with which they started fencing as if to prove themselves in fight as they only dreaded forth, to come along to the greatest of the apartments that waited for them. It was something very much incontestable, trying to survive for longer hours than they needed since there was, without a doubt no chance for them to make it along. Indeed, there wasn't, as they were slowly but flayed by some hidden scents that appeared out of grate-like holes placed all around their homes.

‘Will you do me the pleasure of making it in time for me to realize what’s going on?’

I’ve come upon a discovery unlike any other, I think one of my worn-out pillows has been completely encompassed in an utmost peculiar sweat that does not belong to any being I’ve had the misery of having acquainted myself with.’

‘I can’t.’

‘Why not?’

‘I’m a positive, I’ve been found out for negatives.’

‘How deep are they?’

‘Skin-deep, deep-deep, I’m dead in twenty hours.’

Same thing as before, same thing, there was no other thing than that, they were talking themselves out of it, already gone.

Already dead-men talking to dead-birds; the land was theirs, and they saw no reason to push on. It was weird, they were still alive for now at least.

A few more branches were brandished to a man's eve as he passed through the bush-surroundings when the time of the great fire approached. Before long, every man in sight will be a box with another box on top of him, trapped in a box, where the grates are many arms and hands. His head being the giant box, with his face being bloated around each of its angles.

‘That is the man's legacy, son. Look at him, do you find him beautiful?’

Not the boy said, and he was somewhat repelled by his father who acted mightily awkward and peculiar. This was an adult who acted like a child. He had to be put down, for society was evil and allowed for creatures like him to exist. He didn't act like a man, therefore he was a cretin. And cretins are basically disabled people, in the sense of, they have to be put down and ethnically cleansed with acid-liquids they should bathe in as their skin liquefies and they become pools plastered on the wall.

‘The king is in the building.’

‘Who?’

‘Don’t know? He is the Martyr, he died. Yet he walked.’

‘What did he die for in that case?’

‘Absolutely nothing; it’s the reason he’s still walking.’

There rose the False-Martyr, deformer of reality. Of which crown looked like a peculiar spinning, twirl-eye upon a brow which extended into an inwardly pointing took, connected by tendons and veins coming out of his peculiarly berry-colored bluish purple body. His eyes being reddened, then whitened with every step. Black twirls inside of them, then green coming out various volcano-mounds that were formed across his back and his chest. He was wide-open, and one could see his exposed, barely covered by a thin-sheet of skin muscle and his ribs, the bones. This seemingly starved figure was at least eight feet tall, and built like a tank despite what appeared to be a most peculiarly hunched figure. And by the time he entered the premise, he had but thrown his evil eyes upon all of them. In their disgrace they but bowed and listened to him, as they feared; he didn’t bear an armor but had some shrapnel pieces of dark-chitin spread across his body. Some had entered him way too deep. He looked like a hallow thing, empty on the inside, then lost to a heap on the slight as he breathe upon them, a might peculiar set of purple-thin arms that came out of his mouth. Tens of them but crawling, all but wrought with the most peculiar gasping talons that emerged from their split-open tips inside the tips of its fingers.

He was a vile thing, robed below the chest with tattered clothes, a set of peculiar graves that were hidden beneath and various glyphs that didn’t mean anything, but they were written in Cyrillic. It looked like it was written in rust, his robe being metallic.

And he bore no jewelry, but wore a lot of callouses around his hands.

The False-Martyr was strong, immovable, he wilt it so. He did as he pleased, he walked as if it were a show, breaking everything that came underneath him as if to grab, the first man who came along and kept talking, he’d grab him by the face, then squash it immediately like an imploding pumpkin that burst between his fingers, like a little melon being pressured to implosion. It splattered everywhere. His bloody brains but mixing with the bone-shrapnel that didn’t even penetrate his skin; it was too thick for him to be capable of harming himself or to be harmed by others. He was strong and more importantly, he felt like had to prove it. Many people began gathering around, following him as if they were interested in what was going on. Trying to mask their fear as he started grabbing a ladder, breaking it apart with a finger; while with another finger he flipper a chair around the room. People applauded him. He smiled, revealing many teeth that were yellow, some that looked wooden and others that had holes in it caused by the beatings of a Mocking bird. He ate, most probably he ate it. He spat her then and there just to prove a point. It felt as if his presence would destroy everything.

Around him.

There was a woman, and then, there wasn’t.

There was no stop him, no one could stop him.

He was a destroyer who fashioned a throne out of nothing. Upon which he stood.

He invoked a creature, a great Artisan-Sage, to which he listened.

‘Omollusk, I call on you.’

And the creature appeared out of nowhere as if it were called, without shame and without dignity, appearing but in part, as a representation of the entire growth it bore that looked as if it were drawn by a tri-dimensional brush that was large, rounded, and looked like a bush, giving it form by unevenly jerking the brush as his peculiar creature unfolded from the bottom of the floor to the top of the ceiling, inflating itself as it was made. A contortion, that upon being dragged from one corner to the other, one could see it spread on both sides, unwrapping itself like a most peculiar parchment, from which there pulled back many armed violent ribs that hardened with every second that passed, forming little formations of gas, sacks it carried inside of it appeared everywhere it came around. To the front of which, two legs, two handed talons and a great bulk with one great eye could be seen before its split mouth emerged. It looking like a pair of sutured things that were then burnt inside its skin.

Before it could be fully grasped upon, Omollusk gave birth through its chest, upon a cunt-like opening to a great rod, with a shrunken peculiar head-replica, like that he bore forth, that spoke instead of him.

His legs bore great talons, twisted in the back and bloated. Pushing inwardly, where these caterpillar-moving toes appeared to become more and more mobile as it went along; by the time of which, this dark figure revealed a most peculiar greenish-orange skin with little geometrical connotations written upon its unwrapped body. Everything leading to weird constellations that bore mouths; regardless of which, before long, he had finally materialized himself inside the room, being no longer a projection.

His grand eye reflecting the image of the False-Martyr upon which he shone the scepter. Three skin-bubbles sprouted off the wall which seemed to be much wider and much taller than the other ones. The simply left the weaker ones hanging. Three more, greater bubbles emerged after, leaving them to hang, followed by two more after, until it had achieved flight, leaving all of them in that flaccid state they were in. Floating in the air, like sea-mines. The entire room was submerged into a chaotic flaccid-air.

‘What have you called me for?’

‘There’s been a murder and I need this place searched.’

‘In what way?’

‘You need to remove it from existence momentarily, just so I may look into the very treads of skin that are left after, so I may stumble upon the culprit.’

‘Then it shall be done.’

With which he simply shook his scepter, then all disappeared.

It was a harrowing search that took a long-while, to which he would not be completely contented with.

They were trading heads. It was a headache caused by spray-guts, they began stopping. They stopped, and they began again. A case was made, a peculiar investigation, five years ago when they were making a big bloated thing, a creature that was raised from beneath the ground, left to grow. First man who died inside the creature was one of the chief scientists that was put down by mere force, as he entered it. A peculiar ellipse flying formation followed the first people that entered the ground holes. Peculiar as they were, a stranger to the bloated needle racks inside of him said.

‘I’m going to shove missile-shaped people inside the racks that they might enter and fly around and grab some of the laughing mouths put that were wrought in ten little mongrel huts where they breed.

They will become filth and will bear more children than necessary.’

And they were done, too soon, too quick and put through. Worn-out headless, beheaded, they were bloated like giant wasp-bees if they bore their lower abdomens as big and wide as larvae. They were talking, in squares.

And the square were circles, the salt was put on top of them. They put pepper, they were swine. What did they do? They shoved faces on top of their faces as they melted their tacks and clacks, as they shoved inside their eyes, little pins, the military had to stop them.

For the thing it would grow, it would grow until it could reach the people. The people who were on top of the reverse-put shoved in the clouds people that were put inside, like Terracotta armies. Puking the most peculiar head-drones put inside, and would eat their sects behind.

‘I will eat your guts, little Flat man, you are gloated, you’re a goat-person.’

‘No, I am sand, I am a sand-pile, I have skin inside my eyes.’

‘But can you walk?’

‘I can crawl.’

‘Are you sick?’

‘Of conversing with you perhaps?’

‘What of your heads?’

There were eighty of them. And he broke his back and his hand, immediately, they were worsened by chicken, and by sausage-egg shells that were put inside. A hen was king. The real one was between one of the.

This man, this pitiful man, this fucking man, he, how dare he? He put twenty dead chicken between four real ones.

‘Who is she?’

‘I am the cock-cookeree.’

And they could be said, and they could be put, two percent put out of the room, put under quarantine, put inside the most uncanny, dreadful little children, while large heads spread around the rooms, and put under stress.

‘We should throw everything away.’

‘No.’

‘We should throw everything away.’

‘Well if you’re the one saying it.’

‘Should we listen to him?’

‘They both look the same.’

Their heads were monitors. One of the was a VCR, they were telephonic devices, but only in gut. They were smart, but not smart-smart. They had to throw out the clothes. They had their libraries inside their libraries, inside the only man. He was dead.

‘You are dead, because you’re a scientist.’

‘I know.’

They found a great place to put all the toys in, it was a kindergarden filled with dead children, they would rot in a black sack just like the black sack filled with their cadaverous remains, which were spat upon, with the rest of the most, if not, worst of pains. Had to pay the light, the code, the code was written on every floor step and on every wall, they asked to pay, pay with blood. Pay the light with blood after Easter. Spoken with the pharmacist-killer, he had a large knee-knife, pulling a curtain inside his hand. They beheaded the curtain with the embroidered little tint-heads that were headed.

‘There’s a woman.’

And there’s his husband. He fell from a ladder and broke his throat. As soon as she found him dead laying on his head, she came through and started suffocating him, putting him inside a little corn-dead little pox-filled cave. She would pay in the afterlife, there was nothing going on the floors.

Afterlife was floors. Who would take care of their children? Two boys, one daughter, a month put inside a villa with saw-blades, little spikes and many other torture devices put inside, they sent the first women in, they died at the door-step, taking the children with them, whom were put in a yarn-ball made out of dead people, who spat blood, from the blood came butterflies and moths, they ate her hair. One of the scientists remained bashed into a wall instead. It was her villa, the decision was made. Upon the last day of her living, she ate a yogurt, slowly dying of food poisoning, she was driven to bloody suicide. She was done, she knew we would live on little pegs of sugar until the diabetes took over.

‘I am the cement, the women are taking me but they won’t step on me, that’s propaganda, I know what it is.

I know what it is, they wish to torture me, they want to kill me, I don’t know. I don’t know, I don’t want to be with them, I’m afraid.

Woe to me, for I am to be killed. Listen, listen, I’m not instead, I’m not insane, I shall go into my aunt’s belly, where the red-headed.’

‘I am a killer, I don’t care.’

There was this lady and she spoke a lot, why does she go to church? I don't want to hear about it, please stop lady. Lady, stop talking to your tumor-created effigy, I can see it grow, I am afraid. Stay there, in front of it, it's different when you see it, she says. She will grow inside of it eventually. They kept a sermon with little puckers that exploded and the lady's head was popped right open, entered her chest, then got out through her cunt, creating a light, where a few volunteers offered to suck her off, as she started completely rotting away in the matter of a few hours during the night, to which they nested inside of her, trying to stab her thoroughly until she couldn't help herself any longer. Truth be told, they could be killed and flinched, they had to be cut, vomit, and they all exploded soon after. Getting out was the hardest, couldn't get away until Monday when the day of the slitting of nails through which the mad creatures danced, in June came out, completely shattering their femur-dancers which had eight heads and became the old-wreathed abominations that were but rebuilding the buildings, and didn't care about what was going on. Death-collectors, they were called. Dressed in tatters, they collected the limbs and put them in barrels, the barrels were brought to the False-Martyr who began eating from the barrels.

It was pitiful trying to eat through the guts, they were narrow in the head, split, they looked in eighteen directions, crack-open window eyes. Always paying more than needed; it was fair.

'Son, I'm only going to tell you this once, always pay a man more than he's asked for once he's done jittery done-done working his wage do and laid the foundation. Men are loyal, men are kept done, if you do what they're worth, and keep them on.

They'll always come back.'

The first semester of pain followed, his son became a strange thing, they didn't listen to the blood that spoke out of the lower pouches of his belly which grew around, he didn't know what was underneath his lower-side, that being buried even deeper than before. Prior to the sounds, he had come to the realization that the live he was going through wasn't what he wanted, yet it was too late to turn around. Life caught up with the man, he's traded his time for a woman, for children, for family, stability, security, the chance of paying his mortgage, being left with just about a mundane life, a drinking habit which in turn made it so all of his fantasies died over and were never realized, making him consider, anything but suicide, but in this case, what could've been. While time is on no one's side, that means that five years afterwards, he went through a rough divorce as his marriage had shown signs of failing as early as during the first few months after their engagement, despite the fact that they had a well-going and most memorable honey moon, that remains the highlight of their life spent together. What comes after, well and enough being alimony, child support, the never-ending split that took away his apartments, vacation houses, villas, plus a never-ending rising debt as well as bankruptcy, with him having to step out of the prestigious position he held at Clark and Real means Pox enterprise, having to live with the shame of knowing that someone who is unfit to be in lead, as the head CEO of the company took his place, he was left with nothing more but a death-wish that had to be immediately met. Coming now, to having considered as much, he had grown jealous of that lady's ability of talking for hours without saying anything, as dumb and benign as it were, despite having something come through one ear only to pass through the other, he saw that as nothing more but the eternal female ability of just repeating what she's being told while making it seem like she thought she was the one saying in the first place. That tying in with this arrogance, yet confidence in which she is displaying the message, making it seem like she actually believes what she says or that she came up with those things in the first place. Females, therefore had always been hard to understand, perhaps they were simply hardwired not to be human, as that would explain a lot, not animals either, but actually pseudo-machines that would add nothing to anything whatsoever. But their bodies made it seem like there was more to it, which was always distracting, since logic does not account for a female's body shapes. It cannot. For what is worth, all of those repeated things she keeps spewing out of their filthy mouths, at the very least what makes is bearable is their bodies. There's nothing else that's redeemable about them either than that, none whatsoever, but too much of it, and then, nothing's forgivable. A woman that exposes herself to other men is only inviting others to think of her as what she is. A dumb whore, an animal and animals need to be abused. If people act like animals, then people admit to themselves that they don't see themselves as human, it's as simple as it is. Animals are violent, animals are borderline evil, especially the carnivore ones that eat other animals alive, it's why niggers do it in their cannibalistic tribes, in their tiny primitive countries, that's how they are, and they cannot change, because they are bred and raised by other animals who don't know any better. They must be insane, they are insane, and insane people should be put down and eaten. If they're not human, they're animals. If they're animals they can be eaten, therefore it doesn't count as cannibalism, since it's a loop-hole. Law is evil, law abuses loop-holes. Lawyers are evil because they are kikes. That is how life is.

'We gather around in mourning and in faith, upon this bleak day, in this cemetery, to mourn this great loss.'

The Reverend was talking to himself. No one attended the funeral. It was dark, the soil was black, everything looked black, white and gray and in the distance he could see a few niggers being lynched by the standing willows, dangling around upon being pushed by dark winds. It was strange day, indeed it was. But there were no other niggers around, so it was acceptable.

As soon as the air cleared the Reverend continued.

His head jerked around violently, cocking off his throat as if it was caught in a never ending attempt to snap itself over. It was all too great.

He ate a cyanide pill he took out of his pocket, then fell in the open dirt-hole where the man had been put in. Open basket.

'I am the False-Martyr.'

He spoke, he said, he enunciated every syllable. Indeed, they bowed to him.

And his servant brought him a plume of skies made it bulks of bulbs that were put together and sprouting from a dark cone with many burst-out peculiar shapes that seemed to be fit inside one another like puzzle pieces yet they were made out of some organic substance that ate itself and appeared to form thin elongated inflated rose-like shapes, within every petal there being a fatter stretch that made them looked like pseudo squirming blooming cabbages, which started bloating themselves over, pushing around while they flapped like malignant wings. Wind being blasphemed as it became a strangely coagulated rotated little pox-filled fat device that began carried single beating organs inside of them, locked as if they were held in cages, floating around the room.

From his peculiar seat, he looked around the room. It was all ruined, this was the foyer. The stairs were placed behind him, right where they lead to another room which had another, much wider, higher-raised pair of stairs leading to the next floor.

Next floor, was next door. That's where the stairs lead to. That's how the entire building was built. The foyer, leading to a right leaving, upwardly put stair-way leading to a door that lead to a straight-upwardly leading door that opened to a foyer that had five apartments. Four in the front, one in the right, where the door to the right wasn't an apartment, but another stairway that lead upwardly, then to the right; going along the structure, as if it would wrap around the insides of a tower, which had an empty dark smaller flat on every side building shaped hollow spot that was dark on the inside, while there was a huge gap, but not as large above the foyer, between the top of the ceiling and the fourth on the left apartment, if seen from the open door or from the stairway which was much wider than the three others.

Although if one were to look at its empty frame or the skeleton it bore from the front side as to align the gaps and everything inside, one could see that the small building-hollow spot would be hard to be made out of mere sight as every other shape would be somehow overlapped by everything by the apartments themselves. And the initial dark gap on the right side between the foyer, which is on the left, the wall opposite to it that's placed on the right, the first set of apartments that are slightly to its right, then placed slightly above the stairs, and the next apartments which would be placed further on the right, and slightly more raised, one could see a dark gap that's the shape of a boot, making the hollow building spot somewhat uneven. While the boot had a square on its left side, from the front, which would be more likely a rectangle if it were to be seen front the left side of the building, rather from its front side. The top gap above the foyer being raised at to form a box, yet in the back it would take the mold of the wall, the right side of the upward-right leaning side of the stairway, then the left hollow spot of the next set of stairways leading into the room. A peculiarly deformed giant lived in the hollow rectangle boot hollow, to the left side of the False-Martyr, though he couldn't see him, he could sense the creature in there. Its torso was all the way back, its throat a flaccid fat black coil that's touching the chest, where the head rests across its belly, twisted in the front. All cut-texture like, with many crevasses as well as peculiarly formed ravines and mounts across its body. Its arms and legs both segmented by many twisted shapes, making the top of the boot where the does would end up being placed gut-like in appearance as to look like a twist of coils, made out of every limb that's been placed in it. Wildly wrapped like the body of a contortionist, without being allowed a moment's solace, yet incapable of making through, to the small rectangular empty spot in front of the boot because of the soles of its feet being too wide, coffin-shaped, yet blocked by the stairway-stop upon which the tips of its curled fingers rest against.

Someone one could hear him hit the walls, constantly trying itself, harder and harder, furthermore approaching a point where it could not control itself any longer. Filth-foam making the stuffing in the walls; distracting from the fact, yellow pus coming out of every corner, that every apartment was unevenly made, and most of them would be tinier than the others while those in the back that aren't contorted to the side would be only a few meters wide. As to make it seem like they were wardrobes rather than normal apartments. For example, going back at the initial four apartments, the three adjacent ones would be only go as far as to occupy a few meters in front of them, while the one on the left, the fourth one goes leftward as to be a hallway of its own, then curve around to the right as to form a giant apartment that's placed directly on top of the foyer, the first stairway, but stopping there, not to be directly only top of the rectangular hollow that's close to the giant. The same system applied to every other set of apartments as to only leave one giant apartment and three smaller ones. People were somewhat surprised to find out that, the murder that happened, this initial thing had been committed in one of the greatest apartments there were out there, as opposed to, what would've seemed more likely, to have affected the poorer tenants that lived in those unkempt, barely livable in small-rooms they were forced to deal in.

‘Yeh.’

‘Ah.’

‘Yeh-ah.’

‘Ah-hi, ah-he.’

‘Yeh-yu.’

Two morbid men spoke. Annoyed by their disturbing repugnance, the Martyr came closer to them, grabbed them by their heads, then he immediately splashed them between his fingers; plop-plop went their heads. Splash-splash, now they’re dead.

‘I must kill because I fancy destruction, but I may not be destroyed until my message is being delivered. Until then I remain, and I shall remain over many generations upon which I shall rule, and I shall crush, destroy, unnerve all whom remain after.

I know what I am, I am the last king, the last one, the last, there won’t be any more kings after me. I feel saddened by it. That this has come onto me. To bear this knowledge is a burden within itself that I have to bear.’

To which he uncurled his fingers into a fist, then punched the upper body of some stranger. It spewed into a burst of blood and guts. His spine, ribs and guts looked as if they had been show off the other side of a two-barrel shotgun that completely obliterated the ends of its barrels as the slugs came out, almost cartoonish in some manner.

Falls-Mortyr wakened and stood just as benign, degrading every sight as he moved along each second chime. Dreading but the mournful stare, not to be benign as to have dared look at what had happened. With every second passed at last. From his innards gust but a single cloud, he’s listened, to ever man who’s come in front of him, and spoken of each lie.

‘I’ve seen who’s done it, out of every man, I think he’s still free, out there.’ First man said as such.

They were morosely unaware of what was going on, as they went pint by pint, their little wonders only pushing on. It was listening, always making sure someone was there, by all means, he said.

‘Come in, I will slit you at a needle point unless you show me what I’m after.’

‘Were you expecting company?’

‘I was not, but frankly, I’m pleased that you chose to come in.’

‘I’m glad as well. Would you happen to know which direction we’re to take?’

‘I don’t know what to say sir.’

‘You live in the dark from now on, you understand that boy?’

‘Of course I do, I expected nothing else.’

‘Then it’s settled.’

And just as soon as he was done the door closed. And they were already gone, all of the eight silent men that followed him all the way back from where they came from. It was likely that it would make any difference at all, but it had.

‘I’m not invited in.’

‘You will be invited out, of the room, out of life. You need to be made to listen under every possible circumstance there is, listen.’

They had gathered around him, with the most peculiar garments they could father around them. It was peculiar and out of place, it was a disgraceful thing neither of them could deal with.

A bleak dark point, they were but paranoid. When to listen, what to say, that emotion could not be conveyed. As soon as man could turn upon itself, they saw him through. As soon as they gathered around him, there was a reminder.

Where must all live if not as far away from where they are? And what happens when no one answers their call? There a moving pile, a heap that couldn’t be made out, turn about the hour, at to be faced.

Various junkyardy formations could be just made out, but the thing without a face made its way through it.

Nefarious creatures that they were, it was unevenly placed, in their guts, they were shapers of the most atrocious manners, always trying their hands when they could not help themselves.

The Palace was but half encompassed in an unnatural guttural creation of many barely put together hard-headed large throated submarine shaped cretin-heads with guns in their arms, always trying their heads upon the alarm. He was struck through, his head was lost, it appeared in the mind, and it could’ve expressed a feeling that was dreadfully amassed. For some reason one could see just as soon that there was no reason for either of them to start.

One has to devour skin in order to open up and rip.

‘Enough of bloody torn scarps, I want to see, I want to be shown through, I want to enter your home.’

‘Where is the gate?’

‘I see only the roundness of the cut-through tunnel, the mole-machine has gotten us through.’

‘And who is the gate-keeper?’

‘The one with two faces that speaks of hue.’

Both of whom were but part of the gate, a throat attached, the body kept still. Incapable of drawing away unless he was beheaded; this thing, it had too much on-going for itself to be kept on pure soil. It lost a good chunk of its gravity swaying, too much so that it could not be forgotten nor abandoned any longer, for what was worth, and what came through it, for what might shine upon its blasted headless broth.

Through the gate, as if it were not where, and through the guardian at a time, passed through everything the sad, disgraced False-Martyr who walked but so, a face and a brow cut around and shone in hand. He showed it so and would not end.

Reminder to being called to attend the first drawing of the day; Mundane Charade Kleptomaniac Heighor opened the strange pendulum dark-door and came through the opening of the beasts. Where they had lain, inside the girth of reins there stood but one dark cove, fallen through.

He appeared to have disturbed the great table they dined upon. There were eighteen figures on each side with little more remaining of them than some peculiarly shaped unnaturally held towel-like soaked bloody thread, that held upon a few stacked together darkened jars that were but impaled by peculiar plant shaped growths that formed the great plague-like skeletal figures that were attending the diner. Their innards unpreserved, what appeared to be kept in the jars was but a strange dance that was repeated. If there were thirty six figures, with at least eight jars stacked, that made at the very least two hundred eighty eight jars that kept the dancer going. In that yellow-liquid he appeared at times, as if he had been spliced and cut and split in many little sheets and parts, they appeared then disappeared until this process was but repeated but endlessly as to be observed. Put together and but seen, one could not fathom but see the pattern from where he rose, his every move, hundreds upon hundreds of feet, of legged arms, and heads and every single thing but there, then gone. Again, in a waltz only they could hear and face each shroud. And the skeletal figures covered, but to hold, unnatural covers, parchment, garments in their eyes as well as ocular extenders, many a boots put on.

‘I want to remind you what I came here for.’

‘What reason is there for this intrusion?’

‘Martyr, I’ve come to ask something of you.’

‘You may sit for now.’

As soon as he placed himself there, the rotten cove they were in was but plume, out of sight, and they were both met by naught else than what they saw.

‘Rotten brown puckers rotting, I see.

There’s but the wails that’s are in the dark, floating.’

With little remnants of specks of dust, left for what was left behind, nothing else that could be made and nothing that would push them, say. There was no reason to look past it, as one should be made aware.

‘Those people that were here before us?’

‘They were only for show and you know this, do you not?’

‘I wanted you to approach on your own will and on your own accord for some reason.’

To their very cores.

Whatever the reason or the marches to continue in such a manner, they churls into place, until rose just about everywhere, having formed the most unnatural things one could dream of. Large formations just about the place, all of them but pushed, much deeper, as the hour went, through many of the long beheld, much destroyed, uncanny wedges and the harps inside the lands, many of which were long depressed for the only reason they could be there, if at all. Great portions of the land had risen from the depths and had only went as far as to rise a few meters off the ground and float as far and as wide as the eye could see when the time came and formed little cement-walker shaped destruction dots that appeared out of nowhere in the air and began exploding forming large eyed unnatural darkish figures that were riding on peculiar horse canes that were put on even larger rods as they were actioned upon the air by peculiar extenders that had not only many faces but appeared to gurgle inside their empty throats, spitting unnatural looking large stars-made out of pure immaterial atoms that appeared to be much more concave as they hardened with every passing second, doing what they could to eat and spread like an incestuous plague from the floating bodies of which, upon the time when they appeared, had given birth to peculiar looking inbred figures with tails and cartilage wings, limbless and poorly developed as if they looked like peculiar animal, mole fetuses that had opened an area that sprouted from beneath their throats, going as far as to encompass a great deal of their lower bodies through which they started pushing out large citadel-ziggurats of stone and of smoldering dark-tinted iron that began dripping blood everywhere which was spread across the marches, mixing with them, until one of the dark Emergers finally came out of the bile pouches which appeared to fly around the floating march-liquid that formed everything, there being nothing beneath it, not even something that might closely resemble land, making it seem like there wasn't any way out once one saw what awaited them below.

Upon the hour, as if that could be somehow manifested in a land such as this that had no way to open itself to the passage of time, in the distance a peculiar triangular gradient of white grays framed itself upon a dark sky that appeared to be made out of torn out pieces and some rooted ivory-femur shaped buildings that appeared to move at such a distance stopped, as to reveal that beneath them, upon the peculiarly bloated tails upon which they walked, they had nothing else other than some unnatural looking large primitive oyster-pillared put together chain-like formation that started seeping into the mist as well, every building being very much alive, as it happened for the top of the femur to produce an unkempt amount of fizzy hairs, wild curls that started sprouting the bodies of some servants that started pushing out of themselves until they became open, spreading large, over-encompassing ever-extending black cord-like shooters that spread throughout the world as if it were some bouncing bullet that could never be spot, out of which black specks came out as if they were dormant locusts, now put against many of the ziggurats to worship the falling of the sand-shaped frogs and leopards-like gutted bags that were dropped from the sky.

They were bloated beyond belief and would walk like strange things before they exploded in guttural noises.

‘There needs to be some order here.’

Said one of the ear-pinched, nail-impaled through the heads Gangrenes-Ohrs.’

They were dark as tar and rose from a leg upon which they walked like frozen figures towards each other, being capable of speaking only during dark days, such as this.

‘We shall seethe no longer and discuss, force the table to recede back on.’

Upon a dark-tainted platform they stood. It was all peculiar, not to be understood by mere mortals as one would have it.

The three of them were as follows.

Emperor-Cursing; he was standing in the front, refusing, the side, he was standing to the side, refusing to sit down despite the other’s intentions.

Two of them were seated, Liar-Clicks and Adorned-Disciple, which only left the peculiar figure at one end and the False-Martyr who looked mightily bored and concerned with the chaotic embrace of everything that fell, how the purple eggplant skies but spread and jerked ahead, with the many peculiar crawling red-bubbling transparencies but going alone, those air-tendons, those air-veins and everything else being wide-spread. Little anchored sphere of put together floating blue. And estranged eons of yellow that passed just as soon as they were forgotten before the time withdrew.

‘We shall speak of what is to be done about the invader.’

‘And who might do and what might do and whom to take of him as well?’

Said the Emperor-Cursing who was just as peculiar as it seemed, just as distraught, incapable of making it seem like he was doing it after the passing. Out of his own accord, before he could pint himself and fall between them all, he couldn’t even dare lift a finger as if to see, what was happening between all three of them, was just as much, as both could see.

They trust neither of us.’

And the dancer was nowhere to be seen, for he was cut in too many pieces, appearing too often, then rooted to the flying bubonic-skeletal figures, they were but carried away in the distance, incapable of making free thought, they were bubonically blinded.

Some would not.

‘Silence now, I need to think so I might address something that happened before, and before I may be reminded again, I wish to know why you’ve come here to begin with, I wish this court adjourned and my meal ended. I wish I will be greeted by many great men that will come to servitude and war when needed but for that I need to leave, I need this speech of yours complete so I might come to resume.’

‘Then you shall be pleased to know that we won’t keep you for very long in such a land as there’s but something largely obscure that’s been going along.

As you may have settled by now to look upon the ground upon coming as far as to realize what’s been happening, by the rust, there’s been a large amount of mild destruction, of some unkindly womanly fashion. ‘

‘Enough with those chatters, Adorned-Disciple, I need to know.’

There was no table any longer as if withdrew forth. Boasting from the ground there came, a coffin remained, but in the open thing, from which there came but Riis, had been called to attend the meeting and to plain, and quiet and to ask, what happened after that was but a circle in which they paced about, being incapable of making it through.

‘We’ve wasted a few people, of servants and many that are dead, they are tainted but cannot be made no longer witness what’s been called ahead.’

‘What is there to be called? I see only a spread of malformation, look at the animals, they explode. Yet they’re reformed just as soon as they’re made destroyed, they cannot be fashioned of lonesome things as to be prized and to be put through sin, as for the men who follow us know no more.

We do govern over them but we’re kings and rulers of our own.’

‘Your point being?’

A voice asked the Liar-Clicks, whom to look about upon such fist of pain, of malignant wretched and torsions as well, most of which just appeared to be there, forming thoroughly as well, as well. He was but a swoon of limbs, that appeared when there was peace. He had grown a few, not more than twenty, all of which flaccidly hanged haggardly but painted as they’ve lain. On top the ground, when one had to call it yet again.

‘They become but little patches that may yet to be walked upon, I know you can see reason in my words when I’m saying this, for know that we may yet retain what held us back.’

‘What is there to talk upon in such a case?’

‘I wish I could strip their skin off and drink what they lose, when dead, when dead.’

‘Is this why we were called here for? In such a case, should we stay here no more or are we to talk? Are we to walk, are we to make sense out of anything?’

‘That would be unkind and mightily benign, since there’s but no reason to rush to sense. What good has sense done to anything when they were alive?’

‘None and it shall do us that.’

With a clap of his strident hands, the False-Martyr had just sliced his head, but there it came back again, if it was but caught on a string, pulling it back in until he could not be forced to lay and lay within, the hour had followed as such. There were a multitude of peculiar stranglers that had been hanged around the place. Some fires started, spreading around, until they suddenly began making large fire-formations that began burning the air, going as far as appearing inside people’s eyes.

‘Hmm, there’s something onto it, you’re onto something, I think you are.’

There were peculiar objects in the sky which moved at times, but froze when seen, or at least did their best not to move for a peculiar amount of time since it helped them blend with the environment, creating the illusion that they were quasi invisible, while being capable of moving away from where they stood at any time, even though they couldn't move when doing it since they required a considerable amount of time to blend it. And they had ore-organs one could mine the vein of if they could see it in the glory of these galleon-giant things. It was a dark room and there was only one wall that could be used at a floor. A man slept in one of them. It was dark inside but he had a lantern, a flashlight, a glowing tube, a fire-snatcher, some light matches, a lighter, and flare-gun. He also had a knife on him and brown pants, a leopard-tinted textured shirt, a dark belt with a horseshoe buckle, a dark moustache, sweaty eyebrows, one yellow and one dark eye, and one blue as well but that was in the back of his colt, which he carried about. He made a habit of taking shots at the ceiling, tracking the general bullet trajectory with his mere eye.

It was dangerous being there, it wasn't there, it was there, it wasn't there, it was there, it wasn't there, it was there. And his eye was but bluntly struck by something that simply made a habit out of showing itself like a shy woman would, spreading her legs only for a moment before she drew her skirt back in, only to have a man just look at her, then him at her.'

'You always missed me, haven't you?

Little thing, I'm going to blow off the tip of your pillar, I'm going to chip it off, with just a little cut, a little cut and more than that.'

He made plans, since there was no escape, one day he woke up there, the other one, hey.

He remembered Ivory and her sweet, sweet voice. It was something he wanted to draw back when he felt lonely. When he wasn't concerned from one day to the other, since there wasn't anything around to hold his full attention, since there wasn't even enough space for him to move it, he was simply left to take his chance with whom he imagined. A dim light was just enough.

'This day, I'm counting on you sweet glow-lance.'

It was what he called one of the matches.

'Will I lay in the dark for long now? Am I to be called upon the hour so I may finally but set myself on flame?'

'To that I say, put down your lance of fire, as you need to realize that you're not alone and you've never been alone in this dark solace by any means.'

'Who are you? Show yourself so I may see whether or not you're to be trusted, as I need to know whether or not you've hid something from my sight.

I, a man of insight might not undo such ribs as to see the laces off your shoes in eons I spent alone but at the very least, I only ask of you to show me what's been happening in the dark and what might be hidden during the time my heart was poached in this place.'

'You know that I can't do that properly now, do you?

Since this place is owned and the master of this home may not be wanton to be intruded upon during his studies.'

'Where's the coward?'

'Watch yourself before some hidden limb comes near.'

Towards which the fiend had but thrown a single arm towards him in such mere sign of disgust he didn't know how to react or what he might do about it. Since, upon stumbling on it, his mere reaction had been to jerk it in every possible direction as to see whether or not it would bleed. In which case he was no longer confused, nor had he tried his harness and the hardness that had made his shirt against it. He stained it with the blood, then he tasted the arm. It was mercury, which only poisoned him but he could not stop drinking and eating, since he had been kept there for far too long, until, upon seeing how desperate he had become, the fiend-culprit which was hidden, this, no more than a bandit had shown himself then, within the lack of something that might've made him but seen in part as serenely, he showed but half and half was enough. For no mere many could look at it for far too long without shining the bright light away as to blow it, out of mere disgust and alacrity which was caused by this creature. For what appeared to be floating were but a few things to be touched, that only his contorted palms would barely wrap around, because of the mere width being somewhat so uncanny that not even both his hands could do. Leading to a peculiar shape, as deformed as to be the size of a giant's head, yet no featurely manner could be as contorted as the weird basins and depressions that lead forth until they made the tip that would not even show some arrogance as to enter the holes of the moon, since those things, if they were as little as to be touched and entered through it by the head, wouldn't even come close to keep themselves whole as to show that through every possible side it spread and only pushed away until it formed some pseudo-contortionist's wet dream as he'd become but a tool of many push through things that anchored into soil and other kinds of empty houses, to which at the ends it held, finally, something he would be made aware off, the watcher-organs, being very much outwardly placed, blinking yet such twists could not be called out, since they only fashioned themselves in the most nervous of envious little organic pinchers, having come out of their mouths.

'We've spoken before and more than a few times thought you may choose not to recall entirely most of our previous interactions did happen, though I may be ashamed to remind my very own self that I've stumbled on the realization that many times I left you to starve and rot in such a place. To which I must thoroughly apologize, and make you know, reminding you that I've come with plenty of gifts, as if to show that there's still someone out there caring for you.'

'That is to say, your master, I presume?'

The one that isn't to be disturbed by any means, for which I think I am inclined to ask, there's nothing in here, past the wall, it's as thick as a brick and you know what I think?

I don't think there's a master in it; I don't think there's any study happening.'

'And there's no servant either.'

But there was a limb, though the creature was gone; regardless of where he shone his light, there was nothing to see and nothing to find, hardening by the minute, his mind could not be forced to meet upon such plain delights. It was simply not there, he wasn't aware where he's gone or what he's done but that was just as much as he had thought off.

As time drew on, he could only conceal nothing more than his complete desire to shine his boot and carry on and take away whatever weariness might shook him where he stood. Otherwise, he didn't know how to proceed.

'You, dead-limb, you are indeed my only long-lost friend.

I find myself looking at you often; will you speak to me now?'

'I will, if you insist on me accompanying you if that's the case. I missed you and I wish there was another chance that I may, do something to bring you back, to the way you used to be during a time you were free.'

'How could I possibly repay you If that's the case?'

'That is simple my good friend Anthony, you must eat me completely, you must devour me until I will have been no more, that's the only possible way I may come to be made, that's the only way I could become something, as to grow from inside your veins, then become you.

I will sprout out of your back and you may walk wherever you wish, even outside.'

It's a reasonless crime that's bred on.

Forgotten

Somewhere near their cities, up in the high-peaks where their kin stood, there lay but a bird-tower, highest than the peaks. It throbbed all of the sudden in the distance as it rose and rose until the burst of leaks started pulling out and spilling. Though there was no blood inside the building, let alone the dead-infants singing, finally they pulled out, shouting as if in doubt. Wreathing all around the place they grew and held the Carrion-building in a place of Hue, from whence it could only dread, and spread ahead and lead them to no end.

'It's two o'clock, isn't it?'

'This what it is, think you could do better than me?'

Two distant rods starting to melt into each other, they seemed dull at first, but then they started melting. Dolt-Head came in. Dolt-Head followed.

Eight more of them on each side, hands melted, forming two distinct beings. Most of the ones attached were brainless, morbid-looking and worn out.

Both of them were trying to eat off the floors. Wild and deranged as they were, chests were open forming wildly estranged long mouths that chewed the place off.

From a wild angle, there was a door of hue. And even farther, from the distance came a strange man. Behind him, an explosion of colors.

‘You can’t do that, not here.’

One of the strange men said. They were around, they went around and around their shoulders and worn-out woven arms they wore dead-children stand, whose heads had been flattened and made to look like stop signs from all directions, and they looked, if the room was aimed towards the door and twisted as if to look from a flying angle where one would fall through the door, if the entire planet was tilted, like an asterisk, which spread his the Frontal lobe shot forth and in an arched left and right direction while the Parietal lobe split only in two opposite direction as the Occipital lobe merged into one piece that formed a thin tail at the back of its head.

‘What are you doing with them?’

Asked Hern as he stepped in; standing them unquestioningly as he wondered what happened while he had been missing. That looked like one of the children on top of the roof-tops.

‘There’s no self-control for evil people, we shall cut you, fiend.’

‘You shall do nothing of the kind, for I will have slit your fingers by the time you made it off the scalp of the floor.’

Said Hern to the Dolt-Head.

The other, Dolt-Head appeared to be standing too far from him, barely located in a wild angle and a strange direction, splitting both the floor in the middle and the wild plane-like direction that shot in every angle on the other side of the room. The man from the Compound was there, as evil as he seemed, the man who was part-machine. Of whose body copy was still coming out of his chest, pointing its second head and arms towards a sun that wasn’t there. And with him, a bunch of wire-creatures, mad fiends created out of desperation, castrated by the evil of the Compound. And they seemed to try dragging him back, only so they might throw him into the vile forge of fire and have him burnt into the mad furnace from which many of them refused to drag themselves into.

‘Did you see that cat?’

‘Can’t think of either of them.’

One giant cat passed through the building, destroying it almost completely on the side, eradicating the view of the Compound while pushing the creature back in.

‘Loathsome creature, why are though not in chains?’

He called upon that deathless one who poured himself inside his veins.

For Dolt-Head could not help it any longer as he started stabbing himself, leaving nothing to be kept, his veins were wide-open and all of the sudden he began drawing in as much as he could.

‘Yes, I think we should find out who’ll bleed faster.’

Said Dolt-Head, coming no sooner to him.

Hue's view was still psychotic.

There was a wall of skin which was dragged from the giant cat's spine, made out of many skinned insects that spat out of their lung tunneling dugout holes their dark-shells, and weirdly deformed exoskeletons.

There was a written reminder, of which words were depressed in and seemingly pushed in by coagulated blood thumbs. Small flying rat worshippers droned in and levitated around the wall, worshipping the writings. Mice followed them through, of which heads extended and united with that of the rats, forming a clean shade of skin, a sheet on which the aspiration of man appeared, like a reflection of a scholar who wanted to devour what was written in. For he saw no words and could read nothing; but could either of them help themselves any longer?

Missing danger, missing notions, missing marks, no semi-colons written in, word after word looked on in doubt.

And both Hue and Dolt could not help themselves any longer, it was too late for that, it was dangerous, the gangrene spreading, for it was no mere disease but that of the mind, they were clear on that, way too clear, way too devoured by it. They had to be, for the rats and mice left the room and blocked the one stricken down passage in the sky which wanted to flay their skin and have them botched into the snail-cages that were set in flight. And rotten as they were, some had started devouring the mad-malignant remains that were inhibiting their access points, inside their necks.

Evil men of south and even farther in the southern realms had come and upon their extended spines, no man of no worth would look down upon them once he realized how deformed they were and how they bore the cages there, inside of which their children stood and swooped upon one another's chords. In their cracked backs they stored enough fat for far and in-between to devour each other's stricken lower bodily deformed regions.

Farther than where they stood, their children's projections appeared to be completely and malignantly set into the Pier'. For farther in the sky where their images projected they formed large planetoid-like structures upon which they rested, waiting and waiting in need for some mad celebration as madness was being shared. As their false-gore came out and formed the belts that dragged them down.

They dreamed of such resolve as to have even the slightest chance through which they might see themselves there, in the distance fleeting. Largely in disgust, unable to breathe as their spectral appearance came back to their bodies, weeping as they only had been as unable as they were, incapable of staying for too long. Wreathed in the most peculiar ways, unable to convey emotion as they no longer thought about escaping. And above them, the snail cages started melting once they were being fed salt, by the Evil men who finally came back to the room where the confrontation happened.

Once there, they finally met, for better or worse, there stood Hue, of which no direct watch or motion could retire, the admiration of colors and shades, of hues that entered his head could not match the desire and the temptation to read upon the wall and wonder.

'Who wrote that?'

Unquestioningly he stopped asking, breathing falsely as he could not help himself but blur the dark images that entered his head. Some of which had been forgotten and would admire even those of dead men that entered the hold, of unrecognizable colors and that of his own which stood there. Walking falsely, as the trembling colors falsified themselves to no end.

‘But now I see that everything makes sense and everything is in its rightful place just like it ought to be, as I see it so.’

The Compatriot thought once he looked upon the walls and upon the floors, and what remained of the ceiling and everything else, with a bit of his countenance being worn out. He knew it to be true.

For the walls had been encompassed by dead-dogs, rotten, which grew like tumors everywhere around, while the maggots started spreading from everywhere inside its body, trying to encompass everything in their tendril-like reach. They were trying to devour as much, and no reach could stay their long-stretched pox-filled hands.

‘Yet, I see there’s only but a chance, we may not be able to get away, but hear me, and hear me now, for I shall desire nothing more for you if you do so.’

Help me at the unawares, I am no disgrace but I shall make do without a pace. And I shall cut and eat and clean this place of its malignant influence.

And once done, there shall be none and there shall only be the rotten gun that shall be used to kill what’s left. To put them out of their misery, to no end, I shall see it so.

Aid me now, you Dolt-Head.’

For he had known just as little and little more than it was needed from the front. His malady was forgiveness and time was almost up.

‘Very well then.’

This time around answered Dolt-Head, who had been just as painlessly quiet as the other one around.

‘It’s obvious that we cannot remove ourselves from what’s already been broken and destroyed, so, if anything, there is still hope.’

‘Hope is malignant and it can only be parasitically projected upon every surface that’s already been created. We shall strive to set and form a deal then, you dolt.’

Done, so, those evil men who bear their children outside, in their vile children-stocked cages shall destroy the planet eventually and completely grind what’s left of the growing canines into bitter maggot dust.

We ought to leave.’

Said Dolt-Head, thence, upon questioning none any longer, he pressed on. There was only a man looking for a way to be deranged and looked down upon. In quiet desperation, he attained naught. He wondered at that and looked in-so.

‘We shall enter it then.’

For bitter hope had made it so he turned. As Dolt-Head used the child with an asterisk for a head to batter a hole into the wall, setting way through the hole, although there was no compound of their own to go through, they resigned. Through the open wing that lead to the room in which the man stood.

Rod, he waited there outside his chamber. Looking as if he had been long-deranged and ever in so quiet wonderment.

‘And who might you be?’

Rod asked the two of them, skewing what was left, unable to repent he wondered.

For now came the Dolt-Head, and he almost knelt, unable to stray his hand for some sort like his would never set forth from any other place.

‘Greetings, I say, to you, oh dire creature of which name I know little off.

Care to explain to us, in the dire affliction that is this place which be rotten down, what might be do about the fall? And who shall deal with that of which is rotten now?’

‘I don’t know what you want from me.’

And only Hern approached the man. He knew as little as he could tell. He saw it fitting, that he dwelled for even less than needed, his breath confined, unable to die, he looked to the side.

‘What an awful place you left here so.

Care to tell me what the reason is for everything falling into a deathless snow?’

‘I will show you no reason for me having come here.’

Rod told Hern, but he didn’t understand at all. Just what the reason for each trance and why was he there at all.

‘Follow us towards redemption, we shall make it through that light, to end.’

And thence they came upon the sight, upon the vision, of no end.

They entered it and finally stumbled, upon the plains of Agamemnon, wondered.

There the two of them were, but which ones?

Malt and the Duke’s shadow, and near them they approached. Standing ever-so wondering, just whom to whom and whom to end? For what purpose were they there?

Hern had never met a man as strange as him, and never to his countenance would he understand a whim or the quiet or the wonder of what was done. Forever more would he wonder at that and why the long walk which lead him to be done, with every evil-deed done in countenance of evil and even the worthless days spent up-shore, never after would they wander so, why was it that they would feel evil from the one that shone?

‘Who are you?’

But the Tongue-Agamemnon refused to answer, for the first time in wonderment as well, thought of himself as an infinite being with as much wisdom as one like would share to no end.

And then upon the touch, the calling, it seemed like the Dolt-Head had only become his calling. For he had merged with the hues, forced by the bleakness and the formations of the peculiarly wild geometrical objects that had formed his mind and body, first conjoined then molded as to become him. For Dolt-Head had split in half, at the middle he became the Compatriot’s wings.

And even after his death-known and looked upon, even after the bullet that shone which burnt his body in the fire scourging after, he had known himself to be of a deathless kind in a universe that did not show any love for his kind. The scoundrel could not help himself. Upon being shown his face, he almost came to be resigned and then.

‘It’s already done, do you not realize that? You’ve died in the past but you’ve been given another chance.

I am the one who’s given and lend upon you the vision.’

Agamemnon said, and without ever questioning it ever again, he accepted his past-fate and looked forward that he might even hear and be kindly greeted, nearing no death but as to wonder.

‘What do you want of me then?’

‘Follow the others yonder.’

As Hern had joined the Duke and Malt, as they looked in the distance where just about everywhere, and many a star had become a head. Taken from the chamber, many chose to shin in light. And as peculiar as it sounded, it was all too beautiful, about time, which spend, upon no end, just straying.

They looked upon Malt, who was happily in thought. Wondering as well as he could not draw himself away, from thinking of what he missed along the way.

‘I wish I was reunited with Claire. I wish I had a chance to spend some time with my child instead.’

‘Don’t bother yourself with regret over the past, it is a pointless errand none may be able to call you upon.

For what is worth, I think they’re thinking of you still.

So you need not feel bad about their destiny within.’

For he had looked with saddened eyes, although he lived as petty and as evil, there had been no sight and harm he had yet to inflict.

And it was just as forbidden and forlorn. That this degeneracy of its own would be the one thing bonding reality together, as pitifully deformed, as something of its own, never to be approached or sworn.

Know this, for this, as much as it is worth to know.

Tongue-Agamemnon was a mighty and wise lord. Of plains known, and during his mighty pacing, as long as it had been, where destruction waited, tainted on a whim, there he stood and spoke thus.

To Malt, the Duke, Hern and Rod, to which he accompanied them, in death, in life.

‘We shall set forth to the forest that is devoid of life, and there and only there we shall meet the man that shall hold the light that carves the way leading us to the kettle.

Along the way, as it’s required, we shall finally have acquired taste for blood, an animal awaits us to no sound.’

And from the girth of the mountain where an old Agamemnon’s head wasted, a vision they detested opened along the way. Fealty and filth.’ They said, waiting along the way.

Eternal bliss got them along the way. There, where none might dwell upon and lay. Finally upon release, they felt nothing but the piss-poor sight, and under light.

But once there, as they lay forth, they’ve seen it all and never worth.

‘What is this forest and what has happened to thine trees?’

Sekov turned and looked benign, unable to think, yet there, to dine. In fealty of little doubt, he knew as little, not to shout.

But they missed it so. Just then, one of the tormented dogs, of whose maggot throve had settled inside of them faded. Under light and rightfully so, brought to nothing, never again, as so, they missed it.

As an angelic thing, a cherub with a wing of maggots, of a flight of death, from which he appeared to bear no eyes with a light instead.

For the darkest secret spoken to the man, of which peril lay ahead was simply gone.

‘A deathless thing of agony, be gone from this forest as you may need, to enter the dead lamb and search for within.’

For the creature had revealed just as much, as there was no other words to be placed.

‘There is no kettle inside of it, only but a nuclear pit, a billion-like girth of infinite nuclear bombs waits there, kept inside, and better brought and deathless in sight.

Of no right would one like you, of better hue know the likes.

For it beckons the destruction, that it may spare all live from the one who seeks destruction of all.’

Though Sekov, as uncannily worn, he could see of nothing worth, and never mind the matter, knowing and of the little thought, he called upon the likes, throwing but disease, the like.

Trying to make sense of the dog that set itself in flight, never to be approached again.

It was weird seeing them together.

‘Well, what are you looking at?’

Malt turned to Rod.’

‘I’m not looking at anything, it’s just that, you know, I never expected to be here at all.’

‘It probably won’t last either.’

Silence came.

Was it all truly real?

It looked like the forest was indeed devoid of life, as Sekov simply hallucinated them all there, standing, before they disappeared.

‘Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha, I guess I must’ve imagined it all.’

And yet Sekov never opened his mouth to begin with.

Around the Northern Bloc

There was this at least, for what was worth and what was left.

A single head-bobber, metallic as well as a body of a single brain-tube, it was shaken where it stood in quiet, where bubbles arose and shook the posture out of the one thing that froze in the chair. He was a man standing in the empty room, which had been blown or flashed as if it were the after-shock of a single camera shot. And there were puddles of hardened white pain. Inside the tube he looked at himself as well as the one brother he lost, long-gone, and misshapen. It was a terrible, terrible thing, trying to think outside his box. His box-chamber was struck inside a single man’s ribcage which had become part of the building he was in. Luckily for him, this wasn’t the side of the Bloc where the few people managed to get on top of the buildings, but was farther away. And the lower basin and the legs of the giant man were kneeling on the snow.

And he missed his arms, throat, neck and organs, holding the building away from falling an iceberg-depth of a pitfall. It was all too dreadful, looking from afar, but he wasn’t dressed, nor would he have his organ exposed for he had none. Instead, he wore a hardened shell which surmounted to just as much. Or it looked like the niche-of iron, casings being struck down. And his pitfall was this, he housed, in his insides, overly grown parasitical creatures which were just like that of the Negro that had almost died in the Isles.

Dreadful, dreadful thing they were, being allowed free reign to grow, just his much had been perplexing, as none dared approach the cold side and the slide-away, taken from the farthest reached of the building which lay inside the Bloc. A few uniforms were there. They were different, especially as seen from behind. Their bodies were on the ground, longer limbs bore harder legs and hands and strange arms which pulled away from them, as if they wore one arm on top the other, one leg on top the other, so on and so forth, bearing two fake-heads in the front. An open-hole in the back, stretching from its own insides, there lay a single tube-like holder which bore as much as it was needed, a single climbing pole, as the type used for the training dummies, of which longer pints, or bitter cylindrical things only drew out and started watering the dread crimson-blue plants that came out of snow.

And there was a dreadful time to meet the ones, of, whose masks, once bitten down would reveal the faces of which frozen thin, and malignantly deformed features pushed in and appeared to bear, only eighteen, clearly aligned ice-picks which constantly threw out cold hardened snow which became, the flying globes of ice-picked lightless glow which came around the place in searching, making sure the sutures of ice kept the giant from falling apart. Otherwise, of filthy new, of escaped thin reeds of nettled-heads, this came.

A man appeared out of nowhere and moved in an instant, without being able to pay much attention to whom was there.

‘I am Malcolm and I’ve come to claim my rightful place, as the leader of this maze of Ice. I am to become your lord and master of the North as I claim my birthright by which my father’s delight had taken claim of me.’

But lo’, what was there? In the distance, in the air, there lay an apparition only he could see. And it was floating and it was cold, how his eyes had become blue out of their own desire to join it in the curve of snow when and during a time he could only know. No better than he should thrown his arms around the air. To become one of them and float into the strange ether which was the cold winded abyss he called heaven. But some of the Cold-uniforms could not look anywhere else but there and wonder. What was wrong with he, yonder? What was he seeing? Even though they had regained, the marks of the strange abyss of cold, whence he went during his wake.

‘What is that? But what is that?’

And why am I called to it, must I be mad not to realize what’s going?’

His thin arms and legs were caved in, for he pulled out a string off his cloak and revealed that he had no chest but the insides of a cove, where a few tiny people had once lived and left a few impaled animals within him.

Then and only then could they talk about it, now as much as yonder, they were strong, but less in doubt and few about the place would do that.

For they wanted to prod and look out of the way, of shame, of a very great shame they appeared to know about as they were taken about their heels and wanted to slay him after that.

‘You’ve killed them and you claim to be one of us.’

‘Would you not have done the same if you were in my presence yet again?’

‘Nay, we would’ve never done so, for we were trained to preserve.’

Oh, dreadful sting of ice and mine of iron, of which picks had slain and killed all inside their tire-desired.
What shall I have done with thee?’

‘May I have a single drop of green-tea that I might wake up to my senses?’

‘Leave?’

And to make sure they knew who they were talking to, he pulled but a short-curved sword painted black and started chopping his fingers yonder, one by one, until he could no longer deal with pain, as he remained wondering.

‘What have I done to deserve this?’

‘Move along the way.’

Farther and even farther than it should matter, there was a family which lived inside, and they wore close-curved fur-frost clothes which were his as well as that.

Fight

‘Run, run he’s going to shoot.’

Got down, got down, twenty rifles all point-black, shoot through every wall, every piece a grain of a face, bloodied as they reigned down, tiny pebbles being wrung about. Long-rifle, large shot took down the wall, small thing, long knife, round about two soldiers, knees brought down, pushed through. Eight-grenades thrown about the place.

‘He’s coming from nine O’clock, two , eight five, coming, two-two Alpha, down, get down, there they are.’

And they tried shooting at their heads but they heads. Their hands were pistols and they bore like deflated cones inside their floating eyes which gravitated around their pink lights, pushed around, tiny speck, nuclear knife going off.

‘Great entity you shall not die still, as long as there shall be filthy, your strange appearance and deceitful names, all shall be abandoned, yet you shall live as well.’

For he was hidden, by some while, a creature as benign, ever changing, hidden by a culprit’s manner, destroyer of a spanner’s woe.

‘Bask in filth and grow again, you may be but the voice of a leper, hiding, in the wreathing throng, desperate as you may know. Of past shells, now lay abandoned, but you shall thrive-bubonic after the matter.’

And he still prayed only so that the entity might remain somehow and breathe through lust and push through until all was cast into the plain abyss.

‘Why must we hide?’

‘It is utmost necessary, that you remain uncalled.’

‘Worry not, for I shall keep your essence safe, god of filth, and you shall be hidden and put away, in safety, as one ought to know.’

‘Then, oh, listen to thee, oh Filth, in desperation.

You shall be drawn away and put inside, a new shell, yet benign.’

For the other one, in whichever side, the mountainous heap, or less, aside, would have to be bluntly put together and remade.

‘Your body is amorphous, your body ever-changed. I feel its degradation and I remember your fake names.’

He had to look again at it, that malignant creature made but of a piece, benign. Stolen in mind and desperation, ever-so unpleasant to look upon, only to be seen; from where it stood one could see it at a pile of limbs, worms and worn out species. A pile of filth and mass, and dead upon which cast, had been made of it, of every death and everyone taken, all reclaim and put into its gander. Though never liked and all uncanny, its filth was but of most heinous form.

Down the pile there lay its many faces, the bodies of the thorn, the many features that had been taken and everyone who’s ever lived on. It had to be, that he was there. That leprous bubonic face which had once been his, now only but a piece in the making, long abandoned, rotting with all whom had once been alive.

‘What shall become of me?’

It spoke to itself and it responded.

‘You hid away, and dared deceive the beings into thinking, let along in hiding, not be known.

But now, your filth and essence shall crawl forth and find another way to be.’

‘What of their destruction?’

‘Has it not brought you enough satisfaction now? I adhere to as much, and I shall only be brought to ask this, what do you need of me?’

‘I need but a new name, a body that I shall inherit before I satiate the destruction I brought forth.’

‘What should the body be that you which shall you have inherited forth?’

‘I do not know but we already poisoned everything, hence there can be nothing set. We should only be aware of this.’

There, in some way, it was already done with, already settled in part, and most importantly, there was nowhere near but a sign, for anything that might be worked upon, there would lay, not the body of a long, not the most unnatural growth-a-log, but a mongrellic creature for the time. Absorbed in it, an essence utmost benign.

‘Without a face and without form, you’re but it and you shall be known for what you are, Filth as it shouldn’t be forgotten thence. And you shall remain with me and through your essence I shall flay each land and creep inside and I shall settle upon your filthily decayed bones, something to have set forth.’

‘Thence it be, I see that there’s a reason for you, to see and set forth, reason.’

‘With that I think we are set, and we shall push on and wreath into uncanny kind. Blind that you shall be taken and put from your spilled forth aside.

Walk where you might please, in life, for whatever you might touch and spray and filth remain.’

Thence the wonder had come to pass and for the same reason, as if in trance, there was no other reason to be reminded as much, for all that remained was for him to be spread when time called upon its essence to come.

A hollow wreathed armor still

It shall be known that there would be. Somewhere walking, in desperation yet in form, through the essence of one who even stole the kingdom upon which his throne hanged, upon the visionary sights and the other delights, of which just as little might be known.

Though one could see such creatures as the Courtesan and others who were broken apart, some of their shells walking, some caught eternally tracking upon paths carved through entrails. And ever-pardoned, none would remain, not for long, not until their deaths would come. Ever so stronger came the reminder, that there was a reason they were set to suffer, not in life, nor in strife, not to be kept for too long, as there were no bodies inside, only the chemicals which had once made them.

If one would search reason, he might not find in within the treason which was despair. None could be lesser, of the stress which was disease.

For it appeared to have twisted the armor as it finally came out and filled. Every part of the world was abandoned, yet there were strange, almost chemically atomic high-microscopic looking creatures that flew. Some looked like some strange pores, or some much peculiar spores which floated, yet the same marks and the same graves of armor could still be seen caught as if in a trap, never allowed to get through as well as that feeling of agony they pushed through.

It dawned upon none that this would be a fate shared by all, but it had to be, and never to see, there would be, within reason, three marks signaling what happened. Some were worn and other scowling.

Voice of filth:

For I, ever since I have been build of since, of names that given and better since, Aloyssa by inception, uncanny creature that I am. Though I have taken many names before, I shall still convey the life, through strife and never-ending delight of vileness, I have found a way to live.'

'Why have you been saved?'

'I cannot and will not answer if, for you found me at an uncanny strife. Whatever the reason for it might be, I shall never be delighted with it.'

Otherwise

A few butterflies were driving on, in van-like growths and towering pieces of scum joints, walked by large long-legs upon long stretched which lead upwardly burrowed into a skin tunnel, where they ran in joy.

'Peril, there is peril ahead.'

'But who is speaking?'

'I am, the Troskward.'

'Tusk Worth, I've heard of this name before, where are you hiding dear stranger?'

'I'm hiding in a small pulp of skin that's growing. I am in it, I'm part of it now.'

'I shall help you get down.'

'No.'

Thence he moved, and waited out.

The land was bleak and hills were flat without any roundness on a sky of dust-gray. Weird people approached. Upperhead-growths right around the early loss of hair. They were worthless in some way since their heads devolved into what appeared to be large cones in the back, pushing out of their spines as if they were mechanically inclined. Even some machinery-skin could be seen as it came out of the pink-screen texture of disease and distress. As the whole upper-body which looked as awfully as it were, pushed out of it. Yet their lower legs missing.

One man Eutrin.

'I am Yehthren.'

'And I am not known to you.'

'Shall I be inclined to put a hole into your spine then?'

'Jealous that I look pure?'

‘I feel no jealousy towards any man and as a matter of fact, if I were to hear that again, I think I would.’

Snap and bob his head into a stone as I could not help myself, though the strange man.

Twenty second later, from the giant eye-of the storm formed surmounted structure, there came a moving miniature that bore the head of the man. In whichever form he had become as well, there was no doubt that what he came about was this. A look of dire hatred which had poured into his snake-like eyes. He had stabbed them while being unaware of it.

All too unfashionable by the looks of it, all too worn out, too thorough and would not be touched.

He whom had been worn and chanted, for the word enacted only mild fury and an unfathomable amount of the profane.

Gas methane inhabited the land, and mostly thrown along the way.

‘There, here and there, but here, nearer. Yethren, will you join me then? Will you, for the likes me of allow to set forth, and push amongst all sets of rows and land uncanny and pushed through hardly set down touches?’

For what was worth and what they looked forth, through a rainy day, through which their minds could for the likes of them not allow the slightest form. And shade between the waves they hid, never to look yonder, let alone achieve. First they came to thought. Dwindling away as they could not resist the temptation of the house.

‘We shall enter it then.’

Eutren and Tuskworth followed, yet inclined to be set aside. A towering moving wheeled formation of bleeding whale-like pouches following in the back. Most solidly following along the line of the horizon, trying not to appear ever to forwardly advancing, for what they carried in the back was a giant hardened line that rose, grinded meat that froze and stared, of blackened shapes as coal remained, through which the voices of their masters, ever forwardly bringing the disaster. But they were plainly ignored, the house. It called on them and the three, alas, could not resist wasting time in it for the time being.

Tuskworth only spoke.

‘Fear rises in my throat, I think I’m bound to lose my voice if I stay for too long and spare. Nothing shall stay in my place if I remain, alas, through lime of day and ever-ending. Capricious, and the Capacious-heads, those of large spikes, inside of them that come in flight.’

For he looked above and saw a few flying poles that carried the heads in four and eight shapes, and wheels of laughing strangers without bodies who would not be dead. For the likes of them, this world was largely unsanitary and it could not be believed or touched. Rumps along their bloody missing, throats that were dissected on the ground.

‘I see thine yonder path and call upon it as I will not raise my worth. I look for no reason to set forth but ask of thee yonder.

Abandon what you have on ye and seek a way, sounder.’

No alarm was chaining them down, not to be displeased by either. In either which case, they settled on this, alas, as one should remain in doubt.

‘We’ll each enter the house and share the spoils of blood inside.

For whichever hope might devour and take our kind, we shall suffer none of it and go yonder.’

As, out of the rest of them, for what was worth, Eutren only settled that they would all survive, regardless of their petty worthlessness, none to uncanny, none to be left behind. They would survive no matter what.

Throten spilled a gut, and once they were gone sharing it, they entered the house.

Greeted by a servant who looked out of the trail, he wore a bird in his eye of which protrusion only grew and almost left behind any uncanny resemblance of there being a reason to life. As his mouth opened, though he looked of sill, an organ shaped like a lamp, the light bulb being just a smaller face wreathed out by a long formed bloated serpentine structure, that organ wrapped around his body, making sure he stood still.

Door closing in the back.

The three of them almost set aback wondering what went wrong and why they had been kept waiting in such a manner. All too confusing, of lesser worth, they asked this much and did not set forth.

‘Who is the master of this house.’

‘The house belongs to the house alone. And you’re trespassing.’

‘But there is death outside and it’s expanding.’

‘So be it, as we’ve been alarmed. Of both the advancement and of those who’d come upon our house and stumble, let it be known that there’s little to no reaction your eclipse-apparition hastily emerged.’

The inner lounge had a bar-like stand in the back, a flight of stairs and a long stretch on the right, like that of a tunnel leading to a dead end. Various rooms could be seen, various doors on the ceiling as well. Looking on the left, only one door, yet there were warm colors of red, blue and various other shades which only complimented it in sides. Some shadows were green and a nasty corruption of magentas yet they were there in part.

Weirdly emerging they were there, on the walls, deformedly in part. Strangely, they looked flat, on every possible side. Almost drawn and animated, with just as much as sixty frames, contoured but yet deranged the faces could merely pushed out of the way. Some wore teeth on top their crowns, others were but eyeless but appeared to yield no reaction as well as that.

Breathing in side, they wore lungs on the wall.

Metallic lungs talking.

‘Bears, bears, we need to put them on IV’s and commence the transfusions before they could be pleased with the pain coming from the sky.’

‘Why?’

Tuskworth asked in laughter.

And one of the lungs suddenly emerged, though in part, it bore tiny spots, empty-holes inside of them, all too dreary and expanding. Filthy and never asking, there was filth in their eyes but they knew better than to ask. Dead men were there in the sky.

It was hardened and filth it pushed away, and everywhere. Demolition pieces of skin floating and dreading and never ending.

‘Enough, I am the Willow-tree of skin and would imagine this.’

They were settled on picking every plank aside and putting it past themselves in the other house.

‘Enter one door and stay for the night.

Throten interjected.

‘But there’s a woman in there, bathing.’

‘So?

You’re going to spend the night with her and that’s a fact. It’s settled and you shall be set with her and never ask.’

Laughter came after and they all stared in yonder, like fools or clueless children that did not know how to react. It was an openly non-enclosed room which only had the curtains wrapped around the bath. And they were thinking and ever-pushing and ever wanting to leap in.

Too well-worn, and better pushed aside. It was to be and never called upon.

‘There’s but one bed.’

‘We could.’

‘Shut it, shh, she could hear us at any point. Just silence yourself now. Silence your filthy mouth or I’ll slit your lips.’

What an uncanny sight they were in, nothing looked the same. All of the walls, men-shapes, anatomically set like woodcuts, reminiscent of Gustave Dore’s drawings and assistant’s cuts. Of which bloody marks could not be that or red wax, on-gooking lookers that they were, all three of them were fascinated, most importantly.

‘How come were we not asked to pay?’

‘I do not know, I couldn’t, I don’t know.’

‘Spare me that, spare me as to see what’s.’

‘Wait, how much do you have on you.’

Throten thought out loud.

‘Here’s a few marks from I.’

The others added, a few coins for all that was fair, put inside an envelope he carried inside. Wrapped and pushed underneath the frame, there, he should have it.

Eavesdropping along the way, with a single strike and a bitter-hide being shoved aside, there lay but a machine working on each wall, growing inside like tiny bubbles of blisters that came aside. And there was but a face there, cut, and it only pushed through and grew through. Never-ending in the filth, there were blocks like iron-candles that had melted the sinew of bone-sinew that entered the first side.

‘I am a mad man, I am mad man, I don’t eat the care. I shall eat all apes.

I want to kill everyone in this room, I cannot help it, I need to kill, I need to loathe and kill and put them down. You cannot be made to stand, you need to stand still so I might flay and skin you alive. I want to eat your hearts and sit in your slits.’

‘What is wrong with you, Throten? Do you have a problem?’

The second the outburst came to her ears, the shower stopped, she stopped down and only a dark figure could be seen around, sitting, standing and ever-in place, there was no such thing as the possible shame she felt that moment. It was ever present, there in place, and ever-through.

‘I think you’re onto something here.’

One of them whispered in kindness and in despair; it was just as much he wanted there.

‘You know, I don’t usually fantasize about objects, but, as strange as this might sound, now, as of lately, I’ve started getting these uncontrollable urges, you know?’

Sometimes, I’m kind of bound between this conflict between. Well now that I’ve gotten your full attention, we got the problem of sharing a bed, don’t we?

And frankly, there’s but one.’

After all, that lamp looked like a leg, with a head on top of a man-wrap around the cabinet it was on. Placed upon a taxidermist’s wife, spread like a flat shit they stood on, while the front wall lead to a long stretch of tiny placed bloody-cut figurine people who were constantly blinking. I wish I could cut them open. I wish I could have my way with their genitals with a heat-gun.

They were eunuchs though that could not be seen. It was mainly the anger making it come out, would eat the pus between their nails while burying inside their expanding throat muscles.

‘I think she’s shy.’

There was also something in the coins he placed inside that envelope. There was almost a way one could shove a small knife in and make way for what was to come.

Other room.

He hit and threw and put out but a fire with his head. It trashed about the place, before a few tiny pins came out, it came. After a pace, lost about, too fast going. Ate about by eight teeth, there was it. There was no dire need and none other that might work so. Myrdded tripped as hard as he could, unable to understand what made him shake and how he ended up there, in part. Dressed for the role in what appeared to be a simple suit that melted on his shape. All of the sudden almost begging, throwing a tantrum from where they spawned, but little of it about the place.

A single step on a stone, followed by another, a few more rocks being thrown in his direction, threw about, he lost whatever he had at hand, all the while, barely in place. He was lost along the way, trashing as he lay in search, where was the culprit, so he thought, of something worse. Tripped on a plate and scum, lost about, unable to think at last, he followed the sound.

And thence he entered, Myrdded fainting, but the lair was but wrapped, and looked as if pushed through shroud and ever falling. He was desperate to make something of it, fair. Even growing and pushing away.

Yet the three of them could not stand still. They were too focused on her and stood as if, to question.

‘We should seriously considered pulling her legs off, then sharing her body between the three of us.’

‘I will bring a small butcher’s pin, let’s make her bleed in and out as if her time has come.’

‘Or we could simply.’

Step aside, something benign, death was approaching and it would set them off.

They were but parched

The Negroes are a bunch of baboons standing on one side, split open as they’re held in flight. At their backs, upon vivisection cuts they bear. But flights of blood, where they might serve their little starved children, of whose bellies near full-throttle and wild expansions. For them there’s but little left to be fed upon, as they’ve been touched wrongly and used, spat and made to feel but the worst punishments for being alive, that may be, as one could see. Their treatment was fair, as their kind had earned it.

And while they were kept behind and trapped, they were, conjoined at last, as if due, by remorseless towers painter white. Those they themselves had wrought in mockery, thinking they would stand. Of sand they knew but so much so.

Neither one would be allowed to move. Nor would they be made to prove or, ever so touch one of the platters while inside the chambers, never gotten that piece of rubbery meat, always raw-within disease. It was ever so close to them than they thawed. And looked about ready to retaliate at a single word thrown their way and shown to make them shout, on the side they listened to what seemed to be.

‘Here, I want him here, where I can see him. And him as well.’

‘Both servants, would that suffice?’

‘I think that will do for now. But make sure we’re undisturbed.’

Undeterred from what might be. Little more as if to see, there was nothing else inside them. Not a single boil and nothing wrong, not to be taken from their eyes, as well as swollen in verse. They were incapable of doing much, merely breathing, which alone did bring some attention to what they were doing.

‘I will not wait for you to deny me such please. Open your jaw, split it open if I tell you.’

No blood came out but a most peculiar liquid which formed the bridge between extension, he was bloated, and searched, if some while, for some attention that might yearn him so. To be pushed around and made to rot away, for the meat was poison for them and they would dine. Upon the youth, upon coming home to bind, some of the lambs they stole, as Negroes do on their way, lo’. Down there, they would sit, not to wait. Never aware of what’s happening inside their heads. Always empty down there, almost lepers on command.

More than their legs were ripped, another side of the jaw as well as ears, to be unkindly set. Or better yet, they were of a face unlike them.

Some had used mirrors, shattered but only to use them, as filthy as shades and more than so, cut away, slit what they could in order to set themselves to flight. And no one questioned their actions, as they were of a mind not ask.

‘I think we’re done here. Bury what’s left out.’

‘So be it, master, but tell me of something first.’

‘Speak and I might listen.’

‘What of what happens outside? I have fixed what I could, the liquor is but gone, almost ghastly but the wine is set. Another year at best.’

‘I do not care to listen to the details, I’m searching for something else now.

Can’t you see that I’m disturbed, man?

Outside there’s but a legion, they seek to do me such. And have my guts upon uncanny and have me brought upon a justice, folly. I cannot deal with such a thing. I’m innocent, if you only but for one teeth, there’s more. And there are jitters in my eye which only bear this task of mine.

To bring it to no end; to satisfy what comes after and then.’

‘Speak no more, master, I’ve come to understand that you’re only so. And there’s no changing that may stick to you any longer, not that I would know or last.

My heart’s but blasted by a cast of sorrow, ever melting.’

‘By whose warmth?’

‘You would not understand?’

‘Then explain it to me so.’

‘It is that which you hate ever so much, that you’d put down, or slay with rocks or settle down with pushing her into a wall.’

‘If that’s the case, leave the room and get away, for I shall settle with no kind of leeway that I may look into.’

Outside, the Negroes were playing around like baboons. They looked like such as well. Most of them still wore their small-tinted heads, as helmets, since their tiny brains were bread for rattle. Upon which they shone and tried making as much off their backs for morn. Shouldn’t come for them.

Through the night, they would behave, but sometimes they were brought down. As they were not decayed but of something filthier even they bequeathed be taken down. Some brought ropes of skin and brought them down, then pinned around large horse-crowds. All conjoined and walking together as a line or a living malignant stable made out of joints, stretched and many heads which pushed out and away until they had become what looked like unnatural gazing dead-breathers, even after being ripped apart. They would be allowed a few seconds of joy before being put down.

What a marvelous world this was, for every piece of the sky was one never to be torn apart. No moon but everything so livid. Like a field of nets, or better yet, webs or bile, all organic, but never touched before dissipating in the air. That encompassed everything that could be reached and everything, along the way. Was dead, in there, caught in webs, heads being wrought and thrown around, the dead would march and ask for this. They wanted some piece, cut through and lost, beneath.

A transport was being carried through, light was to be fallen out of a window. Many buildings became to float, being held by organic glows, light that would appear and disappear, making the bloc go up and down. Then down recede, appearing in the air, then back in. Out with it, to bring back, to the original point, then flaunted back. To where it went, as well, to where it counted forth, they ate them.

Little strangers being around, dangerous as they were unable to breathe out loud, they but started chiming in, uncanny, there was something righteous about them, along the crannies, where it had to happen. Always desperate, but never gotten rid of.

There were wind-traps of meat-formations, connecting them like bridges but hard to be looked at, wrapped. Peculiarly shaped at each end like hooks, but settled back as the uncanny world shook upon being stepped on. Wild vivid images flowing in the eye, always, the benign sight, upon them they would stand and shout, worsening as time drew on. Below them, between each plain coiled around segment, pushed.

There was a period of termination.

Always glowing around; a pole was wreathing out, though weeding, always of a mind of itself. Colors went mad, always of the same pigmentation which had come around to claim what was theirs, always of the mind to destroy everything, then reappear. There was but a strange pantheon out there to see.

It was where they wept, and waited for days, instead, never being able to meet their very ends meet. Bubbling in tiresome, and they wept. Moved out of the way, unable to direct what was left of their hatred in bed. Where they woke up, but yolk in eye, not to subside of long, of long. They but neared a sacred end, where the grave has spat but a tiny seed that gave birth to a large man, of dirt which birthed the world. He was made of it, and spread. As there was always dirt, but is was made in speck, beyond the world. Where it settled, upon a blameful thing they but worth. Stoned were gathered, past the brim and would to be, and would to be.

Age brackets of people who had to be killed, they were but a severe cut around the vase, he was a man that was but wrought around two hands and would to be made in waste. Put through the silence, and would to be cruel. Temperature were low, fire was like snow, falling with the ashes and the charred, and put together, men were not around.

Odd nigger

Niggers are odd; they are particularly odd. Especially when seen from the distance. I could never put my finger on what's it that made them so odd. You just knew these sort of things. This nigger in particular was worse, perhaps the worst nigger that was ever of this world. But he was not different than other niggers that walked around, freely, niggardly. Like they do. In any case, he swung from rod to rod and spat around. He was dirty, unwashed and dark, like a little animals held by a red leash, coming from a barn he killed his masters at. He wore a trail around his body and he was a beast. A nasty thing that loomed round and waited for food and something to break within his little monkey paws. Always of a mind he were to destroy everything, his house, his block, his corner and himself, or others. Most importantly he hated the color, ever so niggardly, the black. He loathed it, that was clear, out of his desire to twist and rip, he seethed as he leaped behind. Him but a frog leaping, him but fat; the nigger did not know himself. Since mirrors broke and he could just as well just see.

‘There’s a nigger behind me.’

He thought. But turned around he saw now; he was there, again, he looked at the mirror, it was him but he could not compare. His little brain could not make the difference and niggers were just out of it, as well. They hanged in little trenches they had formed of cars. And lived in tents or in cardboard boxes, with the broken mirror of a head-light; eating from cans or from the garbage, killing when they could. Cannibals they should be called, as they ate what they ought not to. There was another odd nigger who came about him.

‘Hello there, may I join you during the meal?’

‘Shut up and leave you dumb nigger.’

He answered, bloodshot eyes. Their species was peculiar and they wore their arms behind. Peculiarly placed, weird styles of hair which had been caught, wrapped around in head-scalps, sometimes embed in, and would wear names, as well as cut. They but lived in piss and drunk from the crude gardens once the springs were just shot down. They hoarded weapons such as firearms and left-over pieces from some war but never properly used them since they were not of a mind to do so.

Odd nigger, odd nigger, one of the lighter ones called. Most importantly they hated the darks and only saw them fit to rule over, the filaments of the blacks.

‘Odd nigger, odd nigger, will you come to me now?’

And the sad dark creature obeyed, walking in a most prolapsed way. Its arms were as hard as trunks but its head had only gotten smaller as to crush what was between them, at that. It bore little more than a few teeth left, its gums were pushed inside the jaw, constantly clenched. A beast that carried a green sack, and wore about its throat a lump; as if infected by some strange thing. One that would make the creature stop and wriggle within two steps. Near one of the stairs, as if caught in a seizure wanting. Its eyes were ever-so clear globes, always mingling with the little lice-puddles that were on the floor, they fell from them; nigger-cattle being used for bore. Into the nearest wall, one smashed it with its mere fists, their strength was but known to none. And for that reason animals were feared, of the danger that would dreary their unaccountable for sight, as fear could not be inclined. Yet they would be put in line, every now and then, truck passing. Little lights shot and masses pounding, bullet flights. And then the odd nigger stopped. It got up and looked inside the pocket. There was but a bunch of rue-clocks he stole and some dirt, he watered.

‘Odd nigger, will you come?’

But the beast was known to naught, it obeyed. Once the truck was over, its eyes but flung away to the mullato, whom called upon the chimp, he’d gotten him where he wanted yore, and wanted to be done, just in a moment.

‘There, your face is fixed.’

He but put a little cradle’s stamp on top his face, the fist. He was marked like a dog. A sterile one, that much was known. So much mass could only go in one direction, it was fading. And he was deemed unable to control himself, always nesting.

First abandoned house he returned. It was a shack, a wooden stove, the floor was broken and the stairs to the upper level were there no more. Odd-nigger but walked and waned; hairy as a little dame, as dusk had settled he but made it round and round and would find something on the side to do while setting down. There was but a little pair of drum-heads, shrunken from Damascus, taken for him, he had been there, in a dream. Praying and wondering when will he come, the star within, the Negro-sayer, darkened of lips and but a bodiless whim to enter his prunes and be blessed as he would but pray to them and grow a child so he might abandoned him before the day had come. When he’d find out, he was not alone, the house was gone.

Thrown around, for ever did he call. He could not help it, he didn’t understand why the skin was such a sprawl, on every carpet it were. On every match a street, and where he looked he found it.

It was but falling off, what peculiar sight. He was but met but a little tiny dark barometer which was left on the middle of the street, the other baboons were out. All sleeping during noon, during morning, after the mid-day and afterwards, he'd swoon; he was the only one awake during the hour, so why not take advantage of this strange flour-compounder, little thumper, yet the act. A little tongue going in both directions after that; the odd nigger thought. What if I us take this for myself?

He was drooling, his lip was tight, it seemed likely that the lower part of his body seemed, somewhat lacking, as if his muscles were but thinned out by the lack of run, an oddity for a nigger to be sure.

It was a timer his mind could barely take on.

He looked down, where he had missed it, between two pieces appeared a child. It appeared like the Sayers had granted him one.

And with a snatch, he came about and broke into a new house all together. Since the dens were all abandoned there and most of the chicken were but in herds anywhere, he took but one and ate it alive, salivating with a little shroud around his neck, about four minutes in, feeding. His little child, missing, but where had he went?

Before he could look for it, again.

'Odd nigger, odd nigger, listen to me so, I need you to satiate me a plow, there's work to be done everywhere around, I wager.'

There was little more to be wagered, he barely had his clothes on. And by the time he had returned, a few days had been gone; another child abandoned, ended. Where he found him, there, mended while made peace, he had but found a gun and got his head in.

But as strange as the scene had been, and with the corpse in the bed rested within the grapes that grew on top of it, there was no wonder.

Odd-nigger shoved a finger up its ass, for no reason, only to check the pulse, it was dead, gone.

He left the room in shame and never looked back.

But wore the child as an apron, hiding the firearm; within a grasp the wonder of the making, he had cultivated what appeared to be a bunch of ovaries hidden in the making. A strange stomach, to be certain, had the Sayers blessed him with. It was uncertain whether or not they had intended it to begin with, yet he grasped what he could and walked. Tasted what he wanted, his mouth but dripped after that. A new buildings, wreathed about, as an inverted hive-like standing-still kebab roll, a tribal place colored in him and watched about the giant eyes that stumbled on him, from every sight. Dreadful walls all enlarged, they seemed to him never ending as they were drawn to the top of the structure as if it were a carrot's roof, rotted about. A melancholic sight, the dirt, there was no road leading to it, unnerved, once it found out, spikes emerging. An architecture of sand, as if made from a pilgrimage the odd nigger knew nothing about. Teeth-lamps were but given through, a door opened and there came but a butchered nigger without limbs but large fire-poker like things for legs. Two metal-thinned gothic-like eyes appeared to have replaced the sockets. And just from the way it presented itself there was no lower half of the body, only the torso which had been carved in.

By whichever means it came, the creature gutted itself in the halls which had been gray. Every wall had a mean of torture, every sharp angle and sharp pin could inflict so much pain within such a short period of time. One could bleed himself therein, and never seek another one's kind.

As was said, the odd creature had but welcomed him with clicks. Not only had it not had lips but teeth were replaced by peculiar ligaments which drew up and down like clockwork machinery that stopped after a while so it could puke the bile through. Little bubbles, he remembered.

The Odd-nigger but checked the barometer again, then check the child's pulse. It seemed alive, he followed then. Into the house, first sight. It was something that came about him, at a most peculiar time.

They had entered a town of woe. In the distance, there were cracked pieces that should not be fathomed as to be inside a home. Every portrait of some fancier looking freed slaved, nothing like the kind they were. Although they were lost, ripped to shreds, even the remnants of their past could not be said. Those that don't get cherished get destroyed. It was what they were like, therefore not to be judged by means of more. There was more in the house before the passage lead to it. But everything was caught in the mundane, caught again, pushed out and, looking back, strange.

Violent, way beyond even the likes of brutalism; it was no architectural home, nor was it completely abstract, chaotic, in some manner, sharpened. Ivory as in steel, long eel-shaped at the base horns which all of the sudden curved, distinctly thorn apart as to protrude, while being surrounded by various other twists that had entered their zone, where lay more than a few sharp things, and whips and little stings, a blunt rider and even a fragmented sight of a wall being climbed over but a rushing car, or something about the shape, all made of a piece, didn't make sense at all, guarding other gates and doors, but neither of them were approached.

If there was but one thing there, an exception, he would've looked away, but even he could not draw his gaze completely, for a lamp just lighted a single room which seemed to be in the way. Mundane, as to bring that feeling that it wasn't completely abandoned, something of the floor, a bathroom. And little pins and blood had stopped him.

From his tracks he but joined back.

Look at him go, a nigger fancies himself a runner.

He doesn't have much and likes rubbing it in.

The little strength he has, but charging, trying to seem around each ill, the ailment, that's the only thing the nigger knows. He's but a little dark creature trying to make it on the middle of the track where everyone else but walks in two rows. He cannot fathom joining in, always for himself when convenient, then blames both in.

The odd nigger, but had joined. The one that limped with only one leg left; stranded on a heavy chair, on a stand upon broken chairs. No curtains but out in the open. House of straws, most of them courted; but this was nowhere near where lived the blacks. They but stood in uncanny valleys and in slumps. They could but be fed the fiddles of little dead-nigger beds, when they came up with their dark songs. And they were vile and made to be, most disturbingly disgusting, left for all to see that the niggers are incapable of bettering themselves out there. Without the means of others helping them, in slums, most decayed after that, in this weird little shroud of theirs.

It was peculiar how they set in flight. Wings were not grown but made out of their leg-skin, which was put on their heads, then twisted around. It was just their likes and how they kept do with their tribe. As humbly primitive as they were, with what little was left, they made do what they could, about the day. Some had settled tying themselves to waste away since they could never climbs. Water had touched the dirt walls, taking their hands away, climbing was but a man's hay with their tiny fingers but lump-needles, always lost before they touched something solid.

'Bound to throw them some to eat, eventually; say what you have come here for and I shall listen.'

But the odd nigger couldn't think of anything, not even the slightest hint, not even the darnest, most unnatural word a blinder to put in doubt.

Before he knew it he was yet again surrounded, and put through as if to be caged. Then again, that's where he would stay for the rest of his life. Chieftain had but looked for a proper kind he may throw out his sight, again.

It was plain to see that there was something going around between the two of them. Not to call it out. Moaning, he had checked the child's pulse again only to find himself wondering how he stumbled onto it. And from the hole he had emerged he was met, not by one, not by two but eight other odd niggers that followed through. Largely in doubt of what to do or what had fashioned they way through. And with but little though they merged with the ground, standing like infants themselves, confused; as if the one odd nigger who drew them was some matron creature bearing a child that was supposed to be theirs. Of plain thought he merely took the chieftain out by a single lance of an eye, through which he called on them to quickly join him in order to have him brought down from his heavy chair, rolled on the back then pushed to the slums where he had been taken and eaten right away.

Then turned, they had but marched back and would claim this city of their own for a while, as he was but claim, a new chieftain on his way, to call upon them. Rolled by no means, uncanny, he had but little understanding as to what happened.

Though they fashioned for him out of their weary dead they had gotten along the way, though little they could know of him, but a green dress with red flowers they made him wear. And thick red lips, a balm for them out of their own blood as most of the odd niggers would adhere to a hardening ritual of harming themselves through force and through punch. Only to have his lips reddened for a moment as well, standing as he lead the way, the odd one had become the minstrel show.

No song would he bear and no instrument to take him to a place that might claim away the little mind left of his, to touch. He spared but a second, at last on the streets where he was brought in front of the mullatoo, revering in the like, as he had but taken his parcel out and put him through a dandelion field of tilted swings where he had ended up abandoned. Longed for, they had destroyed whatever they had lain their hands on, as their matron commanded, only to have been brought to have once they had awakened past noon, as well. In the likes of daylight revealed. There would be a little more than no appeal to make him look that way. But long disgraced and gawked upon as one of the plain chicken they would eat, he had but little more left to his feet, than to run ahead a heard, the cry following after. With the other odd niggers soon to heave yonder; once the crossing was met, a bridge of little dead dents was placed upon the wreckage, eight fallen homes and four buildings of their own, the cars and the strange men whom had died before them, and many other sticks and stiff sickly that were put there had lead them forth. They were known to be odd and were shunned off wherever they went, as they established.

But their own little country, within one of the tiny states; and their hands were filled with their lumps as they had spread it, again and again between one another until it could not be helped. Some left behind but the oddity had them not become corpses but growing plant-like structures that would harden as they were to grow.

While seeing this the one Odd-nigger thought so. As he considered just as much, the one house they had entered and watched on top of had become one of them, at last. He'd know that inside each of the odd ones there would be a chieftain that would throw them to slums, destined to enslave those beneath him and make them watch. Although it was strange walking on night where the many shadows of men followed, with their long-standing rifles resting on their hollow shoulder, while their heavily breathing dogs whose muffles were on either side of the plains their rose out of were merely just prepared, like a night of eight December, when their dear old grandfathers whom they all shared were but absent. There, they missed it when they were just there. It happened all too sudden, but the men were still out in plains, still fashioning their shafts to be.

It was unnecessary to believe that, there was a chance, at any time for them to be safe, especially since they were as many and would have to wreathe on the run. It was sickening not seeing where they were going, having no direction, but a nigger would have none. In either case, this was widely accepted, at the river Moore, of which they had but fashioned a boat out of one of their own. Though incapable of making through without one, they could not hope to set him so, in doubt. He but fell away, sunk upon the first steps and drowned. Another one passed on top, yet they had realized that the river never ended. There was no shore and nothing in the distance any more. And whatever might've appeared once was but an illusion, as the moon en trance, the dogs wallowed in the night.

They were but of a kind to test their prowess and would but do what they could do best. As time drew near they but chimped' around and would to be. Making but a blotting eel-spread, out of their blood instead, as not even the likes of the water would deal with their life essence in any shape or way. On it they rose and finally froze, by stumble or by simple walk, they went ahead and but lived in the midst of an endless stretch where the odd one was but the king of lance.

For he had fasted and one of his bones, from inside his ribs, the bloated lower belly now thrown; had thrown itself forwardly, always pushing but another off one below. Seeing them drown one by one until he had killed them all.

And the dogs and their masters and whoever was there watched. As much of an undignified sight there was; this odd-nigger had but little to nowhere else to go. He simply stood there and would not get of no place, no matter how hardened was his head, therefore.

They let his due, were it to follow through, the nigger would drown, otherwise, let him stay there and never come out alive.

That was the judgment passed onto the Odd-nigger and he's been standing there ever since.

‘Oogassa, Ogassa.’

Cried the nigger with the likes, they had fathered themselves in such time. When the forests fell and to rise, there was but little to nothing they would not hear; there was something to die in sight of them.

‘Young Odd nigger, you have been fathered but abandoned.

Now you are to be raised, in the distance where the land is strange. You are to meet the plains and have your mouth gape and lay as you may.

In a place you’re free to destroy, to abuse the breeders as your obtuse kind does when asked for and take all which there is, as only then you’ll be at peace.’

And the peculiar creature hadn’t even understood no word, it was too struck by what had brought, inside its neck but froze, a single bullet from its father. In reality, it had gone by. The little odd-one had escape as much as he had pleased, while the father but claimed a fake one. Out of the pile standing near the bed; this one was only to a blush with pus, white cheeks about of flour on a table. Slowly to be cut like a little tiny fable unwrapped about the thing.

‘I shall eat you if I please and you will not stop me, little fiend I’d so plainly enjoy using.’

For that is how all worked. The crooked thing, with a crooked nose, wearing black clothes but liked abusing the little wrinkle around the throttle; and push the little thing after in a little jar, to be stored and delivered far. As to be trafficked.

There, he made it, long distorted, as the while had gone through and would to be broken, cracked, and put like a message as it made the pass, until one day, the little dark thing was found.

One grows weary of worn out toys

Someone cannot control himself where he is placed upon and where he freezes cold. There’s a reason to be there, under the watch of man, and under him one should be aware that there’s no reason to accept defeat at the feet of men who know nothing about it.

Abandoned base

Dark operations were still being forced. Upon the base, eighteen squares by eighteen, so on and so forth over a space of billions of miles, at the very least, judged by the eye, most likely, having been taken as it were, by whichever tainted metric other than it, the base was night.

It was held upon a fall into nothing by bands which had come from the sky, which were constantly rotating the entire structure as if there was no chance and no way they could see the other one. An exact copy of the military base floating in the sky, rotated vertically, but by whatever means there were people inside.

One of the rooms was stricken in and was locked, military rifles, ammunition, hand guns, various other armaments, MP165's, MS85's, BGJ-23's, AA6s2's among other various high velocity, quantum-destruction long range assault rifles pinned with ultra sub-machine long-range distress-signalers, scope-pins which shot nuclear-fire tainted little pin-globes of ultra-bobbling grenade-cluster large formation of skin-dissolving out-of-thin-air forming slugs. Stunt-guns and little knives that entered skin; Mc' Hooligan was there in charge of shining them like fancy boots, he was. It was the only thing he'd done all day, every day ever since he came here.

He wore leopard pants, a nice green-petty shirt with a yellow graffiti face emblazoned on top of it, with a cross marked over, and a dark-skinned frown which burnt it by a lighter's fire, until his skin was left bare open like that of a Negro's. It was the initiation ritual shared between the cadets. It left quite a beauty mark on his fair skin he swore to carve it inside the skulls when the time came for him to return their favor.

A kindness, that couldn't be called. Hooligan was called in to file a report. It was a glass room, anti-bullet, high-class, not spoke out, not to yell, not to shout or make a fuss of it, but they did put a lot of pressure on disinfecting everyone that entered, with a lot of nerve gas, as it might be added. It was enough, just enough to make a man extremely uncomfortable.

Note from the Don, the Construction worker who had been filled in at Two-AM, before his heads entered through the basins and they were put inside the reeling metal bed which was his back. He was part plant, and looked deformed, green-whitish sick pus spread mold across his skin mounts, and black horns that wriggled came out of each and every single one of them. They were somewhat normal, they helped, each of them being equipped with spanners, which had been used for the tiniest of tools he had taken to his employ. He was deranged, at tall and wide as four orangutans which trashed the place, that's the first entry that he was allowed to face. Tall cockpit-elevator which was driven through a truck; pushed through the wall and shot across the base inside one of the most peculiar cocked, curved, ramped long tunnels which were flat on top-bottom, right and left yet were tiled between the four spots between them, as to be slightly raised or depressed further in the wall, as to make the transition of a few centimeters entering the metal-skeletal frame that lay between the tunnel and the base itself, where all the construction materials had been placed.

This was not a normal military base, and as a matter of fact, the so-called earth they were put in was a simulated thing, an illusion, since it had been long-since destroyed. Yet it was not a normal illusion but a false soil that was made out of some large extending reusable foam they had set to their employ. Out of which they formed a false foam-air which imitated air and granted, it somehow managed to, as peculiar as it was, act in the same manner as oxygen, which was needed for their survival, by the means of which, a man could shove his nose and mouth into the soil and still manage to breathe, as the malleability of the foam allowed him to continue living even if it were ingested by his lungs.

But the base itself was but called, in question, to be certain, the 'Luxury Humanical Paradise of Lint.'

Men were constantly trained to deal with the experiments they were put in, by the great Federation of. They were dead. All of them, no human survived past this place, not even the foam. And slowly it was disintegrating. This was their last hope to somehow make it, whatever that meant.

From Don's notes.

'I am dead, I the dead man.'

He was a king, there, surrounded by men without brows, those were taken away from them and it was too dangerous for him to look out of the way, the lights could still blind him. He spoke through them, digging holes with a little pan, eating their guts then spitting large couloirs through which he walked, as if he had created small shortcuts through rooms by spitting the very essence of compressed space.

Then he entered a hole, at the end of which there was a power-bottle which was the generator which kept powering the deformed people whose wings had become large rifles with which they started shooting at one another during their never ending wars. They were caught inside various floors which had been completely sealed off as to avoid any kind of damage the base might contain during the initial phase of destruction which came soon after. And many felt death as soon as they saw him, since he was made out of a piece unlike any other. His eyes were pushed out, he shot out of them and killed a flying mutant right where he stood. He spoke a tongue and spat it on its face. The mutant, blinded, flew around without grace, unable to see where he was heading towards.

'We're reaching the base, he'll be here in an hour, won't he?'

'Yes, it should be fine as well as you don't take a wrong turn.'

Looked at the fingers, all were brim, dead-eyed white, fashioned, wrought in, pointed out, they were escalating the issue. A stream of gasoline dragged from along the street, it pushed out, then was followed by a trail of smoke, dampened through. In it there was but a group of high-masked solitary standing groups.

Their car stopped, both of them got out of it, and waited, at a distance, checking. As soon as they could look in whichever direction, they realized what they were preparing to do.

'They're going to blow it off.'

'That, I wage is already done.'

His fellow said, he was put into the extreme-zone, his blood was on the soil, he was breathing out of a pair of tubes he had picked up along the way, talking to himself, and a snake-dragon shaped pair of floating boxes that dragged his sight away. He was drawn to these ancient looking coral-colored Chinese imitations which bore his insides, stolen from him on his way out. As soon as they were both out of the way, the car was finally shut-dead, blown out of the way before it could hit it again.

They were finally entered, past the bands, fallen through and leaped inside the hole, where they had gotten into it. By the road and beyond it, and on the hill, then finally they had landed, broken legs within, then, cured. The imitations but poured out of them little limbs that grew on top of theirs.

Hank had but walked on attachments of many little child legs attached to his knees, whatever lain below them barely moving. While Poad but followed through as soon, it couldn't be thought as soon, as soon.

They were driving hard bargains between one another in a barely semi-automatic shaped room. Multiple doctors on one side, the other, scientists, a few armed guards at every corner, strange device in the room, multiple devices, anonymity-suppressors thumping everywhere. They made their faces appear through their masks and hazmat suits, and even the cut-out beanies some were wearing. Peculiar things, he thought of the nastiest thing that could come to mind, unfortunately, there was no woman in either group for him to test his supposition. Regardless of it, he had pointed out, man with head-machine, still going, sawed off from time to time, he was rowing through a sea-mirage, trying to understand the world through twenty men who had died in a file.

'The test is inconclusive, we need to extract some more.'

'But you don't understand how dangerous it is for us to go on with it, man, we could die along the belt and the curve. If we put another one through, the stress might rip him and put him through such forced that would completely destabilize the entire quantum-electro molecules that have solidified the hardened base we live in.'

'I think you're not telling me everything and I need to find it out by myself.'

'You're playing a dangerous game Commander, a dangerous game I'm telling you, one I may not be able to abide for long.'

'Then how about we settle this here and now then?'

He pointed the shaft of his revolver right beneath his clenched chin.

Every armed man in the room suddenly turned towards him as they looked at the buffoon. What was he thinking now, attempting such a dangerous maneuver?

He could blow this entire thing out of proportions.

'They call me Tea-honey Flower-pillow. And I'm not going to allow you to get through this place in one piece.'

Tihony Flopillo but knew the conundrum he was in and who was watching.

He had considered as much, entering the main device and becoming it before his time was up, where the most incontestable of the reeling things entered him. His skin ran deep into his own receding handle.

'I will shoot that globe and you know what will happen.'

'You would kill us all just to make a point now?'

'I want to be given a chance to live, to truly live and I cannot unless I enter it.'

'But the mortuary-boxes hadn't been tested yet, you could die out of mere pressure, what's so hard to understand now?'

‘Well.’

Twenty billion years ago. There was still an Earth, somewhere.

The base was still standing.

Back then it was a great building made out of multiple boxes with a pyramid on top, without a tip but a spearing skin-sheet with eighteen balloon-boil growths on every side at the end of it.

‘Take it back.’

‘What?’

‘I told you, when you will return to my line of work, I will have implanted an ID in your head and you will be able to check out whenever you want to.’

‘Why should I care?’

‘I don’t care either.’

‘Then let’s go.’

Back to it.

‘What does the mortuary thing do?’

‘It eats the top-half of your head.’

‘And afterwards?’

‘It’s supposed to save you from this decaying reality.’

‘How do I make it work then?’

‘You need to put your head into it, like an ostrich, then the top-part of your head will disappear while your lower half of the body will die away.’

‘Seems plausible enough.’

‘Listen Tea-Honey, if this works, only the top-side of your head will appear on the other side.’

Worn-out and battered boxes, I know what is. They’re lying about things. I could be on the other side before I know it and be put through. Hard material, fuss or prelate, made off, put through. Always looked after, trying to make it past the time; put on, wrought about the hour. Too hard, too dense, can’t breathe, I’m being put through it. They’re all surrounding me as if they’re my brothers and sister from my fart removed Persian-ancestor which is looking over me. I know what I must do.

He threw the trails away, they were no longer doing those things there. They were bull-eared, bull-nosed, rings now. Worn, the experiment was a failure, always put on a freighter.

Woken upon inside a helmet pilot.

The side guns appeared to be constantly be put to shred.

He had lived many lives ever since, such as his:

Leper-mirror man with two knots inside each head, the plaster-master with twenty guns across his chest pushing out large erection beds out of his arms came near the Strong-head lousy Disaster cretin with twenty fucking loaded guns. He stood there waiting for a reason to pop off, then pulled out a quickie on him, blowing his body of quickly with eighteen million rounds that bunched around the room, destroyed everything, entered the other room, took down the whole complex, half of the city, then the giant tray upon which the rocket-codes were being kept in, where they shot in every possible direction, little soldier men-body limbs being thrown into guttural forms that came soon after, being split in bloody halves which formed flying blood-fountains that painted every fucking debris building into a pucker of red, flying rockets burning them further as the very sky became but a blur of so much smoke that it looked like the end of the god damn world came along, forming a nuclear cluster of bombs that fell everywhere around the city, killing every man in sight, while every woman had been impregnated by a bullet, all of the sudden hitting a premature birth. All of the children being exploding stillborns that started popping and leaping around every possible spot where they could be thrown in, completely shattering every facet of every possible stretch, ripping their own metal heads as they started for the nearest towns that lay on the north side, across a great canyon that was pushed through, entirely through one of the mountains, having destroyed the nearest city, as it left a black trail of complete obliteration, killing every creature inside the bowels of the earth until there wasn't even a beetle moving in any possible direction. If there had been a god, he also died along the way as the complete exploding shot of nuclear fireworks acted like a giant tampon of TNT's that entered a woman so deeply that Gaia herself must've felt it.

Disaster cretin then, seeing how he was the only who survive this short-lived apocalypse that had destroyed half of the planet, completely annihilating just about any remains of a civilization in sight, killed each man, each woman and child, and animal, being left just about alone with no possible chance to rebuilt anything as every major, possibly reusable material had been completely turned to ashes. The acid rains that followed soon after, left by the radiation patches that could be seen in the outer layers of the world made it so he could see the giant Saturn-sized meteorites, which were headed straight to him, as in, they completely followed his every possible move as if it was done on purpose, the cancer having already reached a terminal state as it was only being accelerated. There were no bullets in the ground that he could somehow swallow hoping he would choke, his arms were too weak for him to be able to snap his neck, he couldn't use his own force either to do it, which only left him with the option of waiting for his life to end. To top it all, his clothes had been ripped off, though there was no one in sight to see him in the worst possible manner, at his lowest while making him feel shame, though it was still extremely cold as he was made to feel uncomfortable as he waited for his death to come; yet that took its very god damn time which only further added to his complete annoyance from which he could not wake up from. This was a nightmare that would not end. His childhood was mundane, he couldn't even complain of being abuse or that he lived through any kind of worth-while life changing experience which left him with a bitter-sweet taste, knowing that this was just about the only worthwhile thing he's ever gotten to experience in his poignant life. Luckily for him, death eventually followed. The meteorites came, they entered through the ground, destroyed the planet, blew off the Moon, went right through. In a celestial joke, even the rocks started crashing into one another, destroying their very rocky entrails, crushing as many microscopic-space-bears as possible before the galaxy exploded.

In one of the large buildings, one of the top floors; where there was close to nothing going-on.

The half-face attached itself to another peculiar creature that was but filled like a barrel, bore no legs, but large frames that moved along, being constantly pushed out of its stove-burnt remnant-corpse shaped metallic shell behind it. Which was carried along on a squared-rack that carried him inside a production line, inside the factory where similar beings, akin to him were being built; all of which had these giant shells to which they were attached constantly being wrought in and out as they were being defiled in the worst possible way. Many hooked-like wrapped around-appliances being put everywhere around them, forming weird twists that seemed to have completely eaten through the peculiar shells, until they appeared to be looking less thorough, not forged any longer, completely shattered. Wildly moving everywhere around, leaping about the place like little dead children, whom were put to watch; all of their sockets being completely exposed, their eyes backwardly set in their rotten carcasses, as they could not breathe in and out, trying to breathe awkwardly as they leaped from one side to the other.

Large orgies had taken place on every side of the wall, and their marks were seen. They planted little bolts inside the children, thinking they would survive.

The large machine which was working these shelled behemoth creatures of whose pirate-like peg legs of hard meat bore no opposable thumbs seemed to have a peculiar back skin growth deformation of meat that looked like the shell had a hole on the other solid end where a giant started drawing the meat it his mouth if the meat was actually a liquid, thinning as it drew back but never completely filling in the gap. The front of the creature being thicker while the back of it being too girthy there. While being drawn inside, the softness would be revealed as to point out that the creatures were extremely malleable as well as the fast that the corpse-wrapped shells were actually much wider than the creatures themselves. As soon as a good view of them came into light they revealed as much, a thick head that bore no neck yet appeared to be shaped like a box-filled stretched torso. There was filth inside of it as many peculiar eye-forms appeared to extend forward as they shot out of the main box-fill like tiny zigzag strings that appeared to spray some peculiarly tainted polled all around the room. Which soon turned out to be for a reason; since they were worked for this thing. They had to constantly spread their peculiar seeds as to make it so every part of every hole and every growth as fed upon; so they might be able to survive for as long as possible.

Yet one thing rang much truer than anything else.

It was the filth of the matter, it was exactly a man, a single man who knew much better, he knew so much better, and all were wrong, and much compared to him, they were strong.

Despite his scribbles on the wall he had never failed to realize it all.

‘They are weak and we are strong, how could you have failed now?’

How did you fail to realize that we cannot be stopped?

We know much better than they do.

We have the perfect defense master, with it, we are immortal, we are unstoppable, we cannot be destroyed. Our essence shall survive by whatever means there are.

Our vileness, our evil, it shall be dragged along, it will not decay; like our memory will. Know that with it, we shall forget whichever one contender might come upon us to strike us down. Let them shriek as they please, to your temporary annoyance for we cannot be killed now.'

'Let it reek for a few days at the very least, you'll forget about them soon enough.'

'Hours at best, let us forget their condescension for now.'

As soon as we pull the plugs from our heads, we shall be made to forget at last.

And then.'

'Rejoice, we shall but come back to whence we were at.'

He was a man that had been abandoned, by every man that's ever served as a figure in his life, that's what he had become after, that's where he would lay at.

They had almost cut it in. From the distance one could see each pint across the door but made, they could see what happened there, as well. Touched and malign from the looks of which no one could've seen it happen.

Dark part of town was but a giant growth, a crystal made of leech-puckers, shapes like buckets, torn and sworn, put together, bolted by tape-worms, spread about each side of town, open on the inside.

Who might even need a knot?

'I think it's time we show each other out, isn't it?'

'We've been through this before, haven't we?'

You're afraid of something, maybe. I don't know what to say, but you're always making it seem as such, you're always trying to hide something from me when I'm not around.'

'That's kind of a bold statement.'

'I know, if only you'd made it clear we wouldn't be here in the first place.'

'I don't understand what's gotten into you.'

'I can't either, but I've gotten used to it. Do you still follow?'

'What?'

'The trails, you need to follow around them, otherwise they will all go.'

'Fucking hell.'

He leaped out of the road, one of the cars drove right through. They left before their time even came. It was strange, their insides being thrown outside and walking in pairs.

Both of them were just as soon killed as they ought to have been. Always there in part, their guts became a twist of winds that were brought around, then allowed to draw within the hour, to have been put through utmost distraught shower, of the most uncanny limbs there formed, a peculiar tunnel wrought there on. It formed but the outskirts, the dark city which emerged being but the first corner step where rose.

From the depths of which malignantly froze. A peculiar uprooted, mostly girth-wrapped being.

There was no use in hiding, since he had already exposed his guts. If there was ever a single chance he could split himself open, it had been twenty minutes before the first shots were heard. For what came after was but the sound of a most obtuse distressed wail, the call of hunger having prevailed onto the likes of the rotting carcass that was man. He appeared out of nowhere, the strange showed up with a giant limb that was two times the size of his arm, attached to his main arm, by little metal bars, before he opened his mouth, jaw coming down straight-open, pushed through, split-between the rows, brows inside his skull, having walked for the last good half an hour eighteen hundred miles past the Aragean Lane, pushing through two rows and twenty heaps of flying corpses which had entered it not thrown their dead people inside his track, only to have come onto the other side with no more than eighteen dead thrown around little needle-pointed, half chewed people, of which corpses dated, back to, at the very least first or second century BC. As peculiar as it were, before waking up from this peculiar set of vision which completely defecated his mind, he could not wake up from that lucid nightmare which had completely engrossed his mind, or taken over, for the last few hours as the man kept re-experiencing the visions over and over again as if it were a broken record or some loop he had been forced to live through while being incapable of putting it to a stop. It was the pale brownish sky that set his mind at ease, the strange atmosphere, the peculiar flies which were not flies but pints of black things, dark objects that acted like them. Constantly buzzing in his head as he could not help himself but look again, then look away, then look away, in the same motions, while having taken himself back to the hour he drove through the pile in the first place. He was joined with the vehicle he was in. Part of his spine having contorted in his seat managed to put the rest of his organs through, as they rested, in warmth, in a peculiar stasis, until they were cold, they had been cold for the last good hour. Not to forget himself, the man checked the wheel. They were not there. His car had been but a raft, by which he reached a shore upon the night he was found or stumbled upon by the rangers. From their alleged sights, he was stranded on a metal raft, surrounded by the most uncanny fliers they themselves could not believe were there. This hallucinatory ecstasy was not only short-live but its deadliness had become way too apparent for all of them, who'd woken up from the haze they were set in as soon as they heard the signs.

It was peculiar, what his sight did to him but this was also something he could not control, regardless of how hard he tried himself, starving it off. Trying to put an end to it, to remove its every possible influence until it would've receded in the darkest corner it could be driven to when the time come, to which he flandered but an eye before it started again. There was something extremely reasonless he could not take away from.

For some reason they were always there, especially when they weren't wanted or especially called for. Always appearing from one side or another, never stopping in; and from the looks of it, there was no wild fit and nothing even coming as close as where they stood. Twenty men were present at the site. Neither of them stood within reason of each other's touched, for what was fair. No one talked, no one walked and no one said anything about what happened there. No report either coming from either of them. Since they were but put there within reason, since they were asked to keep an eye and a mouth shut, that had been nothing but a deadly combination that no man should ever forget.

‘Listen to this, I think that there’s something within reason that every single one of you should know.

Within the hour, twenty of our men will die and there’s no possible way to prevent it. Now, I know how what this sounds like but let me assure you that I’ve got your best interests at play here.’

‘And what would that be, Butch?’

‘Now now, Herman Shore, there’s no need to get impatient here, grab a cub and keep quiet until I’m done, there’s enough time for every single man of this fine respectable establishment to get a word in.’

‘I’ll have a panther.’

And the man simply took one of the cubs from her, seeing how she was caged and chained, then proceeded to swallow its head within a bite. He chewed on it as if he’d never had one before. It was fascinating looking at them go; but now the men were rather, quiet. They had already, let’s call it familiarized themselves with it, chewing on tobacco wheat and what not, putting their fingers on it, that much was settled. This boy telling us what to do?’

‘Listen here cousin.’

‘No, you listen to me Herman, I’ll say what I have to say and you’ll sit there quietly in your corner, you hear. You’ll talk when I let you talk Shore and no sooner.

May I have a damn word in then?’

‘Can I?’

No the men said in unison.

Then he continued, by doing what he could do best, he put on a map he drew. IT was a finely drawn map. By now they were drinking moon-shine through those animal skulls, they were sipping absinthe and but jingling a tune as if they were with the Envoy. Little deer-heads moving around the room from one corner to another, they wore Negro skins and were always set in flight, seething for what was going on between them and the little Apache carpets.

It was a fine deal of events they were settling through.

Eight men were already gone. Out of the tavern there were eight roads leading to eight different fake cities, like cardboard, that’s cardboard out there, pointed Herman, but everyone already knew that. They knew what was there also, behind the cardboard there was little men, encased in metal, and they wore constellation belts connected with tamp-wires acting like baboons, consuming women of some kind. Foreigner women that could be theirs, they thought. SO they settled on recovering them, then retire. They were old men, and their home-ladies were warming their placed up, taking care of their children when they were busy just hunting around.

But these little men were different, they had long necks that became the cardboard cuts of those buildings, always making sure they would draw more of the foreigners in who didn't know how to make the difference either. They were of a different kind of dumb, because they were outsiders and most outsiders didn't belong in them fields around the place. It's what the men settled with, taking the women back, claiming them, then teaching them good, for the time being it was as much as they would do. Before long, they were out of their way trying to cut through eight portions of the land, walking like giant insects as their legs were but encrusted in the bodies of their newly found and taken over concubines, then they were breathing in the air as they were set in flight, incapable of stopping as they started shrew over some of the close-called upon skies. They were in their eyes and every one of the man wore an army suit, and a metal copper plate encased with iron bolts and knickknacks they found around lying, they forged their armors with bone, melted some of the cubs, and then drew on as they were but completely covered in those dead animals, whom were but trying to get through the first extraction.

A man punched one of the panthers in the head, seeing how he could not be satisfied with it unless it was moaning. Otherwise, he was spent. He didn't know what to do or how to erect himself further than where he stood and where he went. It was all the time in the world, they spent all the time in the world drinking and covering themselves with the nastiest think-a-majiggers they could find laying around, and before long one of the men appeared to be completely dressed in Nigger pelts, ever so-drawing after as if he were a large gorilla beating around the bushes, as he brushed his face around the nastiest of things.

'You don't have to act like one Johnny Palo, you know that right, boy?'

'Of course I do sir, I just wanted to know what is, sir, that's all.'

The light is hurt my eyes. And my eyes are not to be hurt either.

Their cardboard cities became their giant ships which went out their way and changed in color. They were dark, skin-like, pushing out of themselves as they heaved themselves out in every possible direction, forming human-like mountains, which were drawn in, as if human-death mask-bodies were put through. Or they were gelatin-polls in which men leaped before they were allowed to go ahead and do as they pleased inside of it. The men were just as frightened to find out that they were alone, running out of options as the females were already absorbed in. They were eaten behind their throats, and inside their ships?

Large rooms were humanoid-replicas were performing experiments on themselves. They looked like scientists, of which heads were scientists that grew out of their split-in half heads from which sprouted the legs and the other bodies. Making eight rows, eight scientists' bodies but only one top head that reached the ceiling but was shaped like the bottom of a plant's dirt that took a pot's shape, then formed dark crown-like spike-cranial protrusions that wore themselves out and appeared to bear little cranial fashioned smaller skulls of themselves that were wrought in a few selected casts as to show Asiatic features, Turkic ones, Native, so on and so forth, adding to a bunch of other things that had been eaten and forced to grow and evolve as if they were but half animalistic in nature, then skinned alive because they could not be allowed to live in their current forms for more than a few reasons.

They were working on open tables.

The men also, as soon as they were out of the tavern, had been pulled in one of the ships by a pair of strong winds as the ones caused by tornados, which immediately put them face to face, or rather, they were looked down upon by the men of science which were just as confused as they were.

‘What have you come here for?’

‘We want our women back!’

Yelled Shore, but everyone had to calm Herman before these creatures were truly annoyed. No one wanted to step up on their wrong side for more than a few reasons, for what was fair, something could happen. Something that no one wanted to happen; to which they relented.

‘Respectable, man, if that’s what you are.

I seek to inform you that I have no idea what you’re on about. I couldn’t possibly think of what got all of your riled up in such an awful fashion.’

And before the end of a flash, in which the light above them suddenly turned itself off, then on, one of the scientists, or rather, one group formed out of the eight of them were on the ground. And they were all puking on him, covering him with rat entrails and various other dead animals they had ingested which immediately began squirmed on top of the bodies, having slowly made their way inside as they nested in the warmth they provided. It went as deep as to have themselves rather caught by what was going on there. Being rather indisposed as well as they were driven away by what went on, the men formed their small congregation which was kept a few meters away from the bodies while the scientists kept to themselves, refusing to do as much as to acknowledge what happened there.

‘I see that it’s within reason to ask of this, but will you at the very least not mention this to anyone of the other beings that reside in this place?’

‘Like whom? Who else is hiding here?’

‘I suppose hiding wouldn’t necessarily be the right term, but I relent.’

‘Don’t get fancy-fancy with me partner, or I’ll show you some, rather, fanciful hospitality and see how it turns out after we give you a round to run about the mile.’

Which was at the very least, somewhat invigorating from what he could tell.

I couldn’t fathom waiting any longer for the same reason they were there, it was something I couldn’t shy away from.

‘I think we should leave, drive away somewhere, you know where, during a time where they can’t know we’re here.’

What is murder and who is the main auctioneer of slaying, who is the one that brings on the knives when needed? The one who wretches as to put himself on top the mountain yet to fear?

‘I think, there’s something in my eye, it’s been in there ever since I entered the Complex.’

It was a tear, he had lost it. The last time humanity would weep.

Humanity simply took refuge into an empty cradle. It was large enough to keep eight men. It had a chair in it, and looked mightily roused, by all means enter, a voice would say. He imagined it as such, at the very least he would take some kindness.

The head piece is all that I remember now, it's the only thing that's ever been embed in my memory.

There was something extremely convoluted about the way in which it was wrought it, since it had no beginning and no end. They were always bottling it, always bottling it, its lower jaw being somewhat liquefied, completely, utterly so.

It was part of the base, in every shape and form, and at times one could hear it produce its vile sounds, even when there was no reason for it to happen.

The base was peculiarly structured if one were to look at it from every angle at the same time. It only made sense for one to do it that way since that was the only possible way to go at it. And have as much as it could take a chance at the most peculiar entrails cadence that followed through.

‘The man is ill, he had returned to the base yet still bears the mark of the eel-like shape form that had blunted his forehead when the time is deformed.’

‘What does that mean?’

‘I do not know for sure, but we must record his proto-radions and make sure he isn't breathing any longer.’

His half-a-face was but much older, but he was there, on top of a floating cubically structured pair of ribs, pathos with little incisors that were come between them.

Fights

He threw a cup of boiled mercury in his face. Took two steps before he threw two knives.

Stepped wrongly on a small plunder piece of blood-turmoil.

From his open-wound, inside his chest, came a gun, which immediately shot. Two bullets came out, slugs falling and from inside of them, skin-nails started crawling out like worms.

Leaped over leper and got it as well. Infection travelled from one person to another.

‘Why can't you stop already?’

It's pointless, fighting here won't bring you peace.’

There he spoke in one of the interconnected valleys. Encircled like inverted hills, depression in the earth that pushed within and even deeper.

The tournament was to set its reigns.

Amongst the first contenders, a few remained and a few others would follow.

Dannley Booth set forth, though of little mind, and little worth, he had lived in a farm.

For most of his life was pitiful, he met him on the side.

In one of the pits inside the valley, faced as if he would not know, even the likes of the most unfathomable thing, he set it so. And one and again upon a shore, uncut, it begun.

Methane H had leaped against his side. It was just how his body started, wreathing as it darted so. Though the gas was released between the joints, he drowned a few of the frogs.

‘What’s happened?’

‘I have liquefied their lungs. And they had died so.’

‘I see.’

‘We’re much alike, can you not understand that? So, why start fighting here? Set aside and cheer for me.’

For there were fighters and there were standers-by. Whom were inclined not only not to fight, but set alike, to their inclined and cheer for other fighters. It was just so, they would not show, even the slightest hints of fear. He neared and pulled out a knife.

Booth was anything but a scaredy-cat, all too changed. Too much pushed alike and driven into the blameful thing that was hitting each mount. After staring for a while, he started stabbing the hills, as they say. Satiating the need for blood with that of dirt, something one would not even do, as a dare.

‘Stay away, what are you doing?’

Stay away!’

But a few dust-strikes, of dirt which hardened the gas came to be seen. As if he’s slit his veins in reverse, Methane-H barely stopped it from drawing back. The gas dissipated over a couple of seconds while a face could be seen in that. Out of his pocket he pulled out a few snake-oil pouches, tiny like ticks in disease lounges. Thrown aback, he threw them in the distant dirt as he saw it softened and pushed, allure. He walked a few steps. And was touched beneath the sole, and depth; a toe rose, then his fingers, then the thumbs, as if to reveal some cuts, a few more gusts flew from him.

‘What a dull existence you’ve been put into.’

Get up already, don’t douse up, there’s someone I need you to, to make something of it.’

Strands of gas turned into a tiny floating patched floor. Beneath it the entrails, bleeding. It was fairly placed, an advanced society in all that it entailed. For what was worth, a couple of disputes would not for the likes of them change a thing. And when to wince, one would go rowing, dreadful things, all that time gone to waste, it was all too thorough, of the taste.

They only started by a chance, for their surroundings were neared upon, entranced the pit in which they were fell, inside a small catacombesque well in which they walked around. Always chasing one another, leaping from a corner to the other, drawing near, as to fear, a punch near the throat, missed, followed by blow across the chest, leaped again, it would remain. From both sides blood fell. A hand had managed but to grasp, through his suit, it pulled about a patch of skin. The man bloodied, never swooned. He might've understood something, if only he were sitting in a place, asking. Teeth broken after a sight.

He took a root and chew on it, rightly so. From bitter walls, everywhere around, there were but strange things they could only watch. Before long, a hand emerged, like melting pyres put around the edge of waste. His fingers dragged, around the walls, and dragged about a single knife. It leaped about the place, he threw it, seeing how it became a hammer, right before he'd knew it.

Bashed, of glass which came out of gas, emerged, there was but little pain where he expected the worst out of humanity. Always appearing in the wrong places, especially here in an utmost deformed reality, whence everywhere the wild surrounding turned as if they were surrounded by a wheel as well, stepped through and drooling around, another step pushed him back. Where he had fallen through, there lay but a single nail, a dead bat remain as it would start chewing on his back as well. There was but a reason to feel, nearing his will, when he had to piece.

And part of him had seen the room stop from spinning, yet lost. The way out had been but a murky hold in the ceiling, where they fasted. Eaten from a diseased lancer, who had long decayed.

Once spun, all revealed, everywhere around, there lay. Many a dead men in an open space. All whom had leaped and danced around, not since the tournament but a war. If it had to be and closely gotten, there was but little to their mind, hence they gotten. Right all of the sudden, standing at each other's backs.

Both turned and faced each other's strikes as they attempted to slit each other's throats. A knife appeared, another one neared, when could they be gotten? Fear of the poison he carried on him neared.

But one stab should be enough, it would seal his throat in before he'd leap, up there, on top of a giant dead man, whose face was contorted, who missed even the slightest shot. Who didn't know where to leap around, or how he's gotten anywhere.

Large zone, enclosed. There was dirt in it, and hard to show but the little scrapes, first came the single thing, a kick as well, which followed from a hollow spot. A sword was raised and rinsed the ground. Like flames being wrought about, stone to stone, it shone just likely as it were to happen.

A few more steps, and then leaped around. The full broth blunt shiver of a weight fell upon it and almost cut. Through full blunt force the roof of the helmet split open. Another day lived on. Part of the foot came off, then he leaped behind and stood on a heap of bodies, broiled. His blood was boiling, pulled from the sheathe, but a single long needle, the side of his wrist, flung about the man's eye.

He stumbled behind, another, few, smaller ones, they came, calmly prodding around the place. From the roof they fell and many through the disgraced face. Bleeding and spilled, tripped along and walking still.

Twas the dark. Both advanced, one moved down, and buried himself within the bodies. Walking through as he swam haughty. Dread pushed through, a single dead man's hand rose. Sword being met, it froze, just to cut a thumb. Looked around, the floor was done, wreathing and filled with many, a light from behind uncovered. All of them were feet blow. But only one moving man would show, another followed, two rose. Blunderingly, the swings came, but no one rose.

'They're all dead.'

His echo shook him off, he could've lost it there, before the faire dressed man stood from the side. Flanked and pushed down, lost the handle of the hilt. Lost another finger, stung, a few needles in his mouth, pinched by his teeth before he could swallow; followed by unrelenting pounces as if he were but a panther wallowing around a trunk, in need to make him swallow his pride, to choke on them and feel them spill.

He spat at him, eight within. Inches near his eyes, he tripped. The man rushed through and grabbed him by neck, to trim. But a few inches, cartilage be gone. He almost lost another thing but he wailed, as if he had known it all along. From the pile came a dog. And bit the armored men by the ankle, then the throat, but received a punch. Forced upon his feet a stance, as the culprit ran away, thence, upon a whim he raised his foot and crushed the dog's skull, as it if mattered. He faltered and gone through the door. Made upon a bridge as every single plank shook before the snow. Had fallen with another knife, just in time to realize, as it entered his forearm's cover, he had been so thorough that he had forgotten to but pick his blade.

Blackened remains in the back. There was no time, at the middle, he'd fall. Another knife fell but took a rope, the man ran and came to the other side before the snow. Enter upon the room, and made it through the stairs, on top the swoon, a standing tower. They were rounded and surrounded by the view of an open city, cursed. By many walking merchants, strangers, the forage and the many people set aside. He came to be. And ask of thee.

'What was the reason you've followed me?'

'I do not know but I am entranced. I want to spill your blood and taste its grim side.'

He said as he prepared, but another knife, gotten, wrapped, turned around as both men fell. On the landing, a few feet below, the full weight of the armor. A few ribs had come at a cost, and as he prepared to punch his face, a cleaver but melted, his face contorted and erected, as it shot from the body in the air. Set in flight it pulled all ribs, with every sack of organs, and disease. It flew away, never to be gotten. Never to be touched and pushed and robbed, forgotten.

The man was but seen nowhere else, neither of them could've been called again by no one sane.

Few attempts followed through but no one sane begotten, hue. The tournament was set to have begun, it was but jolted and gotten, thrown around as not to pierce. Uncanny as it were, nowhere near at peace, they but stood and twisted, ropes were lowered and always placed.

It was pointless, looking at them with hope of getting a rope head. A start to splatter and what came after was but a man whose looks and where he shook, and where he entered the pit was held. From beneath him but a tail dangled, many rocks stood in shamble along with the other fossils on that side. He wore the head-scarf of a single metal helmet with spikes on it and a frown such as the likes would be reflected in the Greek tragedies. Unevenly set, he was almost of a set. With his heavy shoulders dragging below, and how he approached, let alone would he know what happened after. Two fingers were but cut.

He approached, would he not? But stumble onto the adversary. Of fewer feet where he stood, and at an uncanny presence, he would shatter but a slight string, he came after. The man was nowhere to be seen. Yet he rose, from uncanny angles, always singing, always upon the stranger, would he come and to turn, only to face a few strings coming from a little row across his broad metal pane, from where he took them out, still there lay power. But a touch would make him sort to cower, then, before the mind, his fingers shook in way benign. Had they melted but a second, he'd fall down. But he stood after all on a rubber crown which had been set above the pit. Seeing through it now made him realize that he would most likely lose his feet if he had tried it so.

A hammer came after, as if not to caught. First the pane in both his arms, he felt no electricity, but a blow, below his sad looking, crippled knees, both broken, both swings. He bled from both and slithers would shed but the blood of eight pints yonder. Mixed with the aluminum below him, chemicals in the air, entering his throat uncanny as if he was but a host; but punched there and yet again. Stumbling towards something, now could he see. That the fighter, yet not stronger had already prepared, to his wonder but a smaller trashing woe. A ripped out bone from his arm, he shone towards the man. A small head inside of it, a cackling skull upon which he prolapsed, his tendon-veins of tumor bolts and sharp red-tinted sparks, coated and unnerving, starting, yet to be pushed out of the way. Through this uncanny thing he revealed, just like a lizard, stay. On him, don't look away.

A peacock would convey the image of the rounded skin, touched and pushed as if to blind-away.

Focus on him. The man thought, only to have thrown the pane by accident, as he could not get it back by any chance. Not to be caught by them, not to be away or push himself as if to dread whatever happened after. It was by his mark, and by the start his reigns had better played. But uncannily, he was staved.

His fists fell as soon as he had come to see. That he wasn't throwing projectiles but growing it. His far end, the arm, the hand, were only fed by that tiny skull and the skeleton which shook the fat. Thrown about nonetheless, like a bloated thing, of which decay was much more than what seemed to be his broken throne of skulls below them. They had been sitting there for a while yet rose.

Some flew through the strings and through the tiny specks and pseudo-platforms upon which they froze. Always missing, seen to have been thrown away. Upon an array of chains that were their spines, they carried scissors and blades. Last along the way, the arm flew, now bloated as much as to look through like a charging rhinoceros bred for flight.

It appeared to have gotten through, many blades and many chains alike, drawing near as many as could be, out of the way, the man just threw himself into a pool of malignity. Always drawn and dragged below, he would shatter his own crippled knee-joints only to walk again on steady toes. So would he call the stumps after completely shattering what lay below him. Of a mind, he pulled a tiny knife, the speck of needles, always filthy teeth, the riddle.

What had broken the man?

Where was he pulled and why was his mind absent?

Now he crawled, the man in doubt.

He looked for a way out, nowhere else to be around. Always of a motion, always protruding in whichever direction, yet never understanding what had happened.

They both leaped at one another but ended up planting their respective left-over arms and sharp legs inside. Bloodied on every corner and left to die.

There was another, a pit of a brother, where leaped from one side the other. With, seen-along and uncanny things, wingless spans and backs protruding, as hard and extended, as large blocks of cement, all coming from one side, ended.

One of them was open-chested, as if a large torture wheel, cleavers within in submerged had constantly been forced to rip him to shreds. He would've known agony if he had been forced to watch it, but his head was twisted to his back. From which, both sides, arm-like growths that were yet indistinguishable from rots of skin and plants of old entered his eyes while they spread throughout his brain.

Their sides were cut. The other was not blind but deaf, side to side, always stopping to address, though mentally to no end. From a side one ran towards the others. They would not stop to cower.

Yet from the sky, a rain of nail-like figures fell as they pinched their sides, always of a mind to be caught. Punched and beaten, savagely thrust, at every intersection of their blinds, the spots were checked again. Then settled back. Only to return. Constantly trying to search for one another, as the contender, Armth, whose eyes were untouched yet, covered them in hopes that he might not be killed as of death. Waited for either of them to lose, or to get too loose around a foot, then trip, below, there had been, but something of a drop, filled with the most embattled thins.

And this rain of nail-clippers had almost come to catch within. Each grasp would but, much rather take yonder, whatever they could be pleased with. Always of a mind to be caught, sniffing and taking what was not theirs and ought not to be.

Two knighted armored, darted. Their sham of a little, laughed at. But a blade, a sling, and jeer. Some would come to see how nails disappeared, always filling them inside, since their hollowness was of a kind not to be seen. Punch above the waist, followed by a disgusting show, two more to follow, right around the face, where the helmet, if it were to open for a moment. Nails shook inside and darted on every facet that could be touched upon. A single pick could be hit from above, and as it happened, one rose. Though it left a crook open in the head, there was nothing there, not to be alarmed. No liquid of the dead.

One but froze and took behind. Looked as if it turned, caught on the side. Always dragged at the knees and made to fall. They had almost come to wrestle in the pit of nails, where iron-cobras would but inject mercury after each spade. Things could not be said of him. Each arm but wrapped around the other. Coiling around as a whispering flower, dead bees would make as much noise.

The other froze then pushed below, he took the helmet away only to find no one. It was thus done. Like an upturned bucket, release of all the nails inside. From the depths, uncannily torn, the limbs of which would enter home, as it would come to seethe and stay. There was but little on its way. There was but a mischance to look away. They said but little and little more would they pray to it.

He rose from the back, his fingers were almost gone, but came to charge and sneer. A finger within grasp, Miller tried striding to the side only so he could but avoid. Two more feet along the way, it shone. With a light of red, he almost missed it, but couldn't get his finger back.

Around both knuckles, chains, wrapped around and spine was brought with him, and would to be. Only a knife was in Horst's hand. He had but shaken himself over. Not much of an annoyance, to be called, he stood and yielded no shout and would eat but straw feet and eat what he could.

How could he live for long when everything counted upon a strange thing, the flashes of color, always after, they were there, out in the open guiding, forming themselves as weird shapes.

'I manned Dexterous-Kingo by myself, I deserved the great pay, to be given as I shout and wait upon it, the louder, the lousier I yell, the farther shall I go after and it shall stay with me.'

He but opened his would and would to be swooned by what was going on. Not a second more had he bothered before he realized what was going on. Always twisted, lost for the swords.

He took one and did what he could do best, but fight for his life and little more. A glance had pulled, from where he stood, but a mountain, small appeared in his chest and blew the rest out. A box and puddle, beneath him, ruddy; swarthy as it might be, as soon as he opened his eyes, the sooner could he see what was going on. Nothing to be ashamed off, his guts was throttled, and widely opened, forced after some kind, unable to blind himself no longer of a mind.

They followed, his servants upon the chimes.

'Another challenger faces a crime of death.'

A debt that would no longer be shed of any tear or the strike; as he feared what might happen after that, he but ran around, broken uncannily pieced together and sutured like a dwarf seeing him.

He had been speaking for a while but none of the others could see or understand what this was about. Whence he had appeared from, but the bobbling head-throng of which spanned around, the two sides of his body opened and were left to fall or to be placed upon. Growth inclined him so, as if he'd been forced to push away through four stacked boxes, always trying to conceive and connect, everything was of a gut for him or wild devices which were stuck on top like wild exoskeletons made in the worst possible shape, the mind, the brain, and various lumps remained.

And but a little head inside, fallen like a bomb on top a crater, still growing as if to show little bulbs coming out-a forest without features. But as this thing floated of which, limbless, drag-below two encased wings-blotch, there came but the sounds and the wraps which appeared to be slowly moving on until they could not do it any longer, let alone the strongest feeling could be attained, that of dread piercing through their eyes as well. Foaming and fumigating, they would forget. There was no better time for it to be yet.

For he was the one whom which he called, to be allowed to survive, only for a little longer until he was but of a mind to do it so; four nasty heads pushing on, dread being scum. It would be done so.

‘I think I would rather be inclined to think. If I’m of a mind to ask, I need your skin.’

He asked the other contender who looked at Kingo with peculiar eyes. So much so, had been going on that nothing could be set in stone or written, as to abide, sows of desperation. They but would ask for more.

‘Fight, fight, keep fighting now, wait, I think I need to ask for something else now.’

It was not to be contested so. But the man who had initially yelled was but one in the crowd, the loudest, whom had immediately stood out, and wrung about the worst stares, to whom he’d do it yet again. Not to be asked to settle down, and not to shout, he but looked down. Unable to understand the making, there was silence. It would satiate the likes.

It appeared out of nowhere, just like a fancy thing, a specter with no trail. Without looking away, one would have just as much to stay and say, and let alone satiate. No curiosity, always to disappear, every time she would come near, always but a goner. It was peculiar, trying to search, where there was no sign and would not be so.

There was no start and there was no way, to track it back to whence it lay.

A few more things were thrown. Out of their way, they appeared inside a cone. It became the sight. Like tiny specks of colors entering his eye, always blinded, flashes thrown. He had but flailed or attempted to do so in order to avoid. Getting caught, his hands were not, he would’ve heaved if not for what entered his blinded sight. Eaten away, there was nothing as filthy and insidious, or better be called, pushed away. Caught of wreathing skin, and pushed within only to be put down. They would follow it, but a mark.

A few more things thrown, two punches, a kick powered through them from the side. Thrown around and would to be of a mind, would they lack in awe, or to defend, a pointlessness and better yet. There was terror and dread, spread between them. Lack of wonder, the strong wondered. As they threw their pebbles, lack of sound, there.

A few more steps would’ve lead them into another pit. And no one was allowed to go through it of step behind, or step ever closer or be it so off beat to mind where they were going. Hence they hopped on the rope, the first one that came along and would to be, they settled in. Pulling themselves as soon as it could be.

One of the pits fell through. As it just so happened for it to involve multiple men that would be set to fight, unevenly counted upon, they simply fell and would not abide. What happened through.

And one, two, three, and one two three, and one two three, they should have wanted. They shouted and the louts that darted, everywhere near. They were crushing their skulls and bathing in, would they hear the voices rose from the nearest and utmost stronger, strangest of the plainer bringers, the base was filled, elated, but men within. Every grasp for them was but a diseased trance and they were but unable to think of the past.

‘I hear, I hear, I hear, har har.’

It is unclear whether or not, I ought to.’

Too confused. But it had dawned on them that they would know what was going there. Especially under a chandelier they carried on with them, fanciful in their heads, they merged with it and would bash scum, which was about. SO tiresome as to know what pieces of garlands had been left by previous invaders, which had come from bastardly nations.

‘Oh, see, pleased by me, I am but a master of naught. I am but aflame and burning, I should not understand why I’m being shoved inside the catacomb.’

‘You’re being dissected.’

‘But what have I done?’

‘You lived a fine line, your life was take from your mind unkindly as to know. We’ll draw away from you, what should be known as. I’m going to slit your fingers and eat you.

I will eat you. I want a red well, I want to paint it. I want to live in a stone morass, and wear a stone-brick house around my body.

I want to be a man of bricks. I want to be assaulted by corpses of disease, thrown from siege machines and be forgotten when the time comes.’

Peculiar, in order. Something faded, in the distance, waded, as If depths were barely made. With a look, one to satiate, where to go and drag the man; as soon as he was touched his hand was become a gust. As the mad tied to him, both drawn along, both becoming that which should not be counted on. Darkened by the blow of skin, of which transfusion was but a sinful thing that had appeared. Always of a mind, they neared. And every mad set in line. Connected through their chests and back, by an utmost wreathing thing uncanny. Most bastardly a pole, inverted as one should know, ever popping here and there, it could not be kept from entering, theirs. Grasp, but a place that would not be touched, down the solitude where they cast. Upon themselves, glances would not even bring them back. They could not know, what pain had thrown them off their feet alone. Would they grasp the stainless steel and shine? Upon a light which was benign. He was a man that died and burning, led them upon an incline vale.

But it was still inside, this dungeon fading, of the man who pushed them down ahead. Lest it be called, and letter be wrought as hardly as it should be; slag would die for a man like him. Fanciful innit?

An old crane thought. She was around and would be brought to ask him so. But the crone’s head was but a strange artillery device which spat her head over and over again, at the back of a baby-body made out of churned out wax which bore tiny leg-like clippers that switched in and on. There to be and would fancy someone picking her up. So she would not be crushed and bashed around each head and trail.

Always there, trying to go in formations. They were trying to retire their bones. Seeing how the Colonel did not understand what was going on, he but tried his hands around them.

‘Pierre, you should not be brought to my attention just yet. I know what you’re trying to do.

But if you take her here.’

‘Shh, no one will know this. I only want to make sure she’s taken in.

I can see her real head hiding inside of that machine on top her skull.'

It was dreadful but it was there, but melted and flattened-fat as if there was but a ukulele-trap which had cut through it. Largely deformed as she was, she hid something else in there, drawing inwardly inside her gut, where she hit, constantly as she would, every organ until she would be brought to pain and somehow remain still in her head. There was but little to her functionality, and little more she would know of what happened in reality. Always tortured for no reason, she would not admit.

There was no reason and there were no feet.

Upon the way they walked, they walled in but a single touch and wrought about each candle, the fire soon emerged and started burning her. Whoever that culprit was, man on fire, he had burned her right about the pass. Fallen, burnt a crisp before her time had come. Triumphed over her body now, they were but trying to find their way to the fugitive who killed her.

'Caporal Clicks, you need to use the insects, I need their vibrations to hear.'

He had a bag filled with them, alas, trying to spread wherever he could muster the cans. There were wild walls and everywhere thrown, there could not have been a home in there, unrevealed. Yet dead men-near, they feared what appeared to be the noises, followed after. And yet another unkind disaster had but entered wrong. And days in which they wreathed about; wheat was under fire on the side. There was no sky and no plain to see opening, yet they were outside.

All was wrapped in a coat of painted black, upon which stood many crested open shoulder-booths in which they tried escaping from.

'They're their children.'

'It's their home, it's their place, their land and everything known. We cannot interfere.'

'But Pierre, captain.'

'I've already said my piece and that'll be it.'

There was a pelt, out there, for every man to bear and a peculiar shape of a strange-planar shaped, wild helicopter drone which bore the head of a trunk and a large body of a compact wine-holder, made to look as if it had been encased. By such a skin and peculiar nerves that dragged everything down.

The entire world was drowned and now, multiple men, women, children and animals were set on fire, running as if to starve it.

Everyone raised their guns, aimed at what they could and released it all. Through pained.

'Ta-duh-duh-duh-duh-duh-duh-duh, ta-duh-duh-duh-duh-duh-duh.'

The sound of the rifles, spreading, through an uncanny thing, always bleeding, unnerving, they were put down. One by one, out of their misery as yet to be gone, counted, then to disappear. And they left their marks down, but red, a haze was near.

Whatever was in his mind would not work for the sake of it. They were unaware of the circumstances that lay around. And as though there was but a weight lifted from his swollen soul, as if taken from the wild surroundings until he had become, there came but a strange walker, which carried on top of him a cradle filled with soldiers yet benign. All of whom were still connected in their backs with the machines, always of a mind to eat what they could and dread one another as they became ill. They were but released on the floor like a pile of dead rotten fish and more so. An egg-like snake emerged from inside of it. And suddenly cracked at the top, it spat twelve living men as well. Most of whom could not help what they were, as they were mildly deformed. Always of a piece, stuck together as if molded to become what they always seemed to be. A monstrosity, and one to be.

The next step towards self-destruction.

One of his mouths within another's shin; some tied together, others having inherited a few extra mouths and extra legs that didn't belong to them. Uncanny colors as well which only drew away and pushed in what seemed to be a tail-nail which drove itself through them, allowing them to fly around.

Most of them serving the Bgkerny, whom was to be their liege, or sort of, as to say. They had not only obeyed but appeared to be of a wingspan themselves around him as one could look into the distance, at the various cliffs, see them fall upon their larger bodies as they were but pieces and put to their eternal slump, always of a piece and mind to eat what went or was passed around. There was but a single problem which soon emerged. There was no reason to look past it or feel as if the earth would swallow them.

But the ground bore grin, it spoke to them and spoke within, Bgkerny's ear.

'I shall make every inhabitant cower before what's given in my soul.

Below you there are herds, made of beings not of this earth. I will drag you down and allow them to eat what's left of your gown after your fall will have made you so. Know that you cannot survive for the likes of you will never know of such resolve, as to be eaten and dethroned.'

'How dare you?'

'You're not a king, and that is not a crown. You're wearing a red cap that has two eyes you took away from a blind man and put them on.

That does not make you a ruler and the people that serve under your name cannot even properly breathe, let alone do what they're told.'

'What would you have me do then?'

'Leave this place as soon as you can and don't return until I'm done.'

'Why should I do it?'

'There's but little chance along the way. We might make something out of the skin that's about to fade and be taken from you.'

'I do not understand.'

‘The farther you’ll get away from these people, the easier will it be for you to understand, with every drop of skin erected you shall be done for and will realize right away.

You depend on them like the parasite you are. Without them, and with them gone, you’re nothing but a small puck of black skin that’s moving around. A dark thing, as a mole, but even darker, swollen, like an organ without a home, abandoned and rotten in the morning sun, that’s the fate you must accept on your way out. Otherwise, I see no reason to speak with you any longer, of his face.

Whatever remains, I will see it cut and pushed away.’

‘You’re cruel.’

‘It had to be said. You’ve wasted too much lives here and most of them will run away or would do so if they had the mental capability to do as such.’

‘I will kill you.’

‘You will do nothing and do you understand why?

I, the piece of earth had already won again you.’

‘We haven’t even fought.’

‘But you’re on the run.’

And before Bgkerny even fashioned an understanding, he was there, on his way out, in whichever possible way he could do it as such. He wasn’t one to question anything but he could see his skin fall off, along his limbs, wings, the leper inside of him emerging. Could this be a trickery of some kind?

He couldn’t tell it. But seeing how there was no other way, he turned and went back. Not to be stubborn now, as that never served anyone, yet he questioned him for ever so, as to hear it clear.

‘I’ve taken your warning and I see that you were right.’

‘Yet you don’t understand this, out of my sight. I wish you to fall away and find a way to die, as well. It was not my intention to make you stay. As to further add to their destruction as well, I only wished for there, as it could be, to be a chance that they might be free.

You’re the reason they have to live this way, after all, and I see no reason why you would not hone what you have and wonder. It will only make you ever so cruel after.’

And once they started breathing, they would not stop until one of them was done. As if from hand to hand, they were joined at last, fists were pushed and thrown around. Wild exchanges always given after a while; until neither of them could help it any longer, sweating profusely after, then being unable to breathe. Pushed away, then seethe. Until they could not help it, pulled away and ran behind cardboard and various put-through holes or planks, barely made through houses that were broken through. It was worrisome, thinking so. Worn out, then missing what seemed to take ages to replace it before it showed.

It was night, and but one man survived, in the death of fright but blunt surroundings.

‘Begin!’

Called the Fighter-Boar, whom helmet was but taken from one whom claimed too many lives to count for more.

They came close, too close to wager. And danced around, pinched ears, the wager still called. Pulled away, but a tiny gun from beneath his arm, rolled as if on a rail across his muscle, until his fingers got their way, starting over, playing with it, before aiming as his feet. First shot taken, but around the gut, too swollen after that, he’d miss it and be brought. Still there, his mouth gaping, bashed arteries as his mouth aching, feet behind, him on the back.

‘Should’ve aimed for the head.’

A knee came over, the man still bled. Rolled as quickly on the ground. By his arms caught around and thrown before he could but breathe, the shrapnel-dust. Tiny specks of cartilage carbon, ever in his nostrils, dragged. He point-blankly wept. Eyes were but kicked with the butt of it, no bullet shot, another kick in the head.

Below, and around, where landed. Stomped around the ribs, his knees darted. Both arms and legs, then pulled away. By his hair, ripped, a shot had seeped and merely scratched atop the surface. Trail of blood, another shot. Trails now coming, ever brought to bleed around, until a pool had formed. His face painted on, brown with worms. A cloud had sworn but even the nails coming. Went out of the way, left the man where he stood, to stay and not ask for it. If he got up, he’d go for it.

‘Put him down.’

‘Drown the dog.’

‘Have him!’

Again, the smoke, reloading what he could, the little shitter held one between his tooth and limp, and spat from where. And just down there, he but lay awake, while beaten. Abandoned gun, ignored the stings, he was not messing around. With every jolt but something sharp followed. His hands were weak, heavy clothes a heap, marched in shallow ground. Iron surroundings. He had choked before his eyes were landing.

‘There, the victor, and here, comes another.’

In the distance, where they stood, despite being looked at, as no one understood, not even the slightest glance, to see what happened, they but struck in.

His face beaten down, they heard it happen.

Then all of the sudden stood back. Rain was still for a moment, abashed, floating upon magnetic fields, stopped and dragged away by a deity of floating junk which floated in and everywhere around them. In the distance coming, being brought, would to be, they were set back. There was the dragon of disease, the rust. He came upon the floor and gave them peace but a blank platform to stand on. Men charged with little more, throwing it at one another, until they bore nothing more than needed. It was a mere thing, being undefeated, or trying to sell it as such. Before they knew it, what rose between them, was but a strange peculiar blast, below the guts, whence they had become but parts, nails and various other bolts as such.

Just in time, to stop a pint from entering. Stuck in, he would not bleed. Lillum-dust, and specks were brought before his eyes. It only came too fast for either of them to be set around and be reminded. Only too bastardly the sight of it, no fool, would but remember what he should. They aimed beyond their chests and shot, brought themselves over, to the heaps, the upper body parts.

Not a single man was on par with his adversary.

That would stop no one from lifting an arm, picking on anything he could, a bar, charging yonder until he could but stop himself, the wilder he'd gotten.

Thrown aside, lifted up. Gotten out of the way, then pushed back down, twisted like a barrel, gotten close. Another strike but landed, stronger than before but stopped, no more would he allow himself to be put down, no more would he sit, and talk. A rock between his chest, his pipe but thrown away. Pulled from everywhere, then shattered, only to be followed around by another, whatever it took. No matter the amounts of punches that shook him, he would not relent. Two kicks around the chest, a single stab, the knife was out. Barely grabbed by the wrist before being pinned around the nearest wall he could find, charging him through.

Another kick followed, and would to grab forth, his chin was off, not to see the knife, raised but an arm on his way down. It followed, stopped through. In, bleeding, but always pushing, feeling the full fledge of pain that entered him after soon he would be dead. Grasping for the same rock that followed them around, the sky was but smoke now, when he wished for rain.

Though he was on top, the knee exposed, he'd brought it to the side, and almost thrown. Pulled a hand, the knife still inside of his arm but nowhere near his throat, only to have ended rolling up the steep, throwing him like a cadaver, a few slits on both of them from the side of the blade, still there; the tip hadn't made it on the other side and would stay there.

He spat, took a few drags away, but both of them leaped on their feet, as they were brought, side to side, facing one another, still yet to be dragged down.

'We've got evens, I call it a stop.'

They shook hands, he took his knife back, each on their way.

Always, pointless, no fight resulted in anything, blank losses. Would to die another day, the tournament never stopped, there was no reason to go on.

Hand came near, fingers liner, the thumb under, suddenly pumped, both hands raised to block. He had been thrown and fell at last. Dragged all the way through, always hissing from a lip and a broken tooth, always pinned and slit, every beat of a heart but a delirious thing.

Of which lows and lo' to see, there they rode up the mare in blue capstan on their shoulders, of soul, they admire. And day end, and put through.

First they shoved, each side, and every single man would know how the cast each other off then. They fought in the gutter with lighters used, as far as they, as they could do it. Past the hay, they lit and threw, tiny needles spreading through a sack, and red-a hue.

Aha, but certainly I have you defeated. That much is settled on the first blow and heaving chests should know when to sit and bleed when the uncanny heaps but become of you.

‘Rest, I tell you, rest.’

But he refused the invitation, therefore they only fenced.

Silver-leiger and Alloy of Ivoer.

Ivoer but raised his rapier, right, left, then he lifted it around, then lunged ahead, only to be parried. On par, he but rose; Leiger but froze as he turned his wrist on the left and flipped the blade, flat ahead. He played with it, forming circles. But another few inches off the air, then beneath it, then below, then on the side, ‘twas but a jest.

‘We ought to begin, we’re looked at.’

‘You see only what you want this day.’

‘Is it not pleasant picking up the straws inside your blade when I’m not looking?’

‘It’s hard to see past your helm, take it off.’

There, indeed he had, but his face looked like a perfect mold of the helmet which was protruding in the front, his face but for faces, eyes on two sides, as a chameleon without a cause. Each set of teeth beneath a nostril, then flat on the right, flat on the left, the curved.

A single speck of a flocks of hairs, coming out of a pear, the top of his head.

They fought.

First the gourmet with his foot, through a chicken stood, burning in the stove, there burning they but fenced against coal as they picked every slimmer of fire which had come and rose. Who would happen to know if someone missed it? A pick and a single strip of meat of his face, the scar. They were but in a court, fighting under the sun of the Tsar Petrikov, who was clapping.

Dangling fruits, as they sparred; another one above his right side, and they would but fall, a shoulder was pinned, then pulled, everywhere around. Both sides met, then turned around as if stunted. Receding back, they but darted at one another, meeting each blow. A miss, and a plow through, only to be picked aside by the back of the blade, the rose-hill hilt, around the spade, which lifted it from across his chest; he reached in time to prevent a lay.

There on the ground he sliced.

‘Not a single foot further than that. I need to pick something.’

But a rock, he threw it at his helmet, cheater.

‘I thought you’d take it off as well.’

Spoke Leiger. But he waited for him now, to pick it on the side and push it around, he tried. He pushed past the line and as if to throttle him around, he but cut his horn and threw it, at the sound.

‘Twenty steps in each direction. ‘

They took themselves, without disgrace, picked a flintlock-revolver with eighteen shots each, and a rocket attached and a nuclear pin-device, with a javelin head of a man whose teeth were but tiny needles that were filled with various infections. It was also set to explode. And would crawl around the hand like a little paranoid dirt-bolt, if asked to.

It spoke, then.

‘Don’t shoot me.’

‘I will.’

Plainly, as it appeared he had ignored the guns’ advice without fear.

Just to be clear. The gun also managed to replicate the motion of a sub-machine gun in terms of how it fired. Not normal bullets either, but high-caliber anti-tank missiles, that were also filled with the blood of dissected martyrs.

It was a country of evil, where he came from, and there was no stop to what he was about to do in any case. He’d been thrown around and left to waste. Would to become as, to be called.

There was the distraction.

Seeing how Leiger had it out, he but threw the gun on his face and left him bleed on the ground. It was a heavy sharp object after all and there were no rules of warfare keeping him down.

After drawing near, to see the man, he had but got up and started towards him, then. A shot, a clear one, point-merged with his face into the bullet, contorted, around. Despite being aimed as his face, he shot his lived, which opened. Half his chest disappeared, half his spine, half his left, then he felt down. Part of the ground, a rip on the sky, a blood tunnel formed beneath him, where he was pulled down and ripped to shreds. He was brought back from down there by a giant two dimensional legless savant. Whom teeth were inside the entrails, spat out. From the depths there came but a small plain needle-rack fat protrusion with which he fenced. But it was never the same then and he had merely stopped and called back.

No one could call it back.

Punched below the chest, he’s made it only for a second, caught between both arms, nick of time, kicked up between the brow, pushed back. Stepped in, punched both sides, nicked the ears, came again, both hands grabbed his throat, then his faces, pushed around, put through the wall. Turned around, facing one another, it was all clear, for a second. As if they knew. Both sides, all four a few inches, both chests-sides pushed along. At a distance, legs matched, one front, one side. Hook missed, another hook followed, awkwardly stumbling, being wrapped about. Tackled to the ground, barely holding, punched in the head, opened split arms, spat in his eyes. For just a second to get off; bloodily nosed, and a rip.

Always a few feet away from one another, keeping the distance, cutting through it; first knee raised in by his chest, he recoiled, got the full blunt, followed through. Foot pinned down, then arms followed, always trying to land a hook, blocked with both hands. Pushed through, trading blows, following a strangle, touched around the throat, pushed over, slid aside, both heads butting in, one nose split, around the root. Wallowing around as if naked, both of them shook, as they drew on, first few guns, held by their chest as if a pile, dropped over. Followed by two, each hand, a few clicks but none followed after, missed, click, by a mistake. A bullet flew through, it was lost, it was pinned around, thrown off, pushed out the barrel, entered the wrong direction, then thrown.

Each of them resumed, all were empty or full. Blanks, empty blanks which always recoiled; first man lost his finger, the second but followed as soon as he could, always trying to put him down. A spittle, and a cackle, he but cocked the revolver open, as if from a hoister flip the blanks out. Grabbed a few mid-air, his other hand, then threw them in the other man's mouth. Then, while choking he heaved across his chest with such a might, that he fell down and finally choked and died.

There were pinned people everywhere around and some were but of a single finger lost. Others dying, face to face, rising up then throwing little pebbles, trading blows and marching around. Flight of arrows resulting in a little more than a pool where they drowned sorrow with cups.

‘I am the victor.

I proclaim myself as the victor of all fighters, I have won.’

‘We haven’t even started yet.’

‘Then let us start.’

They raised their blades, and were but feet away, one wearing a child, wrapped around a single mild rope which shook him as they fought. This was a sickening act, but the child had a little switch blade on him which managed to deflect a blade that was purposefully avoiding him, saving his master from what would’ve been a death blow in the nick of a second. He could simply have lost. His life were so much closer to being forfeit than that of anyone else around the matches. Only matching one another by chance, both the child and the man relentlessly came all out. Close quarter combat, with him was but night impossible, hard to tell, even harder, then again. He could’ve been pushed and grabbed.

His neck was out, he would have the child, he had to. Would to kill him, if he weren’t to be up to it; placed on feet and always of a kind. They were but both pushed aside, the Iles. Were but spread between them.

A nick of a shed, a quarter of his blood lip but put through, hardened as a rock, they walked upon a dirt-rack that followed after and dined upon the blood of their enemies after.

While they were gurgling it was time. They took the right amount of distance, then they set whatever they could aside between them and started charging between one another, both set to do and please to be with every side-arm taken around, surrounded and put through. Uncanny thing, both arms being shoved aside as the middle point of their face were but met by blunt fists, one turned to be but little more than a hammer put through them, both lost as well.

He threw a puddle of water in his face and big his tongue after charging him, with a tackle, a disaster following on both sides. They were but hugging each other then pushed aside. Always but to throw the neck punch in, always but an inch to reaching the point where they could blow an artery with a knuckle within the next second; it was then that they danced around and gotten themselves into a busted lip, around the hour. Around each shower of disease, attire of pissed-in legs that fell on top of them, grabbing only for a second more.

His knuckles were but cherries, dampening each blow, before he rose and stepped away, and froze he had but caught the man between the buckles. Wrapped around his throat, but suckle on it, yet he's done. He's tried himself again until there was but none else to ask of him what happened and what's done after.

A man who was a fighter charged through one of the appearing doors, he punched and broke it through, within the wood-shrapnel he withdrew both fists the eyes, he spat black blood in the man's eyes. Then with the broken fists with little cysts and sharp corners, he started pounding after, just as soon as he had known of it, as much as there had been disorder, and followed about to destroy and to come about the hour, when there was but praying, hours gone. He waited for his sight to be regained for he had pounded him between the eyes. Grinded him like stones and puddles, made him gotten through, and taken after. He was forced to be spilled, and felt as one would feel, ill in the head, dread as he erected his body, leaping around, everywhere.

‘Still haven’t regained your sight.’

And all of the sudden he appeared out of nowhere, taken by surprise, and rushed to the ground where he felt his teeth but part their way. Feeling wildly torn as well, then he opened, largely around the mouth, fully filled as if he drank from a cup, a bottle rub worth of his own malignant blood upon which he choked, around the hour. A punch in the gut, and pounded thereafter; taken by surprise, then followed after. Scourged and plain, and dead fish entered him from the back of his throat, where he was forced upon them as forceps would open him, always but to feel the push and to be made use, as to open there. The back-side of his throat, hinged on both sides, made to feel and pushed, again, inside; curled where he stood, he took it, with every blow following through, only to be more broken after, again, pushed until he couldn't help it.

The great contender approached.

Within his fist, a few roses, punched between his open palm, grinded with his right fist until a pink circle remained against the fit of the jar he pulled out. As soon as he had it within his grasp he started punching it until it began breaking. Pounding it until the shards entered his knuckles, blood sprouting out of him; then he simply pained himself as he continued across his face. Shards encased within his first, first the eyes, his nostrils cut within the mark, no longer had he a straight bridge, no longer a peculiar brow, advancing upwardly as if to cut every strand of hair that remained, then pushed on. What followed next, after being left with a bloody dripping nose, a bloody fat lip, a splattered chin, exposed neck, he simply threw off his shirt and began punching himself until many holes appeared to be made on just about every consider of the broth, until he was but exposed, and there inside, the livid-long thin chopper-like organ grinders, bone-machines but fought yonder. Encased in a box of bone, his heart beating, protecting itself as it to grind each shard away, the blows but followed through, one after another until he had but pounded his skin off, flayed, withdrew.

And everyone whose seen this act but began applauding him, on and on, they went for hours. He took a bow off, and another contender came forth. Drawn by the strangest of things, he had but followed in and would to be. He didn't know what the cost of it were.

Plunging, charging towards the man, with a long blade, he came as well, out of nowhere, there remained. He had but pulled alike every kind of sharp thing he could find, carrying them all sheated in the back, as followed. There were chanced for his throat, would fall apart, and wallow, yet in pain, he dreaded much. Punched about the wreathing heads, he had but pulled, again, a single blade. With every slice, as if to cut and spray, and spread aside, whatever remains were left of him, put behind, how every worthless and every breaking and every torn, was put behind him, all the more pain was spreading. Between the two of them never-ending; there came no question asked after, nothing to be called into their breathing throngs. They were but put down and rolling one another, grabbing, before they could reach about, both held. Dropped through one of the dirt-holes, hidden away as they were almost dragged, beneath the ground, as if pushed away by an avalanche; it was the matter of the coming, to achieve. And bring within each throat, a single swing. He tired, with the blades now entered through, a few inches out of their leather, pushed through, only their tips would be needed, right through. On the left and on the right, he but pushed everything on the side before he could get himself going. It was all that was worth knowing.

Started on their feet, they met up close, hand in hand rose a finger, frozen, near side-by-side they shook one another's fists, before rushing to their specific corners, ready to dine upon each other's corpses as soon as time had come.

Each of them prepared. They were heavier by the minute, one at least had something the other one should be aware off, large fists, mostly bulk inside of them, by the minute, boot-shaped, then pounding air-cysts as they appeared, then again. With every punch received they would recede inside the air. Creating the most peculiar sack-like transparencies which carried on his sweat; it was his peculiar technique used to achieve dryness, which was needed as they came. Blow to blow, a fist had slipped, his rival slid, unaware. He received a hook and stumbled back.

'There's still a chance for you to go behind. Step out of the circle and don't come here no longer; look fellow, I'm only trying to give you a fair chance, fair and square, don't die here, because I don't play fair.'

He made them appear again. Always but fisting them as soon as they were in the air. Closer to him, as if to stare, even nearer, he was aware. Many men gathered and looked.

He fathered smaller cysts which had but slipped inside his knuckles, then they shook; it was as clear as there were no chances. To avoid each lance of pain; he pulled on, knowingly that his fists would slip again if he came running down with blows.

A fist followed, then a blow, between the blade, it shouldn't have gone through, but it did as well.

Then stumbled back, he dropped it at once, as the man merely put a jab. Before his forehead and the brow, where his hairline receded, where his appeal unheeded, he could not understand. How each time he attempted, always but a wail; a failure in pain, why is it that I cannot hit him? Thought the man frustrated.

It was strange, how he kept trying, always ready to put another step in even if that meant the risk of dying to a man, he's barely met him, then again. They started sharing blows, and getting through one another as they rose to one another's faces. Both but shaking during wild embraces. But he's slip through the death hug and simply crouched before he wailed on him, pushing him back.

'You stumbled like a little man.'

But it was there he noticed, his fest, unwell, he had thrown dirt, a patch. Across his face, his body touched. Everywhere the soil some of boiled and fell to each side but he was merely tackled, finally down. Yet when the time came to pound the man, each fist would not reach, always to the side of each cheek. When he attempted yet a blow, unable to hold on top of him, pushed around and made to show, there was but no way to have him yet. He was simply untouchable, and yet.

They tried one another on the ground, rolling all over, until there was no point. In getting around them. Without a way, they were dumbfounded when another man joined their pit.

Both of them got up and started messing through, taking the necessary steps needed until they couldn't get themselves, withdrew when the time came.

Edges around the circles made, as if to run around. Each of them but battered through the crown.

His heart was squeezed out by the second until bursting.

One of the strongest contenders had come to be.

Hans Jackal

His body was completely made out of completely abstract-sculpture like completely geometrically stretched and placed iron wires as to make him look like a human being. His birth came out of a wheat-iron-like virus which allowed him to reform and recreate himself by stacking iron-wheat-patterns on top of one another until they formed long-moving contorted iron spring-like stretches he stretched out of his body on a whim.

All of the sudden he contorted some of the bone-wires inside of him, into a switch-blade.

'Ha-ha, you cannot kill me, I am invincible.'

Previous attempts to melt or destroy him had only devolved into further failures. As the little wheat-patterned iron wires had smaller wire-like clusters inside of them, like a Matryoshka doll, nesting inside one another, barely attached, yet caught within one another's grasp until they reach microscopic levels of stretching.

Before joining the tournament, he had been employed for a task of guttural-menial jobs he had to take care off.

Hans K. Jackal's eye appeared in a classroom.

By employing a most peculiar technique of microscopic wheat-iron-stretching patterns from one side to another, of the world, employing a most peculiar, not only stretch but a complete built-through water, people, land, buildings and objects thin-invisible movable tunnel, he had achieved complete domination over everything and everyone, as he could materialize his very body wherever he desired by simply pulling and drawing back as many of the wheat-patterns as possible into one key-core place, where everything else inside this network of microscopic movable, detachable, semi-levitating patterns floated in and out of one another like particles of air, or atoms.

They were misplaced all around the world like a computer network system, or oxygen, suddenly awakened as they followed through to form another eye, a mouth, and to the children's shock, a two-dimensional body that appeared on the chalkboard.

Startled, the teacher dropped her books and merely stared in dread as those eyes which had materialized had no irises in them leaving some peculiar blankness to be looked at. A nose that was also flat, no gums inside an empty mouth; yet Jackal merely leaped out of where he stood as he leapt on top her desk and seemingly pointed both hands at her.

'Where is it coming from?

Come on, guess.'

'I don't know.'

'Yet all of the sudden he opened his mouth and spat a spear of wheat-iron formed spears which immediately impaled and killed her, turning the blood inside her body into coagulated wheat-iron patterns that were left behind, having carved his name across her entire body and every possible direction, every angle and every possible facet of skin she bore.

Before the children could get away, he all of the sudden spread a few wheat-iron locusts he had spread around, having them block the door, the locking mechanism, as well as he had entered some of the children's brains, bred inside their lobes and slowly having taken control over a few of them.

'I wish to be entertained now, fight for me children, that's what I wish of you.'

With that, the children started tearing each other apart in his name.

Yet he could never hold onto the wheat-coagulated or wheat-bone shrapnel that came out of his victims in order to rebuild himself. He knew that eventually the vile wheat-patterned evil entity might call upon him to commit such an act of evil as these things would seem to be a merely child's play.

He'd already gone through and left the premise only to make it along one of the malls, which, during that way was rushed about as to be filled at a rush hour.

Jackal could not be stopped, for he had also the ability to completely freeze people in place once he had gotten enough momentum while maintaining his form. With every step he's taken while embodying his humanoid form, upon reaching enough speed his skin would become human like, or he would be surrounded by a skin cast as to be clothed in the skin of a man, only to have every wheat-like syringe rotate inside his body on a constant motion as to become a small storm of a tornado that's mixing every possible pattern until it will have been seen as some peculiar indistinguishable liquid-like formation that's been twisted around in place, only to have it all of the sudden sprout out of his back upon stopping in a place, this being the entrance to the mall, forming a giant wall behind him, of metallic patterns that, when seen form above form strange overlapped ellipses that move in an out as to make motions while his humanoid body is kept completely still, standing there, with both of his arms completely pushed in, while, having waited for enough power and force to be generated from the constant motion they're put through, this peculiar reeling wall would suddenly reach its limit, then, upon having reentered his body, and shoulder regions, the back of his neck as well as the adjacent areas, from inside his body, microscopic-like extensions would shoot in every possible direction, bouncing against the hardest of surfaces, and against every possible non-organic life form, until they will have reached their target. As if they were sperm-cells and the people were ovaries, while the mall was the womb, cervix, or where the ovaries are normally placed. Entering them only once as they made their way through their blood-streams in order to block blood-access to the brain which in turn would freeze their entire bodies in place; allowing Jackal to move as he pleased for the duration of a few seconds without having been seen; despite the fact that he could've kept them inside and killed everyone, which was within his power, he chose not to do it here, in a public place that might've gathered too much attention.

He entered the jewelry store, broke the safety glass and stole a pearl necklace after.

Then he walked away and no one seemed to notice he was even there.

They had also been caused mass hysteria as well as nose-bleedings.

Upon walking out, he shook himself, creating billions of small legs upon which he walked, having protruded out of his chest, body, neck, throat, eyes, face, limbs, lower body region, with them not being placed like legs but curved around as it to crawl, bent on the ground as they dragged him along.

He moved through the city through the fastest way possible then, having dispersed himself only to appear somewhere else.

When, all of the sudden, he felt something.

As if the hollow insides of the wheat-wires had, over time absorbed the very scattered atoms of existence he simply kicked in, as if it were automatic as he pushed his arms forward. Out of his shoulders, arms, body, chest and back pushed on, various arm like formations which had redistributed some of the mass of his ankles, lower body region as well as his back in order to form them. As if channeling through some atmospheric pressure, he started creating wheat-patterns out of nowhere, in a peculiar light ball that appeared out of nothing. Yet, it was not made out of metal, it had been made out of skin.

This growth which fell on the ground appeared to have, on the other side, the face of a man embed on the other side, a face he had never seen before. A face that was like none other, and he had scourged the land in search for it, only to have found none unlike it.

Jackal thought for a moment, what could this mean?

Sometimes he drank a lot of water and made the tip of his fingers water holes, and watered plants. Now he shoved his fingers inside this man's head and bloodied junk.

Other times, he lynched people he didn't like by fashioning ropes out of him. Entire neighborhood were turned into electrical-lines of many hanging dark people alike he had killed along the way. He enjoyed seeing them as tiny sculptures of wire he called his art since he could spread his pattern inside of them. He enjoyed that.

One day a child came out of his house.

He's spent a good whole week at least in that neighborhood, carving them, to be certain. Enough that someone, if not a lot of people would notice. Yet this was the city of Droit, and no one seemed to care about its people.

As soon as the child came into notice, he began screaming.'

'Mother!'

But Jackal was annoyed, so he simply sewed shut the child's mouth, by a simple maneuver. He was on top one of the roofs, having a good clear view of the street. The child was in the middle.

On his, not the child's left, on his left, the line of lynched people, the child being on the right, the lynched people in front of the child. From the child's view, Jackal on the right, but he couldn't be seen since he was coy as he was laying low.

From Jackal's point he stretched a hand which stretched his pinky which shot the initial hard-roded thick base of the shot which had suddenly become thinner and thinner until it hit the land on a straight, from the point of view of his finger shot where he had formed a bridge-like stretch. As it bounced on the ground, it shot precisely, as if it were a second, from the initial spot of impact-shot out of bullet, through her ear, having then curved straight, then around, then it entered downwardly then upwardly into the blood stream, blocking it, then out of the other ear, crawling along her head, or across the ear, then it aligned itself as to create the illusion of a perfect shot, which would place the general area where it regained momentum somewhere across the top of her skull or near the edge of it, since her skull was smaller in comparison to other peoples, or rather, depending on the original entry, it might've crawled on top of the skull or the middle top of it, depending on the angle it entered her ear. That having accounted for a few meters from which the shot ricochet out of, which was something he hadn't considered or paid much attention to since he himself couldn't see the wheat-iron wire that had been shot through her head. Regardless of it, that couldn't have gone through both ears without breaking through her skull and exiting the top of the ear itself and not the canal. Having established a general trajectory, the wire entered a house, took one of the thread and needles that had been lain around the room, swallowed its tip, then, upon being reeled back in, the girl had been caused a lot of bleeding as the iron-point got forced through her ear canal, skull, blood stream, the other ear, as it was pushed back out, where, he had finally come to suture her mouth by force with a strand of bloodily soaked thread.

Her Concha got scarred the ear canal as well, the Tympanic membrane pierced through, as it forced its way through the ear drum, Malleus, Incus, Stapes, rotating along the Vestibular labyrinth as it would be completely destroyed, then the Cochlea, having reached the vestibular nerve, Cochlear nerve, Vestibulocochlear nerve, her Dorsal cochlear nuclei, the Ventral cochlear nuclei, olivary nucleus, Medulla oblongata, Lateral lemniscus, along the Inferior quadrigeminal body and her Medial geniculate body until it through her Auditory receiving centers where the initial incision through which it came out of had been made. Her lobes had also been, almost completely severed and ruined by the needle which at this point had destroyed every adjacent area through which they had been dragged through, leaving her not only a mute but a mental invalid as she lost her consciousness as she fell on the ground.

But if she ever were to wake up, with her mouth being sutured, at the very least she would not make any noise any longer, which was something that pleased Jackal who soon left her where she was.

Although, in order to have been able to have rematerialized himself from one place to another, as to have also been able to block the bloodstream to the brain, enough microscopic wheat-iron patterns would've had to gather around the area, as they are carried through, in order to form an iron block between the areas through which the blood is being delivered to the cells; in other words, the aneurism and the copper wire. In which case, making the wheat-iron cells more like injectors of pattern-cells that further the replication of his body into places he wouldn't have normally had any access to in the first place.

There are also wheat-filled lookalikes to the top region above his throat coming out of his finger tips at time. They talk to him.

The angle of her tilted head might've actually completely changed the way in which the entire shot might've aligned as well which hasn't been taken into consideration before. In which case, depending on the trajectory of the shot, the initial angle which would've aligned itself as it pushed out of the head, if it were not altered, might've been closer to the top front region of her head than the middle if it was launched from the initial landing spot where the pinky was aimed at. But the pinky wasn't aimed straight either, as it would've had to have been tilted as well to his left side.

The radius of the initial shot couldn't have been angled in such a way by which it would've shot directly into her ear either from where he stood, which could only be attributed to the general angle being altered by the very nature of the wheat-iron and the way he managed to manipulate it.

Closer to the top-right side of her head if tilted and the general direction was angled enough for it to be fully shot; this not accounting for the general controlled direction and the way through which it crawled inside and moved through her head to begin with.

And to be certain about it, once the initial incision or push-through the side of the girl's brain, after, before the second entry into the other side of the brain which was needed to go through the nerves in order to get out of the other ear, there was still the problem of cutting the blood flow, through which it would have to go further south than it would've headed otherwise, before turning around as it resumed its trajectory. The return of which might've severed the blood-flow completely, with the help of the needle, killing her.

In which case, there hadn't been any need to suture her mouth in the first place.

Seeing how the neighborhood was abandoned, he left it and never returned to it.

Regardless of that, he had woken up one day falling as to appear out of a nightmare that had devoured the world, only to have awakened himself into a most peculiar match he had no idea about.

His opponent was but a strange, peculiar clothes, melting-piece by piece pierced upon little man with a smoke-suit which was made out of glass, filled with eighteen hundred cigarette butts which was entirely immobile. His static position left him vulnerable, as well as it left Jackal severely confused as he had no idea what this meant or why he acted that way to begin with. Since he only managed to walk ever so softly upon the ground, feeling this peculiar place at first, he did the only thing that could come to mind, he formed leashed out of his lower body, right as he fell on the butt of his lower body, then he started whipping the glass-encased man. There was no one inside, yet, the glass didn't shatter. With every given blow, it would not shatter. He started whipping it from side to side, cluttering his body in one direction, then another. He fell over to one side and stopped momentarily. Then he began whipping with his right hand only, to no avail. He got up, having drawn back all the wheat-iron. As it came to his understanding, this peculiar statue was indestructible. Relented, he looked around. There were many pits just about the place, yet, as he tried pushing himself out of it, he realized that he was forced, as if by a great wind to be put back into his pit, regardless of his attempts to spread wherever he wanted. He was trapped in his pit with that thing. Then the nails came out from the rain. Most of them passed through him as his body accommodated itself, forming constant gaps through which they pushed. Glassy as it were, that the nails simply just bounces on it then everywhere else. It was peculiar, but there was no way out and he felt uncomfortable, as there was no one else left to kill. He was taunted by the presence of so many people he could've slaughtered, but he was trapped in there. Regardless of the single-peeps of wheat he's thrown around and about the place, neither of them returned. He had no idea what happened there or why he was even placed In this place. Even the microscopic sized ones were pushed back.

Both of them were all of the sudden buried underneath a giant tower with a semi-spherical bottom nail-pile in which they didn't move over a few weeks.

Strange fight dressed in peculiar clothes, he came out of nowhere and raised his fists, both of them but put around a whip that came out of nowhere. As soon as it was wrapped around him, he pulled the man over. His knee came in, adjacent to the area between his lungs, between the belly, thrusting forwardly until he's gotten ten kicks, spitting air, breathing on his chest, then starting again, while he was put around. The waist dropped, his guard lowered.

There white buildings shaped people that threw rocks at one another out of their open windows. The suns shone upon the pain, which gave them a blinding shine which shone upon each other's windows. They blinded one another yet they kept chucking rocks.

Glass cigarette smoke cast

It was a weird world, an oblong that was made of glass, with giant cigarettes inside of it. There were glass trees with cigars in then and man-casts that didn't move, like nothing else in there. Yet, one day, this glass-thing was taken from its world. It woke up, the objects, which wasn't sentient. It appeared out of nowhere, and made a humanoid creature implode as it burst from inside out.

The world was under chaos. And people searched for refuge, near it. They didn't know of anything else, since they were primitive and this strange object was not to be shattered by any means, by no strike and nothing that could touch it by any possible means. It would not be, fashioned as if of stone, against it thrown as to make way for something it might crawl against. There was no reason to spare either, as they were pained by what had happened.

Men came and bounced their arms, only to be cleaved about their faces as their fists could not surmount the surface. Pain was known, and it was docile.

Two men fought and chased one another after being done exchanging blows and jabs, between one another, soon enough making it seem like there was nowhere else to be. They dug holes and fell through it.

‘Raise your fists.’

As soon as they could they started trading blows, always following one another as soon as the other man rose from his seat, being thrown around, blinded by the trails of light, his fire gloves but pushing through, punch-after-punch, but on the row his nose bled. His mouth gaping, a tooth sticking out, then on the ground.

‘Take this, and this and this.’

He could barely breathe. Twisted on one side, his body bent backwardly, still plane; he kicked with his right leg, as soon as he got close, he made contact and pushed him out of the way, spat on his face, then ridiculed his throat, with a blow that knocked him back. Off guard, he followed with a flail of fists, all ending up around his chest, then right around the cyst, below the ankles. Crushing with a kick while he was done, he followed around a trail, stomped him until he drowned in dirt. Both of them fell through what seemed to be four hours until they landed in a pool of muck where they stood for a few moments, still throwing punches, changing blows until they couldn’t deal with one another.

The men froze upon being met by the greatest creature of the pits, who hid within and came to pin them both below the rails.

There was the sun, in one of the pits. It stood alone and shone. Its light rays kept behind the invisible pillar, preventing everyone from making it through. Danger approached as little men were put against it, trying their best to fend the sun off, only to be burnt alive immediately, melting, liquefying in an instant before they were even pushed into the pit. A lot of people were put in line. It wasn’t much of a fight.

Two men charged at one another, first one spat, only to have the side of his liver kicked, in, pushed on, he threw a few jabs that were quickly avoided as soon as he regained his footing. They were not incapable of making it through, for long. Longer times were taken through. They exchanged but glanced.

Their knuckles fell off as they were replaced by mouths.

They fought each other until sun-down from the looks of it. Each strike but his the other, purposefully making contact before it fell over, starting again soon after, as it would slip and come-between each finger, extending as they but threw slugs at one another. Both sides, ears ringing before sudden contact but never raised as high as the cheek-bone, always slipped through, almost lost, almost always pushed behind. One man slipped, the other one grabbed him by the chest, pulling him back, soft bites, clean fight it’s what they did. As soon as they could go back to what they were doing, they started going at it again.

Dreadful fists started coming on, kneeling through, inside them, one by one, they were startled by one another's menace.

A man slowly approached. He came out of nowhere, but was severely bandaged around his throat, around his knees and just about the place, it'd been.

Two peculiar men could not control themselves before they started punching one another, again and again, repeatedly inside their throats, having started an uncanny yet unfathomable ritual from which they could not stop one another, bashing their eyes and cheeks bones out, punching wherever they could, having made constant contact with their chest and lower-guts, then their lower calves, until some other fighters that were present there stepped in their pit in order to stop them from doing that to one another. A fist entered his throat, all of the sudden. Mower found himself but pulling down his peculiar helmet which was made out of a moist bag where he put a few little strange holes in and little fingers wrapped with nails, which now entered his irises. He was being pounded in and before he knew it, he stopped breathing, they put him into dirt, trying to get a hold of his noise, while the other men stopped trying to break the fight. All of the ones present started stomping the man's head violently, until they left it battered bloodily, left to rot in the sun, before they ran out of the pit, leaving the two fighter who had gotten even more violent than before barely standing. Both of them attempted to strangle one another, then grabbed each other by their throats, pushing, pulling, increasing the strength of the grip until the strange burst inside their nostrils could be felt, that sudden rush to the head like they couldn't breathe, and they were about ready to pass out. Though both of them bore uncut nails, which poured in, pushing until they penetrated the outer jerky skin, bleeding on each other's fingers, then they stopped, as they were bleeding, having settled on finally killing each other off. As to put one another out of their misery, though they were both so beaten to a plump, bleeding from various spots, guiltily suffering of internal hemorrhage, when the time came, each of them but gave one another a right hook which finally disjointed their heads off the top of their necks, as they fell over, blindly and finally passed over, having spat their hearts out and a part of their guts as well, out of which a lot of gut tape-worms, upon making contact with the air had become rabid as they began bouncing upon one another's bodies, devouring, entering, cutting through, while the other ones drew even farther away from the rest as they made it to the body of the man which was still somewhat warm and fresh. Having entered it, they started butchering his insides, cutting wherever they could until they couldn't be stopped. But all of the sudden all the bodies began not only decomposing but the soil itself started drawing them deeper in as to clear itself of all the scum that was on top of it as well as of the left-overs.

A hunt

No one wants to be in the room with him, it's for their own good. He doesn't like when people touch them. His creations; they're his and they're ugly but he fashioned them out of some rearranged little people he had connected at the top of their heads, which means they're his. He spat on them, every now and then, but it was all black smoke, which only furthermore tainted their spherical bump-protrusions, that, even if one were to account for what happened on the site, they could not understand what happened there.

A fight had taken place, and the two men who fought? They were connected around their guts to air-pumps, yet they could not breathe since their arms were their lungs, these wallowing figures only resolved to fighting with their stone heads, and little extra-legs which came out of their lower calves. Them being drenched, and dirty, broken suits, covered in some malignant blood, peculiarly shapes, a mixture of unfathomable facial structures that were placed around their bodies, both of them looking like liquefied humans if they were even more forced to endure and to be beaten as they went through the worst of diseases. It's how their bodies melted, it's how they got there.

The comet ship is how they got there to begin with. Its skeleton was exposed, the remnants brokenly open and in front of them.

Two women were impaled, their mouths were wide open, they were bloating the words, still alive, they were impaled by sling-shot shaped trees which split not only their bodies but their heads as well; desperately trying to keep their tongues from being ripped apart by their attempt to swallow, which only drew and drew, by the force of their muscles, to recede into nothingness. They were soaked down there, but it was hard to make which kind of moisture it was. One would have to check. But it was wholesome, how they hanged there, but how many hours passed? That was just as hard to make, no one had alarmed anyone of what happened there, a few animals came and seeing how they were open down there, they licked. Then they went away. It was something the women didn't enjoy. In their minds, they wanted to report what happened, yet someone chopped off their hands like Dutchmen chopping niggers. It was peculiar, waiting for them to say a thing. Facing the miles of yellow sparks on the ground. A sparkling beast emerging in the full light, finally exposing itself as it were, the peculiar thing about it was that it was soon enough followed, revealing just as much in their flight of stares; from below came a sting, which was deflected soon after. Met by a shield-chitin which was pronounced as it was pushed from below, yonder; another deflection, another strike followed. Another one down, they followed each other, throwing the spasms into the ground. It was hard to see what they were doing and even worse from where the two women stood since their eyes were so far apart from one another, this was only made so much hard to watch, so much harder to subdue what they were trying to achieve there. One body fell, but when had it been in the air? It leaped, but it was already down by the time they formed the heaps, charging at one another from both directions, as their sturdy sting-lances pushed, both chitin-shields but rousing, up then down the heap, within. They didn't even take a brake, to gain momentum or walk away, simply they just paced around, going into circles as they but chased each other's tails before either one could make it in the ground. Some spared but nothing there, some but threw snares of the sparkling substance, only to see. Many of them stacked on top of one another, only their stings, but covered, those things but taintedly segmented, like little beads that never ended, yet one could see they were passed around. As if they were but thrown from one side, then messed around, bead joining bead in their dances, coming after, charging yonder, trying to grab a hold of each other. Before the time of endurance came, they stopped, rethought, then simply wailed. Like madly blinded scorpions they began, never endingly just passing their strikes around, never taking a break from where they were aiming, yet ahead, never stopping until either side of either one was dead. Though it could not be felt, neither the moisture beneath these sparking clouds, the soundless waves and the steps that weren't taken now; it felt like they receded. Like leaping cats below the mounds, like moles that all too suddenly sniffed a predator that was around. In their natural habitat, a nomad passed. He was from around the place, he who bore not a spear but a javelin tear, of which top was but a hammer. This crystalline thing with an iron sting whacker would be long employed. Its mere weightlessness only added to the blunt force with which he'd play. When he came into position he stopped. Sweating profusely as he but looked around, his grip but tightened as he had begun, trying to hit as many things, cowering as soon as he would lose within his strike but a whiff of a bead. They were being launched one after another, coming from every possible direction, arched as if to fall back into the sand as if to reload again, they were no longer but sparring, now that their pray came into view or feel, and they knew he was there, leaping like a little mongrel-man who tried getting their lives out of the sand, just to put them into ground. Called of every voice that came after, pushed through and beaten and in the ground, then battered, and made to thumb, they leaped about and made to listen to. They feared what came after, they were swollen and put through and paint-dead that followed through the cold-guts that were flying on the cruel plains. They stopped talking to the man as soon as he lost his step. By chance his glass-lance but bluntedly the trauma had begun, a mere puncture in the chitin. All of the sudden it flew right off his hand, spinning in the air like a bluish windmill blade before it plunged into the sparkling light. He saw the point from whence it shattered, no soon after, it had but immediately stung, right-after. They but all formed mounds, all having come into a ball, like a Spartan wall, where they pushed the man.

‘I’ll give you this much, you won’t abandon your own, but I can.’

And just as soon he started running along, getting through it, then abandoning the two women, never looked back despite knowing that they were alive. At the very least, he could’ve put them out of their misery yet he didn’t feel like it.

A man shouldn’t do that, he but found a woman who was sipping a cup of tea off the side of a great stone and he simply just shot his javelin-hammer through the back of her throat. Then he pulled it out as he started pounding her, not allowing her to breathe or some out of that stupor. He had to beat her, he had to kill her to obliterate her entire body. He started violently stabbing every side of her body, pulling out, pushing in, and out and in and out and in, several times, then he but took the cup which was spilled along the stone-side of the steps on which she drank and he smashed her already cracked-split, hit-bashed, fractioned head, then he stomped it and spat on her. After he was done, he took his time to start a fire inside her open-chest cavity. And ripped out of her head, then started jack-hammering every side of her body until there was nothing left to destroy. He crafted himself two wings out of her rib-cage, guts and skin-sheet and began following the step towards giant black-stoned temple that looked like a giant pile of stones put together. It was a temple filled with women and they were all doing something that annoyed him.

Hero-Nomad knew nothing better, so he simply started chasing them out only to attack and kill as many of them as possible. From that point on, this was known as the Massacre-Temple, where a little ribbon was drawn on some map created by the Unknown Cartographer Hymnthroat. It was glorious. By the time someone stumbled on this piece of land, it had already been too late, there was no point in hoping anyone was spared, because even the daughters were had and beaten into the very ground they were spat out of.

What a peculiar joy it was, the killing and slaying, the butchering of little girls, the ones that were so young you could but taste them, these nymphs splattered along-side their mothers, then pushed around into the mouthful of the most uncanny riding beasts. What followed after, the smell of savage butchermment was but a flock of flying grim beasts that came from the distant winds, break-through wings but becoming extending mouths that began devouring what they could as if they were but vultures that were in need to be fed, as soon after as it happened, no longer would they be kept that way, or made to listen to what happened there.

In a much more distanced land

‘My lord, what should I do about these women?’

We brought them from afar, and I’ve gone through a long way and a lot of trouble in order to bring them here.’

‘Feed them to the land, you know what to do, dear knave, you are a soldier.

Perform your duty as a soldier, I need you to kill them. Slaughter them when I call upon you.

You, dear man, have my full confidence in your pocket, I know you’re going to pull it out and use the knife I gave you, the circular blade, to inflict as much pain as possible on the dames.

They need to be tortured, for the land to grow.

We need them to feed the great plants, and give birth to much greater surroundings.’

And he pointed at what happened before. Much greater structures were made, as fresh woman-corpses were brought from afar. There was magic in killing women, why else was there a cause for such wild things to appear? And there were domes-like rain-drop-shaped umbrellas that were thick and filled with lanterns growing in the night. They would stand there momentarily, bringing utmost unfathomable delights. Little puffs of glowing lanterns, like the flowing souls of children signing, trailing themselves around. Little drawings on the ground; and they would sign of joy. And they would sign of drums, of great wars, with blades of cardboards that brought memories to the men, of long lost pasts they couldn’t help but dream about. It was glorious, it was fantastic, it was grand, and never-ending, drastic changes in their hearts. Little men made out of shards, they were shattered from above the sky, stone-like beings fallen but who never died. And were happy, and they but wrought, the mountains of the land were sculpted, in the most peculiar delights. One of them had a stone-axe he split the top of a dyke, she bled on the pavement, but it was all right.

There was this nice road, going through the forest. The grass was plain and flat, the trees sparse. All of the sudden the comet-moon shard-broken men appeared out of nowhere at an uncanny speed, as they only followed the example of their fellow. Having surrounded a runaway, they but searched inside their stone-broken pockets and pulled out various shaped cudgels, hammers, large trunk-heavy things as well as more peculiar heavy-breakers they but put the girl within her early grave. They started burying everything inside her head until she couldn’t help it any longer and began, flattening herself as to die faster, standing on the middle of the road as to be killed, much-much faster. Every single one of them stepped aside. A giant horse with a carriage-shaped little box filled with blades, knives and peculiar caustic acid rotated tubes began approached. Instead of trampling her, it simply stopped. Instead of using the blades to butcher her, it spun the cylinders faster. It sprayed her with acid, instantly dissolving her body in front of them, who immediately stopped clapping and resumed their work again. The back of the giant horse was an invalid-like bag which held two wheels that helped it walk along. It only got that because it tried helping a woman escape. But mid-way through, that woman turned around and simply shot the horse in the head and through its spine, almost paralyzing it completely so he could slow her pursuers down. Ever since then, the horse decided he would never trust women, since they had a tendency of crippling whoever displays compassion towards their cause. Women are cruel, they abuse animals, on a daily basis. They're really evil; there could be no explanation other than humans seeing animals as being children; yet that is a paradox with everything considered. Everyone in their kingdom feared for their horses, since women wanted to kill them.

Men formed a council.

'We need to discuss something important. It's a matter of high-importance.

We need to discuss the threat, the on-going conflict and what we can do about it that we may save, or prevent further lives from being wasted.'

'May I speak?'

'You may.'

'That whore fucking killed my horse. I'll have her throat slit and made into a flower I'll plant in her flower, then I'll piss in it. And I'll cut her tits, open her gut, pull out her innards, and dance around with them around by neck. I will eat her fucking brains if I have to. I will slaughter and spit in her daughter's face then snap her if I have to.'

The men but understood where he was coming from. It was important to understand why this high-crime happened, what drove them to do it. Why did they kill their horses.

'Where do they get their guns from? Who's their supplier?'

'It's our state, isn't it? We don't ban anyone from them, so they just happen to get them freely.'

Luckily for them, the women were too cowardly to actually shoot a man, instead, they only killed defenseless animals and children. So much so that they were but. They all got a few guns and stones, gathered a few women, put them in a stove and shot them, then lighted them and called it a day.

'This should teach them. I think our horses are safe for now.'

Yet there was a mister. The Acid-tubes horse went missing one day. Indeed it was peculiar, it was a matter that required careful thinking as well as careful consideration to be had. Otherwise, who knew what might happen to it, if that were the case.

His was a sad story.

The Horse Acid-tube-head; a horse who lived a normal life, in a perfect world where there were no women, none to bother him to soon, none to ruin his dreams or swoon', during a time when he was but a horse and nothing more, other than a horse. But one day, a woman came out of nowhere and shot his parents in the head. She didn't have a reason to do it. This evil thing appeared out of absolutely nowhere with a gun. Two shots off the back of their manes and they were put down, she set the stable on fire. While they were down she unloaded eight rounds in their heads. There was something wrong with her because she grinded on their corpses as well, that image being forever embed in his mind. It was crazy how sloppily she'd done it. No reason whatsoever, these were defenseless horses, taken from their pastures only to be taken care off as there's been an accident and there were brambles stuck in their sides. This stable was more of a veterinary than an actual stable and his parents had been in good care before she came along.

They hide away, being somewhat incapable of knowing, but I know better than them.

'I shall find my own path, and I shall go through it, and I shall obtain my vengeance by some mean or another!'

Though the Horse as he looked at the burning stable. In the midst of the fire, he saw but a shadow of blood left behind by the ongoing debris. His heart was already set on it, as one would not relent, whatever the means. The image was embed in his mind, carved, poked as if from the other end of a hot-iron. He would get his vengeance, he thought. Eventually, ruminating, brooding, spending time in the dark forest, where it always rained. He stood there, in the distance, watching the stable fall, witnessing the last pillar land on top of one of the last charred boxes, the open bodies of his parents laying there in the open. There were no flies to pick up their skin, they've been charred and made to melt, their skin. It was little as he could see, a tawny-oily thing that fell and moved on the side. Slowly crawling, being drained.

He was elated by the evil he was tainted with. He walked on a path of no return. Knowing that one day, he would get his revenge, a thunder struck the fields just then. It was a hardly noticeable thing that no one would ever take for granted. But the heart of the land wept at what had happened.

'Such agony should not befall upon one with such a heart as pure as ours.'

Spoke the Horse fiend near it, whom stood upon human legs, whose torso was but a great giant human head, shrunken features didn't move, on top of the horse fiend stood, with a black mane of spears, the cape on its back, armless but followed around by many akin to him who resounded the blackening of lights; darkening of heights, the pus-Cajun that settled through. Regardless of it, not to be cruel; they but tried to follow, sickening their teeth. Sharpening them against trees of briarwood; they relentlessly followed and wouldn't let him go.

'You must realize that this path shall take you into the darkest recesses that no man has ever ventured.'

'Yet I'm a horse.'

'Your hearts speaks like a man, and we should know for we have become them.'

'Abominations you mean?'

'Yet we're accepted.'

'That's only you deluding yourself.'

‘Paradise is not without its charge, paradise is not without its darks. We may be cast but we leave in peace. Away from them but at least; away from them as well, savage beings that they are, they couldn’t fathom any of these, ruinous, primitive, the female-beasts are unlike no others. In that you are correct.’

‘So tell me, dear brothers, in that case why shouldn’t I take my revenge? Why should It not be, suffice to say something beyond cruelty, something beyond reason.

A thing that’s mine.’

‘Revenge is blind, it’s how it is; but you will not stop at an eye. There’s no such thing, you know within that you may not be able to control yourself.

And after which what? You will have realized that there’s no revenge left to take, that you will have claimed whatever live might be at stake out of your own will.’

‘Should I stay then and become like you? You who have become half breeds? I will not accept you as mine.’

‘Neither are they.’

Said another one without fear that the others might inflict upon, unkindly so.

‘What are we to do with ourselves in that case?’

‘Recede into the darkest corners where you may push in me and cast away your sights. I know what I shall to and I know what my pride is worth.’

‘You’ll be damned.’

‘Is there no one in this land that isn’t?’

‘Then have your revenge and see where it shall drive you. Be cast away from your kind, from them and whoever else might have you.’

With that, he heard no more as he meagerly outpaced them before they could put themselves in each other’s path and make it so they wouldn’t be brought again. To peace and quiet he rode away, and for a time there was no emotion that could convey what’s been done to him. What they took, his innocence now long-lost, as it should. At the very least a few days were made to pass, to which he followed just as soon as he could realize that there was no one else around him. He was left to his own devices and he couldn’t do anything that would startle even the worst of beings, knowing that he was lost for no words, that there was no one else left there, to mark the lay of cowardly swords.

He was met by her, the first other woman she’d seen in a while. At first he was weary of the sight. This was the heart of the woods and she seemed to be there, out in the open, doing nothing, as she couldn’t but do a thing. Being so restless as she was, so dormant, as in an oyster, like a beauty exposed. She’s been running for many days in an attempt to escape, there were scars and callous on hand and knee, weary and weary, and wearisome to be. There was something about her, he had immediately noticed, without a ruse, to throw a tantrum and drove through her, he would’ve found it truly a blessing. But he had noticed no gun, and she was beautiful and young. That even the likes of a horse would take a pity of such a fiend, how could one kill such a thing? He wondered, the men, they must be wrong. The men, they must be mad to kill such kindness as he was shown. As soon as she woke up, he froze. It was a matter of shyness from which he couldn't get away from. Stomping through doings and silence; he but followed through.

'Do you need any help miss?'

He considered, surely this cannot be a woman of the same kind, like that who had killed his parents and would but kill him yet when the time came. Different, she must be different than the others, but what then? What could he do, to estrange himself from his brothers? He had but followed through and offered but to help.

'Steal some clothes for me.' She said.

At first he was shocked, how could she asked such a vile thing out of him and would he follow if the time came after that? Could he do it if the time came? Men, horses and other male-beings were not known for theft, unless it came down to women, in which case all was fair. But how could he do it in that case if others like her happened to be the same? What if they were kind? Would a kind person ask a horse to steal? There were all such things he couldn't properly address, things he couldn't be answered when the time came.

'I do not know about that.'

'You will do it and you will do it now, I'm freezing. Do you want me to freeze? Make yourself useful, you're horse, I hope that's not too hard for your now is it? I don't even care what kind of clothes you're stealing, just do it. I want you to do it, I gave you an order, you dumb animal.' Mightily rude, and obnoxious as she were, this pitiful being was freezing; and there was something vile about leaving a poor creature to starve that way, pompous as she were and mightily rude, extremely so, as is she wickedly spat on the ground and would've made him clean It off if he hadn't left.

Considering as much, since he wasn't an evil thing, he settled with meeting the Horse-headman beings. Who offered to help, though it was in shame-bow down head type of greetings he had to approach them with.

'I come in shame, waggling my tail between my legs.'

'You need what now?'

'I do not understand either, but I must do it.'

'But I thought you were to enact means of revenge upon them all.'

'Only on one for now, but I couldn't suffer allowing one.'

'Very well, but we shall not spare and we shall not commit an act that would cross our pact, as to have us banished from our side of the land.'

'You vile thing, you promised to help me!'

'We did no such thing.'

One of the facial features contorted, as if a toothy grin appeared out of nowhere, even though the man-head was but wickedly un-animated otherwise.

‘There was no promise given, yet I can give you this at the very least.

Or, better yet, you are the one to offer her something.’

‘Give us your mane and we shall make a fine robe she might wear.’

‘But my mane. It’s my only reminder of my parents, they were shot there, and It marked me.’

‘It doesn’t sound like it, and you can’t actually see your mane either away since it’s at the back of your head.’

A horse’s mane may never grow back, and cruelty was something they all knew about, having experienced it first hand, without reason and without remorse. He was offered this choice instead of committing one of the highest acts of treason. To which he accepted their offer, having turned around, allowing them to chew his mane off the back of his throat, off the sides and off his head, now marching on with a robe in his mouth instead.

To the beauty of the woods he appeared, who appears like she had ruined her surroundings for some reason, out of cold, or her period blood, which was spread about the place. Nasty thing, disgusting animal she were, she didn’t wait much in contemplation before she started knocking him off the sides.

‘You didn’t bring me clothes and you’re an ugly, useless thing to me now. Ugly, ugly, ugly thing you are, give me this, you useless dumb animal. I told you to steal, not to.’

There she went again, doing what they could do best, which was complain, almost ruining the mane-robe which had covered everything, until she looked finely worn. To which he considered leaving just as soon, having been left not with a kind thought but with a bitter taste in his mouth, as if her milk was but mercury and he’s been fed like a little child, a little baby-horse always forced to remember his remorse. I shouldn’t have trusted her.

‘I should’ve left her to her own devices. But as soon as I turn, the pitiful thing began making the most obnoxious noise of all, something I could not fathom hearing, whatever the reason and whatever came of me, I couldn’t tell. At all.’

He had no other choice, he had to see her through, it was as much as he could do now, seeing how she begged and trailed but tears all around the bloody pool she stood on top of. She ruined my mane, and would but bite and scrape, but always and always she would complain.

‘They will kill me and I’ve done nothing to deserve; I cannot do a thing that’s wrong, I’m pure, and untouched.’

A liar at that, who made a habit of nailing daughters she didn’t like on the nears of a lamppost, carving a little sign on her forehead.

Why would someone be against rape?

The drapes were nice.

There was evil in the ground and it looked like maws of coils that were puking the dirt in and out and was becoming worm-in by much confusion and much degenerate coils that started pushing in and out until they couldn't help themselves.

Both of them were stopped along their journey as a most peculiar half-a rotten body appeared, the god of which only the horse he could see, to which he'd given his soul in a matter of seconds, having realized that time was but frozen for him to act as he pleaded for such blessings as to finally be made hole.

It looked like a horse-bodied sack of Elephant-man brown tumors that were attached to a squared carnival-like chamber of some peculiar shaped cartilage flying room that kept the sack floating, like a little helicopter without wings, or pellets, which bore three rotating transparent glassy barrels with a green liquid inside of them, with many organic tubes and peculiar devices on top of them. And the creature but shone with a peculiar green light that wouldn't be worn out no matter how you looked at it for some reason not even he could explain. It was peculiar how it spoke to him as if they were on equal-footing, how it created a malignant red-green gas that pushed out of the shining light, then was joined by a couple of voices, this fiend. It merely presented itself at Horxin, and would not dare to bare no ill thought to one such as him, to which he offered this much.

'Grand vizier, I shall call you from now on.

And I have seen your future, instead of you who are as blind as one might come to know. I bear but offerings as if to show you, the true nature of her kind.

Do not be blind my son, for I am to save you when the time comes.'

'What do you want in return, father of cursed horses?'

And Horxin but spared no moment so.

His meat-sack of a body but started jerking, with every growth but shaking; the tubes rotating, without a stop.

A single floating sphere but flew, like a dandelion which but entered his heart as soon.

The horse but understood.

'When the time comes you will emerge, your soul shall be spared, and you shall rise and march upon dark path. And enact vengeance for your brothers.'

Who were there, as all but gathered, many fathered, childreaned, and others lost, who stumbled from their graves at last. Many of them would look upon him from that point on, never to forget, nor to understand what went through his mind when it finally happened.

'Well then it's settled, pull out your gut.' He said to Hans.

And all of the sudden Jackal pulled out a ball of peculiarly shaped, strange wheat patterns out of his chest. Many of them having already come out of him like a little swarm that flew around him, doing as little as they could before going out of their way to destroy whatever fragments they could of air, of the strange air molecules and of dreadful little aches.

The peculiar figure in front of him was none other than Melk-Gone.

Gone was a mightily peculiar figure not only in the way he acted but in sight.

He was but dressed out of a mantle he had fashioned into a shirt, pants and a peculiar caterpillar hat that appeared to push around him, wrapped inside then all around him but two faces that were his, as one could clap with them, stood behind. They were flapping and bore little prayer-hands put together protrusions that carried a flying dark sphere made out of peculiarly gut-like torsions that bore little features that at time but spilled in the hole he had on his back. It looked like a spring of blood with many features that somehow fell inside of him instead of aiming for the bowels of the earth, which made it even harder to guess, what was the reason for it? Yet one could not be impressed.

His strange sphere in the back but being looked at by the flat-thin parchment faces that stuck out like pouting fairies with little finger antlers coming out of them. Which looked even more peculiar since, with the sphere spilling in and with them staring directly at it as it happened, one could only thing that for them, the ground was but out there, in the horizon while they walked on vertically invisible walls, as if hills and mountains were their walking paths, or if there was a cascade, that was frozen in front of a man, he would walk on it and his head would suddenly be removed only to be flattened and stretched as to be made for the flapping things that were struck to his back instead. That is what they were like, and their crows of fingers but giggled for them as well, it couldn't be denied, it couldn't be tried, it couldn't be forgotten now. For what was worth it. From behind, as if tilted for the man to look directly, slightly above yet in front of him, him being faces towards the wall, one could see bars made out of put together fingers as if they wore finger traps, mouths being vertical lines that are close to his back, one eye up, one eye down, the sphere with feature-guts levitating in the middle, while one could see only a slight opening in Melk's back. If it were a ship, the front wall would be an opening leading to the outer-space where men would be drawn by gravity, or the wall itself, to which the man is staring would be a floor for the projected faces as opposed to what he saw.

He had spent many days pondering on his nature. Since every time he opened his mouth, a giant flood-like hose shot amount of pressured bloody-rust water would come out then stop in the spot it hit. Marking the area as if there were feet, only to see them erupt.

'No, I didn't mean to do that, I'm sorry.'

Gone said as soon as a peculiar pea armchair was given a few limbs with which is started running around the city; yet within the hour, his peculiar thing, this unnatural only to him to be thing happened, in the unawares of the dark, somewhere hidden and somewhere in a place one could not forget that there was no way to find it out.

Bloody marks they disappeared. And instead reason arm-chair textured open sprouted from the guts inside the stuffing. This beast was dreadful and it would not bleed. It ran around the streets, dreadfully pushing and crushing into every wall, inside a car, delaying the traffic for a few hours on the main street and around the alleys where it suddenly retreated in order to stop of drug exchange from happening only to trample the children who had been lured in to begin with, many of them dying on the stop, with the exception of the younger ones that were still beautifully incapable of making out what happened. Until the rampage stopped, the fiend being burnt to death, exhaustively struggling to roll on the floor as if it were a man struggling not to get burnt. Yet this peculiar spell of trance was but incest of blood. It was just as much as one could tell and be aware of since there was no other explanation for the limbs that appeared to be, they were but part of a great dimension that was a giant sphere-like red gut planet which was lain inside a giant red-tainted universal galaxy. The red-meaty planet was attached to a giant meaty device that was akin to a torture wheel that was being constantly actioned upon, never to delay as to make a stop and show any kind of weakness that might go through.

While, every time a pair of the people who lived on the planet, them being nothing more than Red-limbs.

All of them were peaceful human red limbs that lived peacefully until they were absorbed by the malignant rotation of the great circle which was moved upon the plains of the planet, being worked upon by the torture-machine that was dictating on their bodies upon being released, every mark that calculated every fraction that made the innards of the entire distant planet that was to be formed and pinned down as to calculate the general trajectory to which they could somehow get through on their way to the wheel as to be replaced when the time came. This grand coagulated ring but bearing many holes inside of it that appeared to absorb, thoroughly as one would see, everything it could grab its waist upon, inside of which, the limbs would be but painfully tattooed by the many munching incisors that would put the fractions and the various needed equations down before the time drew on. It was painful and even more capriciously dreadful to look at.

Vile thing he was, Melk hadn't any idea whatsoever what happened. He simply puked the limbs out, then walked away. His existence was troubled. He attempted suicide only to find out that he wasn't allowed, as for his gushing wound released a plethora of unnaturally shaped limbs from other dimensions which stopped him entirely from acting upon himself.

Yet one day he was met by Hans Jacks who was an evil, vile man. Faced by him, when it came, he simply failed to realize that he was impaled by a hand-arm spear made out of iron-wheat, that had become as thick yet as thin as wing plane.

The sphere deflected the fully blunt force from having taken a jab at it, growing a peculiar deformed horn that pushed onward, something sharp, like a single cutting edge that stuck out and would not endear anything that came out of it.

'I am the Head-diamond Dainnelh, I am going to kill her now.'

He punched a hole in her throat with a straw, his fin-shaped fingers making their way through her gashing would, opening as they went further-in.

His halberd tasted her cunt and went right through her before she could even wake up from the swoon she was forced into as to fall on her knees and beg for some kind forgiveness that might be given to her. But alas that wouldn't work as he wasn't a fool.

'I don't trust you nor will I swallow your petty lies, you vile uncomfortable looking thing, I will butcher you in the worst possible way I can think of.'

With which his pointer and his thumb flicker the wooden shaft, causing the halberd to shoot straight up as it but left a trail and slit her face in half, leaving her body open and barely torn, undressed yet unhinged, not completely split as to die, she lived.

‘Stop this torture, you insane man, can’t you see you’re hurting her?’

‘Am I? I do not think I am, and for that I shall take my leave and kill her, and you, maiden, of whom I’m yet to be acquainted so.’

‘I am her mother-mother.’

The second one, which meant evil, that meant there was another one. But where?

As he looked around he realized the entire town was about started and aroused by the suspicion that went through him.

It was a town of women after all, and it seemed likely that this was to be the next conquest-road on the way out of the forest, where the Horse was but bluntly asked to step back as to not birth-rise any kind of suspicions. It went as followed.

‘Stop, please, you dumb-looking mule, or. ‘

‘But I need to interfere, he’s going to kill that woman otherwise.’

‘Don’t pretend you care about her. I know I don’t.’

She was after all much younger than her. It wasn’t likely that she would lift a finger to her aid, in which case, it only happened, ever so clear as I were for both of them to passionately go around each hut, and make it so they weren’t messed as to be found.

While in the middle of the village, he rose forth and would but spare each moment, as sadness sapped forth.

He pulled it out of her, carved a smile, then shoved it inside of her, slicing off her tits slowly, while he only prepared himself to carve them out. At first he became tracing their shapes, digressing to pushing deeply inside of them, around the crown and the pillar, whereas her collar bones were traces. Afterwards he force it down through her, forming a peculiar shape, like that of a butterfly with little more than a few feet’s worth that entered his prideful erect dead-tip of iron that got covered about. Beaten upon the hour she woke upon staring down, with his foot inside her calf, the other one pushing at the back of her throat, until she lost it all.

And she was punched afterwards in the back, then kicked while she was down.

As they were both facing one another, one pressed forth. He slipped along as if between two barrels, stuck him down, and would’ve gotten him before, apparent, as it was, he placed himself as in between and just appeared with what has been, little more than some wraps, all around his mouth and watch. Before they realized both had pounded one another then they darted. Longer stretches between each men as they punched the dirt, throwing themselves as far as they could, each and then, would they but put one another in each boot’s spot, until Clermont but met Lemont on each side of the trap that fell. Both of them took rounds, as they were needed to start up again as if engines of destruction were but put forth, thrown around as they revealed their broken knuckles as they were instead of yore, and yonder they followed, spitting on the ground as to thoroughly mottle it and then, bone-marrow revealed and traded.

Monsters

The head-plaster of a large mammal attached to the back-protruding head of a larger canine-robust cylindrical pint-bolt that would start eating itself leaving some of the bite-marks as subtly standing as weird-cocoons that were pushing out of it. And this side would be called a Pladine. A Pladine could be used to scrape the head of a larger animal in order to pull its ribs open and eat from there. Large octave-like formations that imitated tri-dimensional forms would open themselves to reveal small ball-like egg-shapes that would be semi-forlorn and almost entranced by the strange formula-like powder that would come out with blood. The blood would harden as to boil and clog into smaller star-like shapes, pulling the tail of the octave in as it formed various cancer-shapes that would be used to nearing its semi crippling flight shape. Ocapes-guts. The Pladine could be infested with the Ocapes-guts, which would attach themselves, as they were of a mild parasitical order, to the creature in order to feed on it. Semi-hardened boiled skin, that spread on a square-like metallic surface, eighteen meters by eighteen, forming a smaller projection on top of it, going upwardly until it formed a semi strange looking pseudo-pyramid. This strange thing would be a Boilre, and it would be used to boil the skin of living beings as they were transparent and somewhat ephemeral. Long neck-like in shape, adding to a strange head-catapult made out of the body of a man, where his strange contorted ribs held the machete like legs that sprouted from the bottom of its base, making it part of the Nepult-rep region.

Large spheres made out of variously added organs, such as livers while adding the head of a child, that only pushed around itself in a strange formation until a belt of children had been added everywhere around, forming a peculiar entranced pseudo-planetoid structure that had them all bashed in the head by the liver-extension, Livrauncher. Skin turbines adding to a giant man's throat, all the while, he would be faceless, legless, half-headed from upside-down, armless, but not trunk-less, yet bloated and filled with an uncannily shaped weird diaphragm-fat, which made it seem like his body was filled with giant wasps. Tucless-bloat. Hardened melted body, made out of rotten cadaverous remains added together, and melted around the crown of their heads, while keeping some pseudo-human features popping out from their pool from time to time before they shaped their lower bodies in flight; that being achieved by a large depressed hole underneath them, Caduool. A body formed out of the symbiotic unity of two fencers made out of organic matter, humanoid in nature which only seemed to crisscross their blades together, fattening themselves until nearing death. Humniofen. Large deformed particles that were resembling the prefrontal cortex combined with the upper arrow of a bloated child Cortechild. Taking a bunch of Humniofens and placing enough together would create a hybrid that would look akin to the fight of an army, while adding Caduool on top of them would spread a nasty stretch of deformed features that would be shared between them. Large bodies, not humanoid but of primitive bipedal creatures, conjoined while only breeding with a human infant whose belly resembled that of a pregnant female. Their beaks would be missing, wings stripped down and from their insides large tube-like fat mouth eaters would push and aim towards the bottom of the ground, forming wild entrancing strange formations akin to tiny gardens where the skin-thorns coming out of them would start pouring out pus-pools of white cotton-like steam flies. Preoutonfleis.

Preoutonfleis, living in strangely formed nests that were out of this world. Carbon nanotubes mixed with various alloys, blended together until adding to a body that was something akin to a suit made to fit a gorilla or a larger platenoid-headed primate. From the depths of its defiled insides, the guts would be wrung out while bearing a face that was like that of an androids that was being kept and made to leap on command from the part of the spear it rested on. Nanemate. Nanemates being used to scrape the insides of humans. Nanemates being repurposed to fit and be carried inside small boxes. Eighteen Nanemates thorn around their heads as the heads extended forth and the spears that came out of their chests came to be completely molded together would generate a head-pillar still connected to rounded up primate-dancers. Replacing the head of a Nanemates with that of a singularly large-tube, to which a sphere would be added and four mode tubes from every angle, forming smaller uncanny, melted rods of skin, all decayed, from inside of which tiny human beings would pull away and eat each other out as they started pushing even further. Decayates. The form of a vintage broken computer screen, large box, eighteen by eighteen by eighteen by eighteen, yet seemingly the top of it, which hasn't been measured would protrude outside and start pushing out, slowly dragging out until the wild shape of a man would be formed as a hollow shape, as for a another human to enter it in the same way a key would enter a lock. Bohllow. A human with his head torn to shreds or split in half, needed for the key-shape pushing through the Bohllow. The head of Augustus replicated one hundred times as they extend to a sphere of marble.

Pennies forming a chain-main armor, most of them bearing bullets they had stopped the death of whomever tried wearing them.

A man that's been cut in half below the trunk, bearing a cylindrical unit that's being fattened both through the lower body as it would fatten it on a constant pace, as it would do the same to the upper body belonging to Rene Guenon. His features being even more sterile than usual, and even more deformed so. An eye would appear on his forehead. Larger chest that would be completely expanded upon and wrought on, leaving his lower side of the face turned into an almost mad maniacal kind of soundless thing that would push the outside of a ripped out tongue. Not a normal tongue but a vein.

The Pectoralis Major being completely pushed out as to become, wrought and wrung in the shape of a gong that would be yellowish in color, leaving the hues push out as male features would be completely if not semi-completely destroyed and rotten.

His moustache, instead of being made out of thin hairs would inconsistently be forced and pushed out, as to be made out of various Euspinolia militaris that would star spreading his fuzzy skin-hair all around his face only to pin deeper inside of him until he could be gutless no more.

His guts would also be exposed as they would bleed, spreading as much of a nuisance as he had been in life. Much deformed, his legs would not be centipedal, yet more likely completely shattered, crippled and barely moving.

At times his eyes would turn red, deathless and shapeless, depending on the direction in which he walked. He had begged for death but none had been granted.

Small dead child, whose face would be spread all across the side-walk, from his face erupting a small mountain-shaped tiny leper made out of clotted yet solidified blood. Around him, a bunch of molded-shapely other humanoids would pushed their hands forth until their tips ended and they started melting themselves on them. From the back of the dead child, a chariot of guts would suddenly erupt, encompassing the poor humanoid children who would be elated from the joy of guttural filth in which they'd swim.

Large sings would be planted in the back of the tiny walking head-splattered child in the pool of which they would stand for hours, trying to eat as much as they could, unable to contain themselves as they came up with the filthiest of gore-sound. Guttural dances would be known to bleed the sound. But the pool was of no red blood after spending eight days in it. Instead, it would be made out of a blueish-green that would mix with everything, including the filthy children joining him as they became a small mountain of their own.

A man whose body had been completely boiled and spread around his long neck, swollen, filled with as many fattened, long-knotted raised skin-poached toiled with skin-clamps rubbing it through. As they would spread the green-pus around him, never to react to the dreadful thing which was the fire-tool that had cut him through, observed upon the use of an Oxyacetylene torch.

The torch could be used upon various animals in order to create a boil-like texture that would lend unto them the most peculiar of dreadful appearances, all encompassed blisters, bubbles, yellow cysts appearing everywhere. Unnatural blisters as well, used to curb some of their suffering. An exposed Hippocampus could bear as many of them as possible as the sudden evolution of the blisters could turn them into flying, living, air-lifted jellies. Yellow-sea Blistllies.

The same torched-made blisters gathering together, encompassing weird-lung formations.

Filthy small recluse that's being planted above a centrifugal belt made out of worms, his fingers being slowly replaced by maggots. Belgot, a belgot wrapped around him.

Rabid growths that are shaped like fattened hares which look like rucksacks, or punching bags, which appear to have their tiny whiskers made of skin, drawing blood from within the nearest attachment. Parasitical Hareths.

Long pipeline piece attached to a another one that's being diagonally curved at an angle of ninety five degrees, leading to the attachment of a man's throat, acting invariably against him as it draws out tiny specs of brain tumors along his well-worn out and healthy neurons.

Tall dark humanoid whose head looked like a cradle-which drew on both sides, many a pie-shapes that melted out its eyes.

Largely deformed plant, the shrubbery in which be it encased seemingly wide-spread like a barbed-wire wreathing around, while having within its every metal joint a living moving eye.

A large holograph-looking face stretched across, morbidly, a sheet-rack, slowly emerging from a small planted small device, akin to a printer, yet darker, ancient, and seemingly, nigh-destroyed by entry in its refuge.

Giant gait-moving legs that are attached to the ceiling, holes in the floor, allowing the filthy bloodied, cut-through legs to move the house within their own hell, leading to a small pool where blood was already coagulated, only so they might cross a sea of blood, hardened by the haze of a red steam and grow in red-filth.

Filthily degenerate knight, of which armor would be that of a small deformed child attached to another, rotting, attached to another foaming, as they combined, their skin hardened and upon being worn on by age, from their bodies a wrap of fur emerged, being only made out of tiny nails that gave on the illusion of such a thing being there.

Large line made out of eighty five spheres molded together at their touching surfaces. Eighveres.

Two sets of crisscrossed eighveres forming an x sign. Skin-edgveres melting and forming a pillar if seen from below.

Dreadful cattle having eighveres pushed down their open heads, forming a myriad of deformed bodies.

Head-eighveres laughing at each other as they inhabit planets.

Hard to define face, long on one side, curved like a fat pizza-slice pumped by an oil-can until it drags to one side, leaving an almost tumor-filled left side of the face bearing a giant eye on it, while the other side bears a single small eye that's the size of a quarter.

A Primary Motor Cortex seed from the side, curving even further in the air until it would create an upwardly curved metal rod, covered by red skin, surrounded by dark flies that cover each other up with liquid-smoke.

Large spherical cutting-tools, overly wrung and turned about eight-five degrees to the right.

Large deformed upper-head that has the imprint of a hand and forearm embed on it, replacing the lips and mouth in the same way a tire-iron would be pushed through a cattle's side. Static-eyes, deformed creature.

Large leg molted around its hill to look like a deltoid, seen from behind, a set of fingers pushing out of the toes. Between their symbiosis, large needle-like fat pushing out, hollow on the inside, spraying the ground with acidic hardening gas, the gas forming small tumor-like shaped nigh balloon primate-looking canine lepers.

Tail-prosthetic connected to the back of a limbless man whose head pushed out and exerts itself into twenty tiny globule-blisters that float around him, like a fish basin, trying to devour it.

Large boxes, spherical in diameter.

Eighty-hundred miles formed in crusts of contorted skin.

Large oak-house whose front looked like two crisscrossing swords held by two facing half-blocks which bore half smiles on each side, while the other halves were smaller, torn apart while pointing outside their eyes.

Chandlier with heads looming around them.

Botanic-substance that would burden itself with pus, Tanus.

Filthy disgusting organ that's shaped like conjoined twins, drawing out from beneath them as they would be planted like radishes in the ground, spreading around the floor as they would form the broth of the walls and the ground, decayed in part and filthily-spread. Attached to it.

Large creature, mammal-like, main trunk whale-like, turned vertically on a tail. A giant pair of oil-extractor-shapes long protrusions coming out of it, shooting out then stopping, as they would reach flat ends, kind of like pegs. The rest of the oil-extractors, as if to fill the gaps filled with small mammal-like bodies melted in the shape of the two legs. A head laying on top the trunk, that of a normal-long extended split in half open PVC pipe, with holes in it from which tiny long tubes pointed upwardly as cones, from which the top of their heads would draw outwardly into cones, each bearing eighteen eyes, rounded and counted, turned as well as the head. From behind it two wings could spread yet not normally. Instead they would drag and be pushed outwardly only from the base of the attachment where skin became mammal-like. Between the two tridimensional rectangles, bar-like grates would be pushed. Again, from the front of the mammal, a giant hole opening to reveal a cradle of human-children whose heads were those of black, deformed, twice-split horses, between the two of them, there being a lock-like hole which bore a single wax-like candles that were travelling from one side to another, not inside the mammal-trunk but to an unseen abyss that could not be neared. These horses would not be horses in plain, but only remotely looked like the weirdly deformed sculptures made by the utmost filthiest and nastiest amateurs.

As the features converged between the two of them, in the distance, one could almost make a replica of some poor imitation of a Rorschach test, but only if they stood still. These infants bearing no legs, instead they wore tubes of bone attached to the ribs of the creature, wrapped around and pushing through. From the back of the children, small compact-like anthills seemed to draw out, but stop, as they would bear no holes out, yet look as if they were inverted Spartan-shields that would bear, inside of them, smaller faces like that of the conjoined faces that would nib on the insides of the infants. Yet they bore no key-hole thing. The children's fingers would be pushed out-rightly, there in the distance, tied to the tinier mammalic shaped being that were being attached to the extractor shaped protrusions. Longer tongue-like heaps would come about and enter their legs, from the back of which, such creatures would bear giant ball-like spherical, largely squared punched in heads, until no features could be seen, bore along by long spectral-like figures made of skin, standing on the back of the mammal-trunk until they could not push themselves out no longer as they only dragged the sphere in and out like a bucket in a well, which only mean that the strings the humanoid shapes were pulling and pushing were actually more wire-like or made out of metal instead. For humanoids, standing on the back, drawing the spherical punched in head up and down, as a swing that was being slowly extended into a hole, or a bucket inside a well, despite there being no such thing inside the well.

Livid creatures such as there would group around and worship a dead-finger out of their disgraceful mindlessness.

Confusing music being shaped in clay, with each pitch rising one of the ends of the clay statuesque figure higher or lower in one direction.

The body of a severely abused woman whose head has been bashed and curb stomped until her lower jaw got dislocated, shooting through her lower side of her body, completely shattering her basin and cervix.

The upper side of her skull being ripped open as it would start floating in the air only to be split in half by the back side of her body from which a hive-like hybrid-man with the hand cartilage of a hand-axe split her head in half.

Large hand-bloated finger, whose fingernail encompassed the wrist of the malformed hand-finger, stopping it's growth a few inches away from the wrist. An opening beneath its breathless mouth, popping right out and pouring out filth-showers.

Large building-like studios, eighteen hundred miles per eighteen hundred.

Solid confusion, confusion that's solidified, senseless looking, in some way; not a single part of it making sense.

Legs-set of four, stuck together, walking.

Large moon with conical shapes all around its surface against which a castle levitated.

Stairway that's connected between one world to another, the one leading to the carpet, below to a laboratory.

Large legless automaton made out of cancer bulbs that have become pus-thrusters.

Large diametrical figure with a hump in the throat that's being used to choke itself before falling over as it would bash its head like a heavy sack.

Two monitored incisions from which pus comes out of.

A tower made of a robust giant overgrown tumor-filled infant whose deformed face grew and twisted in a horn, bearing many eyes twisted around it. Limbless thing of no grace.

Filthy long-tube pushing on through a sphere, a head that's been curved forward being placed at the end of the tube, while on the opposite direction, a pair of grates would reveal the hollowness it bore. Various skin-patches all worn out on both the tube, the head and the hairs. Hairs growing like lichens below, then spreading across the ground like some filthy moss. Bloody river of green-opaque, made out melted, churned and mixed bodies and other corpses, to their mix, various eyes that could be seen as plain.

Large pillar, made out of a set of two pieces, the first one would be static, the second one pushing towards the ceiling of a chamber of caved in-rock statuesque replica. Out of some of them, a few Renaissance-like figures being carved out of the material, marble-like, yet painted with such colors as if to render form into a blackish-green.

Filthy-men, hunched back, sub-human looking, noses piercing their shin, ties there, molded as if to look like the transparent sight, and the delight of vileness that was the exoskeleton of a dead animal.

Lamp, tall, rounded below, spherical at the head, growing like the trunk of a willow, lending onto many light-bulb shapes which are black inside the point of light, while glowing dimly with a blue in sight.

Twenty dead men piled one on top the other. Pushed through the bottom of a lane, as they would grow giant formation, lump-like, pushing through their faces until the heads had been ripped off and became a separate being. From which the long bean stalk-like growth would levitate into the air. From inside the throats, and the stacked barricade sack-like bodies, the coagulated blood that would come out of them would render them an unfashionable hill-like look from behind, yet pushing ahead as if bore the form of a wall completed by a line of coagulation before it started spreading around concavely.

Large typing keys, like that of typewriters penetrating fingers, leaving enough space to imprint a molecule-like organic cancer that could grow on anything, pushing tumor-pints that would dance around; filth growing inside of them, popping as they'd bring in some of the head-like balloon formations that would creep around and hide inside the framework of a great hall.

Long, deformed bridge made out of kidnapped people.

Small pair of eight entangled ropes, cord extensions wrapped in fur-skin on top of a weird pedestal standing near an eighteen hundred mile open throat that's being kept hanging in the air by large long thin hardened lumped needles.

Large locked box.

Giant deformed rooster that's being dissected. His various body parts would be split and ripped apart as they would become gelatin-like then pushed through with the help of giant iron-rods needed to breed with it. Its comb would turn and twist and shatter and push and round itself and grow while it would shape itself like a saw. Smaller ugly eye that would inflate like an almond, out of the orbit while cut through; beak deformedly pushed out, and twisted while slowly hybridizing itself into its wattles so it would deformed itself and become more robust, drawing in, face-pushed out, humanoid pox-like leper's throat. Many hackles being grow outwardly, crop on the right side drawing on as if to look like the large sphere. Breast drawn inwardly, this one not pulled out; while its thigh would start growing while advancing towards its toes but stopping at its spur. Toe nails twisted and curved, forming a C, then stopping. Sickly feathers ripped and pulled out of the frame in order to form circles or platters. Rooster-spine straightened, lungs pushing downward in order to form their long-line egg-like formations drawing inwardly towards the plain kidneys. Its gizzard ripped out of the body then replicated in order to form a greater structure.

A hen's gizzard-like formation molded around the crop as if to self-replicate over a few miles in the air in order to grow. On top of it a God-Tumor standing with its filthy dribbling hands dropped and wrapped around it.

Large federal government vault being cut through by a large deformed square-head that enters through a basin of skin only to find out that on the other side there's no money but human trafficking.

A living organ made out of the melted bodies of children traded in human trafficking.

The filthy embodiment of filthy degeneracy that appears to corrupt all into decadence, twisting everything through an uncanny amount of deadly malformation and quiet of speechless cut-through mouths; spilling in a small square room that's being filled with fleeting people.

Men without hope, their spirits largely forlorn because half of their bodies were cut through by large vases.

The passing of an angel through a frozen iceberg, leaving the hollow imprint of a long stretch of a billion miles, going through the structure of ice as it leaves trails and flocks of cone-angels; which the melting iron's still to come.

Largely deformed moving wall, eight o'clock, almost missed it, couldn't see a harder piece of dragging chain if it bobbed through your skull.

'Cut it off, you're hurting them.' Talking stick.

Dreadfully long prodding tool made out of coagulated pus. Twenty other consumed heads, amorphous to the main trunk from which they sprouted, spread outwardly as if harpoon shots came through their tops, spreading them around.

Obsession, prodding a woman's cunt with a cow-poker, deep enough to drop her fucking throat in and slam it against a wall.

A pair of collars attached to a girl's body and legs and hands, which are attached to a bunch of horses.

The living solid embodiment of sexual frustration, all manifested in a demolition ball, used to completely crush a female's sphincter in the most violent way possible, assuming she lived through the initial impact only to have her thrown around every side of the room and further made to suffer.

Large filth machine, rounded, as a metal stove that's been stretched as far as to fit the diameter of a coffin, from the greats of which a pus-cotton substance spills out, tongues between them sticking through.

A ninety-five degree rotated cup wrapped into a frozen-lagoon murky water muck.

Twinges wrapped around a beheaded, bebodyied neck.

Two apples infested with lice.

Eighteen fingernails connected with glue.

Slit throat on a scale of bones.

A giant globular eye clasped between four pints of tar.

Largely deformed glass fiber needle.

Large boiled men bearing tunnel boring machines. Need to use them to bear large tunnels in skin-chambers, underground run-holes.

Sandwich-build for weak unsustainable platform.

Concrete boxes.

Protruding, aircraft fastener.

Disgusting turbine-head cancer hope thrusting against wild dead-corroded human cast.

Large flatly deformed angler-body pierced in the head by long needles with pumps attached to them, fattening his skull.

Peculiarly-shaped dog-dome bounced around the room.

Large flying beast, shaped like the insides of a zeppelin, filled with transparent outer growths which would make it seem as if it's hiding through the pits.

Large tool used for abusing a woman's sphincter made out of the body of an elongated mole-shaped trunk, from which the side opened to reveal some large flaccidly melted knives, inflated at the girth that would enter and seal the wombs as they would force themselves in them.

Most objects float in an evil-empty void of darkness until further use of mental inquiry.

Dreadful antlers that are connected to a growth in the back, to which there lay attached some strange devices which were hanged.

Lower-Carpet

Something lay in the quarry. As strange as it had seemed, there would be no way to point at it either, without seeming likely to be lost on a whim. They listened to stone, those who worshipped the shrine as something of their own. And some would have to get enwrapped, twisted around their own guts and went but anything, absolutely anything but to be se there, worshipping that thing, without even realizing that there was but no way, they could not realize what put them up there, staring. As if their hearts and eyes worshipped two distinct things if two at all, they seemed to be long set on two perfectly rounded dead-watching beats as of drums, flowing as they would be but taken from the wild surroundings. Always of a mind to know, always watching, then. There, up there, it snowed once. But that was lost, the comprehension, it would be strange for there to be a gap. And it melted, hence summer came after that.

‘Oh, strange man, I am elated.’

This man's heart was but a sun. A tiny star that was chained, as was his gut; two stars in him, one even deeper, which was red, and one in his head, which would explain why he looked that way. A man, an off-shot off a torturing device, like the maiden of iron whose spikes would be gone in him, only to cause him to be struck, too ill for some time, now, his time was almost done.

‘Should we approach the strange being, that humanoid shrine and pray?’

‘For what reason might you think of it now? I see none and shall not remain. I'm not of a mind to start something but you must know.

I made it this far with you, my friend, Olllen-Manhuring, the whale.’

For his mammal was a primate with the head of a box that was shaped like a peg-cage made out of meat-parrots that were pushed through his biceps, dreading to come out as they struggled for air. It was way too hard for them to breathe that way, being broken and pushed around by the sun-steam that was being missed and messed with. No shroud could make one do and there was but that thing.

Truth he called it.

‘I wanted to thank you again, Ollen, for everything that’s happened between us. I think. I’m inclined to think that we won’t make it.’

‘Then we’ll die, Bow-Twitched.’

‘Bow-Thatch.’

‘A bow nonetheless, no matter whom you’re trying to impress, I’m just making sure you know this. I’ll always be here, regardless of what you’re trying to get yourself through.’

And with that set, they simply walked around the first edge of the enclosed area which lead to the stairs connected to the up-stretch, where the stairway stood, where they might go towards it, where they should. Or ought to in any case, it was just as dangerous and the shrine-creature was but not interested at all, as if it were not convenient by any means. It was all too pitiful yet they made it past the first floor.

‘Empty, but a fake carpet I see around.

Falsely blatant, it’s but an imitation.’

Either one of them approached. It was insignificant who it was that rose and went past, but they were of a mind that should make it so seem as if it would not matter. What they’ve seen through it was theirs, bearing the mark of the grabber. Largely set, the body of a fighter-dead, who wore everything the carpet threw at him, as he would only fight with chin to chin looking glass, and would smash and crush through everything, at last, he came to ask them.

‘Why’d you come here for?’

‘We thought you’d be here. And we considered bringing you something you might eat, devour, shower us with the blood you have acquired from those you killed.’

He had. They were soaked, both of them unable to repay any mind and any of the matter that might even remotely be considered as theirs. It was all too unnerving, being there to listen.

A false man appeared to draw in. As peculiar as it seemed, he hadn’t come from below, but from the ceiling, as if he hadn’t come in terms with what was going on but merely, after the kind, blinded himself as he shouted, lime of eyes, he was but a man whose lower body, arms were metal shafts, forcefully decayed as he was put in the wrong spot, always trying himself and always listening to the wrong things that entered his mind.

He was but the Pagan-beggar, heart of decay. Body of decay, mind as they say.

Splattering as he spoke in the most unnatural sense, if any could be allowed so.

He but came out of his way, and stopped as to allow his. Bad habits, they were but trying to out-do each other with slipping fingers in each other's drinks.

'When have we been served?'

'There was a strange peculiar waiter that appeared out of nowhere, he's at fault, I know it so. He's at fault, we need to kill him so before he's getting back at us.'

'But where?'

'Here, there, I think I understand.'

But they could only look into their drinking glasses while understanding it so.

They were but drinking of a most peculiar thing. It looked as if one of them drank from the body of Yyork, a creature that was worshipped by mold. Another one was but drinking of a strange peculiar tar-globe, which only came to him en pass. The others were but drinking pure disease.

'The carpet is but making fun of us, it's but of a mind that's mindlessness has us turned.'

'We cannot settle with it uncannily, we have to pull it down and mourn.'

But they could not help it, before they came. To such a realization as the likes of which might drag the reins and have them so. Slit their throats as one would know of the ever presence that was drawing near. All of them inside the room, impale through throat and swoon, for every slice of quiet was but lost.

Peculiarly robust bodies that push out, filthy and put out by an unnatural thing growth. Many rows of heads that'd been defiled, forming large bloated shaped that would start floating and spreading on every possible space. They would form bodies that are larger and would push themselves as if to resemble, note be told, from inside the peculiar throats inside of which many of them would twitch every now and then, while pushing out, beneath them. Large sacks and plenty-watched, inside of them better latched upon their small finger-like long formations on top of which they'd eat and spread until the filth would remain below them in shape of solid pools.

There would be a distance between the head and the peculiar torsos which would start forcing everything inside of their malignant repulsive traits as well as limbs that appeared out of nowhere, large cutters, and eyes that are bloated and compact. Hugely tinted specs and formations of unnatural rope-veins that entered them along other things.

They would be followed around by the bodies of black specks, or termite-head shapes that would be molded on top of eight winged, all around fat twists that would wriggle around like rat tails. Following through they would be. It was all too quiet and wildly set. They were but trying themselves to eat and spare, ease of chance. Filthy pores spreading out of them, never knowing.

Various filth head, like unnatural things, grown until they could but face themselves off, like mounds from which rose large tube-like formation but stopped and split in halves as to be spread like hardened diamond sheets of skin and bones and the most unnatural thing of all which was the head, or the image of a head which appeared everywhere around but could never be pinned on since it purposefully attempted to eat and spread like a disease.

He was large headed and appeared to bear, at least eighteen more heads at the back of each head, at the throat-opening verdure which had been created inside his head, that expanded until it had become the world they all walked upon. And the tiny body upon which it had once been encased upon no longer existed and would only wreath about during the last moments of its existence, long destroyed from the looks of it.

Land oh, land of which you're made. Peculiar things that enter thee, of which I would loathe to satiate, little more, oh little more could be recounted. Of what entered thee dumbfounded. Little buildings lay there, not on a ground that was flat, but one that was twisted upon a crass. A thing that would look largely if not protruding yet alive, fashioned as if to be surrounded and would be put past one side. Another one up-headed, knowing and would to be, yet diseased, latching upon little marks. Diseased large camps standing in the shape of eighteen orangutans-poles curved on a seventy-five degree mark, holding upon descending domes, blooming upon a point where an obelisk would shove from inside the blooming ball held by them. At the top of a the obelisk lay a pair of four-sided watchers which bore their eyes cut as if surrounded by a metal band which had pushed through their skulls. Deeper through until they could no longer feel the sinew of the counting, their mouths but sealed while pushing out. Wreathing about in quiet as they could not recall what was going on. Despite being open mouthed, the looks would only make it seem like someone had dislocated them on a whim, covering with coagulation, until the holes inside of them looked like bloody worm-tunnels or the entrails left of diseased cattle.

Though their noses would point out, they'd look like large throats that would to be the length of their spine, pushed as if to form a strange concave form as it would connect with the obelisk of skin, leading to the ball and the poles. Wrapped by what appeared to be veins coming out of the nose-throats they'd extend and spread across the land only to be seen from the distance as if presented in specks of blue. But sometimes during the dark, in their dark shapes, which covered their eyes, one could see almost feline-shape eyes of a deep yellow, one on each side. Always transmitting information to the blood-ones who'd dove into the rock-like shapes in which the largely hyper-aggressive form of a field grew. From the spikes and the outlandish looks of the small tribes of meat that came from inside of them, only a few of them could be seen. Unworthy of disease as they fed themselves the film of camera-like filth.

'I had enough of living here. Why must I suffer in this land?'

Manno Filthde, remnant of the past spoke. He was but here at a cost and would only fill everything with an uncanny disease not even he could be forced to forget. Always on his mind now, always pushing what he had in his guttural thing which was distraught.

There was another house near him, in which a serpent with the head of other eight serpents, which formed an ant-trap formation came to be. At the end of each wreathing head, there being a single block of wood in which there stood, written the eyes of everyone who had died nearby in fealty. Of which he would not abide to. Always smashing and bashing the heads of little children whom were lost here. And there and most peculiar things happened.

Ground, the ground was pushed on, it was pushed forward, sometimes the bumps would look like they were birthing planets of suns or something similar to them until they could not be helped.

Little glutton with a long-thin neck which only kept an eye on top of it, standing near a giant square, from which there stooped out a giant fat-creature as well, with stumps instead of arms and a head with only pucker eyes, infantile things, like pudding broken thumb-holes put in, sometimes sticking out, but very much alive, a mouth of wreathing devices and fire-makers as well as a flat head which bore small electrical stove circles which started pouring gas tout. And the machines were but of cartilage, as nothing else would seem to suffice. There was a large throat which floated around them from time to time.

Myroat Flime, was but a king in mind.

Uncouth but would to be walked.

He lived in a cane-like structure which was enwrapped, every few miles and such in cans of mean which would seethe from the holes inside of them, from which sprouted a liquid filled with pure disease and billions of viruses that would be spread across the plains. No one would be forced to lay anywhere and no one would be spared by what happened there. It was their fate to look everywhere and would no longer understand. What happened after was but scum of earth and would to be the dark patches which appeared in chrome-dirt among other crystalline cysts which grew in pierced tucks. And bloated trunks that moved around the ground.

Teal was but here and there, of a dark red and purple that would spread between magentas and rounded pucks of black. Thrones of violet and orange specks, organ-textures across each edge, pushed around and would to be. Formed cacti-like things of which hairs bore smaller heads the size of little meat-flies of which black wings were that of men, split to be precise.

Of what went on neither of them could understand or what happened to the space of blue-charade and of a deeper hued velvet-green, while the aurora that followed brought but an olive look and plenty of light colors that would almost spread to a white. Various pastel-like or airbrushed crisp strikes where they spread and where the light died.

They would sometimes be seen.

Figures that would hold within them hands that were long and curved towards their chests, nerved and prone to push away, in order to self-punish and feel pain. And they would barely be seen after, as the dead was assimilated by the ground, drawn in and left to die. Allowed to watch as flat-creatures or death-masks.

The shape of a thrown-tantrum came out of its wreathed out hole. Where he lived, there used to be a house, now it was no more.

They looked upon the head, upon the top of many limps that would shake him dead. Many malformed attendees morphed into the structure, though no limbs could be seen after. They were but the coils which connected to the mass on top, eleven hundred thousand tetrahedrons sprouting as they'd keep growing, with spindly feet-like hairs always twisted at a joint. Segmented until they made the top of each head rise and be thrown around until they stopped rising, only to be brought on to the pool where melting. It occurred to them, seething in the chains, inside of it but a hollow finger-lobe of which throng but swallowed dead. Large rotating mechanisms would work and devour as their mechanical mouths could not admire what went on. Every single time they would shout as their echoes would take but every life that lay beyond them. Standing on high-flat surfaces which looked like latched upon one-another images taken of the moon. Yet still flat-despite appearance, as they would but create this deformed illusion from the distance, swooped. At the lower side but eight body followed through, poised in every direction, two at a time. No arms either, but coming from inside the mass. And they would stand behind the limbs which hardened as to trap them as grates, never to allow such misery to push around. They would but feel the stings and various benign thorns enter their hands and arms. Always of an unkind manner, not too filthy but brought into a manner, it ate but all and would but destroy all. If not toy with every living thing as gods, head were present, feature were not. And although their trunks stretched and curved, and although hidden by the area that could barely be seen as well, there was something to them. Not coiled-of them, like snakes, but beneath them lay openings as if vivisections were made, only to reveal nothing, open blind curtains that had naught in them. Yet stretched as human chests, bearing, one if four, but strange erected diamond crests, of crystalline formations, from which pushed away strange bands that entered in their still-stretched lower sides; although these metallic parts could be seen from the distance and they did leave a key-like hole whence they were drawn out from inside the lower side of the mass, it could not be alleged for them to be drawn from inside. The mechanism working upon the finger-lobe was different than the one attached to the beings below. But they seemed to bear mouths open on both sides of their faces, not on the front. Dirty-looking, fish-teeth that vaguely resembled simians would throw around, be rotten away, until there was to be little hope to satiate what went on.

Little gut-man with a knife, wearing his head-scarf backward to prevent others seeing an open-wound that seemed to resemble a scar, though it was not so in reality, as his head shone every time the gut-man was hurt or would near pain. Dead-stains on his face.

There were eighteen people, all of whom were torn, their shapes but started melting as they'd form a cast against one another, forming but a sting, or worn our tail, flaccidly standing by the side. As this process was repeated with eighteen more people, several times, a forest was made out of them. From their hairs, dripped, their nails but wept, as they formed a landmark of dark surroundings. This tar would be receding in, and dwelling deeper, in darker hairy caverns they would be given birth within the wombs beneath the flaccid stings. Always but forming themselves in unnatural winks, of which the mind of man would see, deformed. As if myopia had made one fantasize of psychosis born-nightmares, made out of unnatural things, attached from below and around them, at the price of not making past the whim of a false birth; they would settle with their own.

Large inflated peculiar head which drew on the body inwardly only to have it grow inside of the giant blimp-transparent low-brained arch as a giant with a stump instead of a working throat and neck. Rotten inside and left for dead once his skull popped off. It just had to be that way with some.

A fat gangster, with a fine suit, a red tie dragged around his neck, and the belly of a fridge reaching around his cruel boot, made out of a repurposed cemetery. Tombstone, cement, bones, jewelry, wood, a wedding ring on a toe, and the briar which pushed around him, with the skull; his chest but a sutured baboon with a giant eye torn inside of it and a gloom flat tube entering him from one side to the other. A robe of disease hanging upon his kite brothel, where kite men spent their time doing, what they did inside of it.

Large structures looking like cutout gangrene spreading on a foot, planted in the earth, allowed to grow, then wrapped around, and held on top of it, a body of a city's boom and spread. Empty dead surroundings, drawn like large burnt halves of paper sheet transparent winds paired in threes that draw towards large sky-vortexes made out of storm clouds without the storms. Peculiar rotations that make the winds look flat, as if they are actually transparent papers that were turned and twisted around until they cannot be helped no longer.

A standing giganitic-giant whose face is but covered in molds of his arms, stuck without legs in a floating citadel made out of a rotten-eaten planet, chunked as in an apple where the seeds are but its exposed cores.

A few more bolts, entered the large surface crafted below its wild stretch, billion of miles ahead until it had made the curved angle where the fall was put. Placed upon it stood but a shrine that was uncanny and would be turned to boot; depressed in the ground but darted, always of an evil thing, started, with but a single flute thrown around, there lay but a diseased child that died in its own arms and became a strange formation of four serpentine, tablets at their heads, where his head, arms, leg, while the last one was out there, slowly advancing through his belly towards its head, had become a horn. It spewed the most uncannily worn-out children of flies, which moved on and past the shoulders they ate on the first thing that flew in front of them. It was but a piece of veiled veil, a pipe as well as a tube with two handles that were become as strongly flattened as they should or ought to. Smaller pints from every side coming to form contraptions of mouth which ate everything they could until they spat out.

Tiny block-man with a piece of skin rotated as a wrap around his body, spiked.

Peculiarly deformed long-legged manifold ant-folded bodies attached as a standard card reflected in a mirror, where the mirror was present as a mold of the creatures, but not acting like a mirror unless the hardened bust that came out of the other side was shined and cleaned off. From its side, there coming but a strange horn which encompasses his arm, leg and half of his chest, a leg being seen dangling down from his humanoid caught in form. And while there are a few legs present as well, the main structure between the folded ant-bodies, there appeared to be only a trunk leading down, through the earth, where they pushed through to a land that's made of largely pushed out girths.

He walked upon little legs that weren't his, but were of a long humanoid whose upper-form long stretched was worn like trousers by a long fiend, the head of a disastrous sight, immortalized, as that of a train driving into a wall instead of pulling off the breaks. Splitting in the middle then expanding forth, with little brain-like mazes leading to two formed hard blocks of mass, where the face of the giant-creature was split in half; little incisors always protruding out like flaccid hoses that would be dragged as it pushed on, for a few more moments they could not get how they were but entering in it. Large unfathomable stacked clusters in the back of large lumped darkly spread bodies which bore funnel-tremor drawing brood pints that were shoved in its face as they ate from it. This unfathomably long stretched body would walk for hours.

Large triangular shape, seen from above, going down eighteen by eighteen by two meters, with a depth of a million miles down, with an exoskeleton forming every twenty or so miles, lifting itself on every side, as the cartilage emerged until they formed stoppers as if they were made to prevent a peculiarly shaped object from falling down before they receded in. Small hairs coming out and they would be much closer to car-stoppers than anything else, of a white-pigmentation or that of a dirty bone which presented itself with the same kind of texture, instead of the dilapidated shape it had set itself to be.

Strange ugly sphere, with little ugly man inside of it, who's staring as dead rats.

Little forth in the middle of nowhere, standing near a canopy's shadow, in view of a peculiar fleet that's driven from the distance, towards a single destroyed-man whose face was torn to shreds.

Dreaded termination date; it was bound to approach one day. Oh, such vile reveries, how could one think of you without dreading but a touch? And how could he wait and lay aside whatever turned him into a human in the first place, as well as he could but be set in trance? Written on a four by four note.

The planet itself was made out of billion of bodies that were put together and made the ground. Some were shaped like giant mammoth-like bulks that were attached to one another, with long finger-like extensions that acted like sutures that would be put and wrapped around. Others were unnatural-pipe-like bodies that were accompanied by bulk-heads of centipede extractors that would eat from one another in the most dreadful manner. Long hills that were but antler-claws which wreathed back and forth as the opening of jaws occurred.

And the first buildings were placed from the insides and wore fat-bulks of growths attached with little spider-like abdomen fat-like formations placed on top of one another with every additional one placed on top the other being much smaller than the other one. There was also a peculiar little incest insect with two beads that were open on both sides of the head.

Machine-gun people whom were molded in skin-tank-like figures which shot little flaccid cigarette-formations that pouted out of themselves and drew out as they become small flying demon-like figures that had their backs evolve in fat-like deposits which were shaped like the planet itself, which wasn't an oblong as from every side and every corner there would be various depressions as well as peculiar brain-lobotomy shaped traction that grew along the specks of steel-shaped nothing.

Long-formed peculiar antennae coming out of a conjoined pear and apple shaped body, from the top of which it grew until it spread in a giant formation akin to a pair of overlapping bodies and boxes that are unaligned at most times as to give the impression of there being hundreds of eyes, faces, fingers and arms, until a perfect mold was being cast. An opening as of a giant ninety five degree counter clockwise eye which had been pushed in as to leave a canal-like depression in, from which many worm-like edges, crisp, look like tiny teeth that push in and out, leading inwardly to a small bobbling sphere mongrellic-anchor made out of tiny string-set organs that pump in and out until the final point where they cannot do it any longer approached. They are long and fat and only stay about for a few hours before receding back in.

From the apple-pear shaped body, below it, not roots, although they would seem like roots, in actuality, cord-like legs that are spread, and draw in and out, up and down, static almost, with the exception of the soles of their feet which draw and push away, achieving movement only through some attachments beneath and above which curve the air, dragging themselves along. But the humanoid forms don't last for long, as they become more deformed over time. Almost bloated, almost filled with tumor bile which give them appearance such as hunch-backs in their biceps, triceps, and forearms, as to accumulate weird molds, their fingers wrought in, fat attained, obesity of grains as the creature would develop no longer a skull of a man, but a peculiar elongated, inwardly, as in the body, spread, to have the eye-socket shape push out of the chest and out of the boxes, the nose through the stomach, the mouth would endure cut through and spread through the legs. The legs hanging out of their chests as well as they reveal no ankles any longer, but some peculiar two mirror feet that never face one another, at the bottom of which, rows of teeth-like protrusions, almost canine in nature, drawing in and out until no longer being stable.

A pair of growths in the back as well as to make up for the weight, forming pseudo-looking legs that drag in and out until the place is made about to fill the filaments with disgust.

There were stretched of plains upon which rectangular-fence like structures stood around, sutured to giant holding blocs of stone that were plain then curved further on to strange ear-like canals, where there pushed a few head-long racks, inside of which drove little plain regular twisted horns that wrapped themselves around like peculiarly deformed shoe-horns. A town was kept inside of it, and many a buildings that were akin to a house of disease. Where there stood but the jewel of flesh, which was but a pair of stone-like put together man curved inside them and shone. Fragmented torn apart fleece, flayed apart, then put to sleep.

The creature that assaulted us bore a grand open body, which had its rib-cage largely exposed, out of which drooped uncannily set through, deepened cocoon-globes where there lain, in their grasps, most peculiarly shrouded people that were put in deep tombs. Most of its back was completely overshadowed by the building in which it resided in. Many of its legs were put behind and taken for pillars that the party which improperly addressed the creature, as, they appeared to be out of it seemed to be impressed with. The lower side of every foot and every stepping-like stone was but a highly circular stepping stone, upon which their screaming faces were forever encased after. It housed them in the hollows of its cavernous bile. They stood inside of it for many days and appeared to slowly be broken apart, dissolved in the acid it produced.

The thorns surrounding it in the dark were its hairs, pushing out as they but deepened both ways, in and out, going even deeper than before as they merely protruded both ways. They sunk their fangs within their marks. But even such a creature, in the depths of its darkened holds had dared not pass its worship, of a god that rose before it.

It bowed down, as far as it could, to a deformed crystalline formation that was but many contortionists wrapped together, forming but a bowing motion. Many of the creatures attached, of hairs alike, charcoal darkened. Its eyes were rounded, globular-protruding. Their irises were like drops of water if they fell from inside their sockets, inside of which, there stood largely deformed cylindrical-segmented toweresque organs that pumped colors in them, while being surrounded by little tape-worm like red veins that connected to them at various points in it. These eyes were only of four different spots in the front, underneath a tank-like opening, which only lifted itself in the middle, where they stood, underneath a single push-in emptiness. Below the body lay the mouths. Whatever it ate, entered through the tower-irises where they stored all the food, carried by the veins and put aside. Upon both sides of the creature, two giant wing-like protrusions came out, formed out of the uncouth bodies of sinners whom had died and were pulled from above the ceiling.

The first gigantic creature only worshipped it because of the peculiar way in which it prayed. With every word every single mouth, regardless of its size it came into made images appear on every surface around them, or at the very least whichever surface there stood there, unfound.

Peculiar deformations of wriggling cocoon-men on every side, melted, time and time again; a few sinners emerged, when the god had turned on its back, revealed the strange multiple body-sutured mouths that fully opened as to revel elliptically open-mouths in which they leaped in and died. Completely eaten after, then absorbed into the main mass.

The room in which they stood was enormous, never ending, all too stretched on every side.

Bridled by one of the standing pillars, it hung. About the place, this diseased animal kept drawing on its leprous leashes as they foamed out its mouth. Its one eye suddenly relapsed in a large concave depression that laid inside its pistachio-shaped hardened skull. Tumor grotesque heaving wings beyond each sprouting head, that came out of the cracks inside the exposures that lay behind the eye as well. Beneath it but a cradle of legs, black and seemingly infinite as well; which only hid the dark device; as peculiar as a telescope which bore a single long-protruding face, human-like, mouth-open, and there he puked but a long sting that lay broken. A tail such as that of a scorpion like, segmented with apple-fruit fat, but pink as him. Inside of which there lay his children. He had used this strange device to impregnate, a woman that stood and awaited him, then he crept closer, ripping her in halves, then out of her way came all the washed-up ovaries as well as her womb. Therefore planted inside of him that he might, should create another long lasting generation; but the sting was shaped, seen from the front, as an open umbrella, which only solidified with each drip. Outlandish dirt-skinned growths across its body, leashes of their own, each bearing dead cries; they called for the others, feeling their disgust.

A large pair of domes, placed on a flattened lobe, or at least flattened on top and the bottom as to be a box. Each dome slightly opened as to reveal long standing arms, bent around the curvature, each of them carrying sutured lips that were shaped like frowns and smiles; with little nails coming out their tongues.

Peculiar tendon growing on his back, leading to a giant battery shaped container made out of a folded human. His mouth but the tip, attached, a long lose leading to a dark bird cage machine, that's cut. Between each half, the torso of a gorilla-like creature wreathing in pain, after that; wheels at the bottom reaching in. Chains wrapped around the primate as to hold the battery. The hose leading inside the cage; liquid uninterrupted, body hollow but still sprouted. Behind it, a line of similar creatures following through, all but guided by a gut-shaped device floating in the air, chained around the dome of the ceiling, pushed through, they pace around the place for it.

Large humanoid creature, with many pairs of attached to him muscles; biceps-growths on top his forearms, neck, face, at least two or three overlapping one another, as to form two barrels in girth, making it impossible for it to move along. A bubble of barrels formed out of the biceps, all stacked on top his head, dragging him down, his throat but snapped, flaccidly hanging afterwards, dead.

Attached to him an arm that was wrapped around, by many snake-formed cysts that draw inside of them meat. From around the general zone where he stays, meat wrought around the halls, standing.

Large pillars of meat, curved at the top like a hook which ends not in a point but in a small maw. With little worms chewing one another, spouting blood. These are drawing blood from the gutter-sewers.

Grates seen in an underground butcher's room; crimson swear but leading to the veins around each gable that's shook, small cages made out of iron-black. Where little burnt children swing from side to side; chained to them a chair is laid in the middle of the room, where spikes are being drawn out of a small row of holes. Deep inside their drop, little wrought-up burnt toe-screws drawn out, which are wrapped around to hold the spikes.

Four elephant bellies placed equally distant from one another, facing the ceiling, from inside of them, little angler-fish light-stalks coming out, connecting them in the middle, to a peculiar yellow mass. Inside of which tadpole-faced humans are swimming by. Hanson stumbled upon the middle growth upon being lead to it by one of the elevators he's taken. He had gone through the insides of a giant dead-god in order to get to it. He stood there for a while waiting, focusing on the yellow-bulk. Trying his best to sketch it until he had done it; having realized, with every side of the bulk he's gotten through, his trained eyes observed only a fair amount of egg-like sacks which formed it, as far as he could touch its nerves. Squeamish as well, moist, around the rims.

Disgusting node, of many growths, attached as segment many probes. Despite its length, it was barely recognizable any longer, having every antennae and every little radio-receptor drawing out of it, being lifted out, this metal-bloated caterpillar bore but a screen about the meter, talking. Old recordings fashioned of each dead man stored inside each probe as well. The rails, legs and bands were at the end, in the back, where they formed a great crate filled with cords and androids that were pulled from about each corner of the sea.

Strange house of torture standing, at least eight floors in height; the ninth floor but pushing out of the last one, revealing a square-shaped shadow to the front door, if the sun is up. Streams of energy erupting from both windows strapped on every side, both directions forming like pass-through transparent lights dissipating in the air. A giant tower in the back, shaped like a silo connected to the inner electrical appliance in the back, leading to a dead-rotten end. Every wall encased in metal plates.

A few meters away from it stood a bottle formed watchtower, with a cap being a metal funnel which held but a strangely high-roofed ancient stone house. Many sculptures whose begging hands hold cylinders that are curved towards the top, where ball-shaped growths of gore-sacks hold little flare-gun shapes on every side.

Eighteen moving houses, ringed like worms, cylindrically rounded at the middle where the band goes, spinning them as well. The middle device but a fat wheel upon a pole, four more a few meters away, forming livers if seen from above. Peculiar device, it were, as there was always contact between the fat wheel and the building when it crossed around the middle as well as along the liver-line.

Filthy room, with skin-bulbs coming out the ground; growths like men without the means of working, yapping their mouths all day, constantly being intoxicated by canine-smell.

Two humanoids conjoined at the top of their heads, no sockets any longer, forming an abstract looking pillar of fighting-to-get-out parasites and beds.

People were dragged along metal rains as they were being impaled through their open sphincters by tri-shaped hook-machines made out of cartilage. Within a belted open ended stove-crushed. Through which they came out of squashed only to be put back together in a container that was put inside the back of a great dormant mutant whose back bears a hot-ironed square depression of a few centimeters, with a few spikes at the end of every centimeter.

Multiple-leveled walk about zones. A few rafts put together, leading down on a slope, a curve, then deeper down. Held together, standing by long trunks put together, marked at every side. Constantly pumped up and down, extending then retracting.

Pentagon-shaped platform, with a small metallic altar of boils in the middle, growing endlessly above; with every boil being as fat as a nine months pregnant woman's belly, bearing large contaminated beings that are being constantly dissolved. Reddened by the looks of which they are constantly being torn apart.

The grand city was but standing on a mount likened to a giant gorilla's mouth, incisors being the bridges, the ape choking on a grand hill holding a strange fortification of large towers, small-buildings, many flat-roofed, many looking like letter pressing machines, while others bearing themselves within stone-canopies of brown stone, shaped at the top like drawn within a storm roof-top or end of a palm. Twisted and encrusted like a shell used by a sea-crab. Many houses being closely entangled, and wrapped around chitin-soft wax-like melting left-over god-like remnants of which they killed, sliced in half as they adorned every side of their living quarters. Gables wrapped in dirt-brown salt-stone on a side, while the other looking as if a giant quarry-stone had grown inside of them, or the other way around. Carved statues of previous lords, busts as well as many open holes little empty-men crawled in, lamps within the streets with but-feet, held by angler-poles from within each corner of each standing house. Tiles placed sparsely. Clothed men in sand-carpets with small helmets wrapped around their bodies, belted, with iron clock-shaped gauntlets, nested. Giant fleas inside their chests, growing every now and then; and as many looked to the side they saw but flashes which changed the color of the town every few minutes, into darker hues. Blocked of dirt became but black soil, their skin but pale, as dead, the sky but a shade of blue-dead with petticoats floating, marked and wailed.

Hills shaped like cottage roofs. See-through doors like windows, bug nets to which little mines are attached. A minefield of bellies planted in the earth, exploding into puffs of red.

Mouthless people whom were melted around their chests, as to form trinkets around their collar bones; walked on strange triangular legs, the soles of their feet connecting at their dorsal bones as they stepped with the help of their knees.

Stranger bonded joints, inside a chest filled with lesser pointed heads that crawl inside of it. Large knife-like formation, stacked together in the hundreds, forming the upper-side of a funnel thrust outside the chest.

Strange knights emerged. They appeared to have hollow suits with the exception of their beheaded heads of which spines were but wrapped around the neck like mea-cords, an eye every five or so centimeter.

Giant field-mine shaped hatch-door placed on the floor, that elevated to reveal a sealed elevator leading to a lower chamber. Inside of it, a set of cut-out rail-mold, as for a container to be pushed through and brought down for storage; mine-chart most likely. Red-rusted iron with bolts everywhere around it. Standing in a dark room that's filled with dark-wooden pillars.

A crawling coffin-structure, the top of which connected to a melded tiny cartilage volcano from the top of which a pole of heads pushes out of it, all bearing their tongues out, at the end of which, dark wings buff constantly. Ugly noise, boisterously made by the wet coffin as it drags itself along. Soaked in some peculiar liquid that's allowing it to walk along; a strange concoction that reanimated toes and fingers, which attach themselves to structures like glue, placed underneath the rounded mount and the pseudo-diamond headed at the top rectangle that's dragged from behind. All the organs placed in the coffin-structure. A hole-pucker at the back, directly connected to the intestines.

Largely sealed creatures, darkened as the suits of gothic men, the heads of deformed mimes put through too much pain.

Weird city, seemingly made to look as if drawn in a five point perspective drawing, curved around a globe, where all the buildings point towards the middle cathedral which it raised as to be as tall as the Tower of Babel. Each building as hooked as a tooth, trying to enfold or swallow the structure. No entrance outside, no door in sight. Entry made through an underground staircase put in sewers, leading down to inversed normal building-like structures that are hollow on the inside, yet have leaping platforms put on every side that are to be jumped upon from side to side, or set in flight by strange hovering devices.

Peculiar sets of spikes on which people impale themselves against in order to be cured of disease. As soon as they move away from them, their wounds but heal.

Fire that burns the skin momentarily but then heals the skin as soon as the burns disappear; accompanied by water that causes starvation to occur and poison that's used to cure.

Knives that never leave cuts but steal blood from the organs once stabbed.

Trapdoors in the room, leading one into walls where they suffocate in a matter of hours.

The remnants of a fissure made into the earth, carved upon the fall of a great beast that's passed forth through a mountain and into a valley. Its body split, open, the ribs in view of the city as the beast lay with its belly throttled. Each rib bearing a chain, attached to a plane view-to sight platform as the body is dragged across the plains, then flight. A turned-around glider, beneath a city that's gone out of sight; above the clouds, with many stacks or clusters of building put in place, equally distance from one quarter to another. Set upon such heights, but twisted and crafted like some ancient calligraphy set that's wrapped around and set in stone, dark robed and wreathed in prolapsed cones. Large plain chains holding each roof-top, deformedly erect as the cones settle down, melting at each tip but spewing, little disease waves, always appearing filled with flying insides that breed upon the dead birds that are everywhere to be found, many heaps and many dead. Each corpse but serving as a reminder, as the flying beast is also rotten, poisoned as the colors show, dark grayish, also swaying, black puckers of their own. Patched-together men that wear carpets and veils, all sutured together with some animals of which their mouths would not appeal. Every organ used to spare. Those who die also remain. No one gets buried or thrown out.

Large amphibian creatures buried inside peculiarly strident mammals.

A giant table whose main facet is but a block of the eight men, their limbs but twisted for the legs. Yet the humanoids serve only in shape, for what were one to see inside of it, a robust peculiar blocked in red.

Every hallway leading to the candle-room, of blossoming little squirrel shapes of wax without heads.

Black teeth protruding out of a mouth that's missing skin between the jaw and the eyes sockets. An eyeless creature whose upper face is but a block of meat that's rounded at top as to be a small shell, its body protruding out of its top as well. Little wrapped around heads and cords put into every place and every hole that's ever emerged from the depths of its open wrung-about body, popped boils releasing trails of some burning blood that's hardened at the touch.

Heinous man made out of three of them, hand in hand, a mold that's dressed into a giant white suit, with bulk across each spine-contort. Shared between them a mouth, a belly, a pair of chests spared, but only two arms; with one in two legs being stretched in the opposite direction as to be three-times segmented instead of two, having grown or pushed out another calf. From their foreheads large rake-like skin protrusions expanding until they revealed a similar look to that of a Geisha's fan, yet the many tips continue moving like little worms that wriggle around. A giant open gushing wound behind them, from which root-like protrusions sprout outwardly, in a concave fashion as to form peculiar non-working wings that continue flapping nonetheless.

The top-body of a coated doctor attached to an inwardly pushed into a skin power strip from the giant worm-gripped coil he's connected, to which he's being pumped out of a giant cylinder with two bull-horns and decayed mediaeval spiked black wooden wheels that seem to carry him on forwardly. Followed around by a giant insect whose large head pushed onward as to form an upwardly curved slide that's eighteen meters set in height, leading to a huge split in half trunk, but only at the nipple area where two conjoined people seem to breathe, attached to the trunks not through the throats but through straws the girth of their very arms which sprout out of the split collar bones instead. Two throat areas open-ended, yet they are not the same ones that had been beheaded. The straws pushing through the back of their heads, yet, despite them not having bodies, they bear only peculiarly deformed enclosed mouth-shaped seed-like formations upon which they are attached instead. With every mouthed word a spittle.

Rape machine with a set of on-lain metal frames, shaped like a sixty-five degrees clockwise rotated C, where an open elevator where wrist and ankle claspers hold the victim in place before the initial insemination begins. A giant multiple-faced tube from which grinded meat-like protrusions carry them forward as their split-open heads reveal multiple phallic objects that set in a prone position. Both the frame and the grinder rotate across a cylindrical room, the metal bands keeping them in place or in a static position being shaped like an o for the grinder, and a peculiar c, of which rotation and recalibration is night impossible as a result of its very design, which betrays the angle in which it stopped. The default position that is to say the device being set in the middle of the room, making the c point upwards with the gap.

Peculiar Siamese-like female creature, that's only connected to the four other females by their legs, headless seemingly, while a caterpillar-like throat emerges out of their cunts, dragging along head-like crying-box mouths, many holes inside of which the sound is being constantly regurgitated upon torsions of organs that had attempted crawling outside of it. Large wings having shaped their arms until they will have become chain-like, attached to each corner of a malignant room.

Peculiar dirty pollution-filled room illusion on which little sleeping figures could be seen moving from one point to another, like static-images until their awakenings. Upon the event of their waking, their positions not only would change, but the person inside the room would have his head drawn forward, like a little rolling back, flatten at the top of his head as the brow and the hairline region would hybridize itself with the wall. Opening the top of his skull ever-so slightly as for them to crawl inside, with their two-dimension bodies slowly being broken apart until they will have become tiny red-black insects that will have left corrosive-sleeping chemicals into the man's body; which in turn would form his insides like termite-eaten hives, or deep caverns, the organs having been slowly led outside his chest, through little slits and little cuts made from inside out.

Through little puckers they would form tiny floating citadels out of the person's lungs, reproduction system, pancreas, lobes, gut, so on and so forth. Yet as they become fully away, the tapestry would soon fall off, broken in the pattern of a shattered window, revealing a bled-through wall that's decrepit, and broken-through. Where multiple rooms are lain behind one another, little dark people staring at the peculiar images with little dead eyes, the outer frame of clay that stood behind the tapestry slowly being rotten as the first laughing-frowning faces appear; their laughter being the final signal of the awakening having commenced. For their glow-rods and sticks will have drawn the clay away. The ripped-off tapestry would form little butterflies, ripping the rest of the body as they would finally be set on their way, each bearing a tiny-organ citadel where each sleeper bears a never-ending nightmare into eternity. As slowly the organs would hardened, liquefying the very air around them, seeing how their flight will have gotten them to a high-place in the kingdom, where the oxygen is contaminated with skin-molecules; and acid-growths of blood-spoiled little floating effigies that loom around.

Large bulk of clustered statues-sickened together, all holding their arms together, their heads bowed, their bodies-semi curled, forming a great oblong-like line. From every side, a worm-like wriggling moving segment of tiny rods emerging, as they spread around like concave-below of it, brazier-legs, upon which they would walk. A marble abomination of which human-faces start decaying, until they will have become a transition that's taken them from the Greek Tradition to Schizophrenic-like deformed abstractions of themselves, drooping everywhere like wax, as their hands will have not only become talons during their larval state, but as they will have entered their own bodies in order to form wild-head-like imitations as the very creature's forced to recreate itself from a decaying memory. Leading to even more deformed and wrongly-sculpted features that are somewhat even more senseless than they were before; until finally, their legs will have become bulks added to the growths, the little brazier-like legs having shattered under the weight, the bodies being completely forced down as marble become a scum-like skin. Which, progressively becomes even more tainted with every second, the imitation finally, under the likes of its decaying pseudo-human mind, has decide that it's time to become human. In which case, their shared gut become a guttural pool of worn-out deformed, non-attached innards that simply swim among fallen bones that are being dissolved with the rest of the formations that have fallen in the gastric acid. From marble-white to green-pale, with the pile having finally conveyed but an unsanitary look of untouchable pair of abandoned girths.

Large platform forming a crossed c' sections that are put upon hollow spots, billions of fissures underneath them, little sea-creatures laying dormant underneath, abandoned submarines filled with barnacles in the depths and at the feet of the fall, a most peculiar sight of the maze formed out of the interconnected paths on-lain down there, where the sea-creature hollows, little dens could be seen inside, making it appear as if the wall between each fissure bears a depths of at the very least eight hundred meters, in which the contortion occurs. The very sea-pressure forcing every sea-creature drawn by it to be molded into the very ceilings as they're being impaled. Little black-puddles finally emerging, caught within clusters of air-bubbles as they're delivered upon the shore, bearing their entrails.

From the black puddles emerging the great pyramid-tombs, in which dark-sea hills are lain dormant. A blue-iron such as that of a long abandoned cruiser forming its outer shell, the tomb slightly deformed as if to look like a Pharaoh's sarcophagus' holding cell. Upon it initial sight, the sight of bolts held upright upon a trail of many contorted lines, forming intercrossing x's, h's, u's, w's, f's, among many others, revealing a slight ruin-decay, from whence, upon the pained touch, unwrapped, beneath it, pushed aside comes out a great bulk of Hill-beings, which had been trapped inside since the release. Upon the pressure, when the ship was hit. And every valve turned, men being drawn beneath the anchor's girth. Until, from the sunken bulk, upon the bowels and the seafloor, there will have been no living creature and only they. Men would be lain, trapped inside the hill's remains. Until it will have drawn the shell, and whatever else laid upon the ship as well; always laying into hiding.

Can-shaped base of the building from which a bag-worn-by a man with see-through cut-out eyes for windows, at the top of which lay a great growth of skin made out of many put-together stacked leeches; all of one piece. Behind the two windows, in both apartments the lights are being turned off, hiding bloody butcher torture rooms with hooked chains hanging around each side of the walls, bouncing from across the ceiling despite air not being left in. On each of the building's side, through the cans emerge large root-like girthed growths that draw on the side and rot.

God's body thorn apart, lain a pair of swollen mounts. Ribs-exposed, humanoid, whose insides reveal but no organs within; but many other beings like him, all shaped differently, yet just like him. Like heaps of dead macrons, all but squirming from time to time. A horn erupting from his godly eye; his fingers curled 'round, like rooted little angler's rods, which fish but little men whom died, lynched erected, bleeding in a red sea. Open ended feet, which push away but crisp-burnt little feelers in dead-hands, to be wrapped around each end, then hide inside the ground, then die.

Static lightning catching rods, with a man's mouth attached near the tip of the stick, like a hick's travelling sack, within a rainy day, when the result is but a burnt end and a red splatter on the ground instead; horned roofs all around it, shark-heads but appearing in stone, where they live.

Red globes flowing everywhere in sight, all connected by interlocked glassy-rods that draw what little blood there is inside, which are placed upon a system of eighteen circled fire-stoves which force the pressured liquid into a peculiar spreading haze which emerged on top of an unsuspecting, looked-down-upon village. Where the peasants don't know of it anymore; their fears being manifested with every clove thrown outside.

Little disabled train-length skin-beast, of which hairs, if it were but a bear serve as a frame of reference for every tiny foot that came out of it, through which it brushed, like a strange sea-cucumber or a tiny puff that's being pushed through the miles, then allowed to push on, onward, until it's to be cast into the pit of decay. From whence it came, and where to stay when the little dark man comes with a big butcher's cleaver.

Large head that's blown around the edges, pushing through the outer edge of a jelly-grown surface upon which it's being stretched inside of as if the jelly was the ceiling and the head was but a puff of smoke blown by a French mademoiselle's, hardening as every single one of the flaccid peculiar side extension reveals itself as a chain-like holder, formed a cage as it connects to a brazier. On top of it but a pair of four overlapping sparrows molded together as to become unfathomably bloated, rabidly eating out of their own chests. Large concave deformities inside of them; standing erect; yet the sparrow-molds at hollow on the inside as to make way for large bridges leading inside of the, nothing sparrow-like to them with the exception of something vaguely recognizable as a beak.

The jelly-like caged brazier served as a holding levitating pillar to the peculiar dark bridges that led to it. Yet they weren't straight, but vertically flipped stretched on both sides v's if seen straight dead-on. Pushing onto in, along the rims of its every edge, large teeth-like formation, canine-like absurdly shaped as to look like the tip of hooks forming large arcs along the bridge's sides. At their tips upwardly pointing mantis-claws with feather-shaped emulations of flies, hundreds of them interconnected as to look like exaggerated hussar wings. Animated even as they flap around, being the cause of this peculiar flight. The bridges being constantly forced to draw downward to v's, as they're constantly being flipped upwards and downward, while the deformed human-faced creature trapped inside the cage-form cackles manically, chains creating wave like motions as the brazier-end is being pushed around.

The large growth of a giant pumpkin-like frame, holding a great air-ward stretch upon which standing a great cluster of hen-forms, put together, then split open in the middle, as a great curvature of grass-shaped root blades pull out, then curve around the base of the object, forming curtain-shaped flapping wings that beat air-like filth around them. Beneath the earth a giant pair of eight, equally spread on inclined planes copies of the main growth, with connected with one another in the middle, then around their frames, as they create a pseudo-cage, seen-through as they mold the dirt into skin-like growths that squirm while their initial flight from the nest occurs, with them pushing even deeper from where they are. Burying one another even farther than before; until they will have reached large tooth-gloves forming circles, all right handed, where the pinkie and the ring finger slight bend inwardly as to form a pseudo two dimensional eye that's filled with rotten meat and parasitical guttural worms that devour it.

His house was a tent placed on a dark platform that rested on eight legs. A stairway leading to the middle region and the entrance to the tent; their knees being bolted and moving, as the stairway wreathes around as a tongue. Two eyes on each side of the tent; behind which, an elongated human with sixteen arms, and the large head of a mammal-like growth that's pushing out into split sting with spike-like formations-drawn inwardly, as if the growth was pierced by them. A substance being seen inside of it, always dripping as from a never ending polluted river of green masses and filth-growths which form into flying fairy-like creatures with limbs in their eyes, mouths, they glow. Little puckers being shoved inside their deathless eyes.

Large book-shelf filled with body parts, which shift around. And with every few changes in place, they become even more highly acidic than before, contorting like abominations, until they form long-wreathed slugs that go all along the shelf-enclosure, yet no features on either end. They wreath there as they attempt to bite onto the walls, onto each side, deepening themselves as they drown in their own blood. Their features actually being inwardly place, blind as they are, tricked that they're eating meat from the outside, only to provoke internal hemorrhage before they stop wreathing and they're dead; then they decay, incapable of changing back into the meat-books that their elongated form had been initially compressed into.

The being bore itself exposed, from whence it rose, it seemed to have taken the form of the chasm, of this peculiar cut inside the earth, which had been protruding, and outwardly shot for some reason. Behind the hinges which pulled back, as it had drawn from beyond the earth as many of the creatures and the parasites that had hid beneath it, including two long-arm-blade shapes, creatures of which girth but formed its two wings, those dreadful things that could not be used for flight; but every few meters they bore large, great unfathomable to look at rods that launches themselves like worm-like tunnel-missiles like bullets shot in puddles of cast jelly, then filled, out of the molds they shot and wreathed in and out, beating every young at the end of these flailing things, until they were brought back to life. Grand being with no disgrace, as it erected itself outwardly, an opening from above cast upon the world a great belt that surrounded the moon, like a great tongue that licked it, from which it shook the satellite, breaking it to shatter, thereafter forming a dead end for this stalk of skin, at which end formed a great torso that served as the foundation for the emptiness inside the limbs that shook. Nothing inside but the living creatures it drew from earth and ate. But there popped but the strange face of a giant grown human, eventually of which features appeared on two, cheek-boned high, pushed from both sides horns which bore themselves two other faces like that of its own. Their teeth but large and white-like straws, the eyes but drawn out and horned as well, pointing to the mouth. From beneath the open-ended mass from which emerged, pulling out four great legs, like that of cripples men grabbing high-speeding cars as they're being dragged around the world, with their many segments, pushed at to look like they're made out of sixteen giant calves, outlandishly red, spiked and haired at the end of which a small malignant shrunken head, with long protruding cradle-boarded skull-like extensions of mouths which feed on the earth and draw on the crowds. Carried on by the mere force of the flightless wings, of which fart but pushed is over, acting upon the space-stalk as a string would act upon a kite. There in space, the three faces would bleed, out of their mouths, but frozen within; their straws but producing endless crimson spittle, blackening the skies. The great-mass being wrought inside, then pushed around until it will have become a dreadful opening with many longitudinal shots of spider-like spears that are still attached to the great bulk of mass, growing in fat as well with every cooling hot end that will have penetrated the mass of earth, impregnating every facet of dirt, only to give birth to largely deformed still-born humanoids with large heads of termite-like helmets filled with a lot of air, bearing large drinking horns on every side, as well as button-wreathed swollen-dead little abominations that swim in their own self-dissolving filth-pool they're left to rot in. Outwardly, the being encrusted by a peculiar hardening shell made to look outlandish, like a sea-cockroach, burnt-amber in color, with little textured bolt-like things leading to the empty holes from which the creatures that are wreathed through the great-tongue tunnel are being suffocated inside the air, as they're being brought over through endless masses that are completely killed and left to freeze in pseudo-forming spatial belts. For hours to no end, the songs echoing out of the mouths the three heads seem to bear, in their attempt to draw the rest of the body with them in space.

Humanoids with long crickets for heads, their long legs being connected to their arms by puppeteer like strings with molted-skin trails that pump meat inside of them. Legless even, as the men crawl upon giant fat-bloated tails that leave behind trails of eaten-limbs. The cricket head being shaped like deformed astronaut helmets, forming a small toweresque pillar from which flaccid phallic necked open black mouths vomit on the ground.

Catfish globe without the water-cast where it's stopped swimming in the middle, twisted its tail left, head on the right before the water was drained-cast, where the empty-fish fissure is filled with many thin-reeds of moving organic hairs.

The great head wore a single extension knuckle that could be pushed around. Largely concave, elongated at to look like a pole; the head being the center piece of the building, that being structured with many gaps and many hollow spots where the wind blew upon its bare non-existent chest that lay across every floor. But the knuckle looked as if it were segmented, having become somewhat, expectedly as such akin to a giant purple-finger, which at times contorted itself as to each one of the puckers that were lain in the middle of each segment. This head-horn-knuckle bore a set of fumigating mouths at its tip, having been nested in every pucker, raised on an inclined, then forming a p.

Large contorted ramps forming every wall inside a clean-room with four empty rectangular shaped polluted swimming pools, with large pipes inside of them moving along like eels, as animated as they are, dragging along screaming tv' boxes, with flower pot-sticks coming out of their antennae holes like breathing straws. The top of the room exposed to a frame shaped like an x if seen from the center on the walking space left between the pools, where one could see a cylindrical device filled with pumps as well as a large chain-textured rope that lowers the room. The rope being eaten around each edge, small mouths emerging from every side, spittle and droll slowly moving and dragging itself along as there's no end from where it sprouts out of. The end of the rope being shaped like an upturned J, with no point from where it came out of; beneath the room large crawling twisted legs that impale one another, shooting in every direction as their growth approached uncanny limits, having grown across every possible facet of every black building that's lain in the unlit cavern it's lain in. The leg-growths preventing the machine from fully falling over; while the J-rope is but connected to the legs through various unseen tendons that surround the walls that surround the pools, or the tiny space that's lain there.

There was a strange sphere they approached. It was made out of millions of interlocked pendulum circles, that shot black metallic beams all across the place. Most of them having already been wrapped and swallowed by every leg that crawled around the place, until they became somewhat indistinguishable from everything else. Peculiar breathing organs puffing their blood as some discolored smoke that's spread around in the most uncanny matter, revealing various never-before seen strands of steps that lead to an entrance in this forest of metal where everything's lain. For every step taken led further into it. As strange as it seemed, this gable-like stairway, once it was met at the middle of the forest, it began deviating, all around every single cluster-like formation of beams, spears or pendulum cylinders, from which leg-shaped steps took their place, stacking against one another, until they had been furthermore lead to the great swinging chamber. As they were drawn in by nothing more, and nothing other than the shaking leg-staircase which shot against itself, forming small building-formations that were pushed out of the edges of the growth-encased buildings, until these toweresque pylons lead to the top of the rope where they had simply leaped in.

If this entire black-city was filled with buildings, where every cylinder shot against the great never-ending ceiling, the pumping room would be in the middle of it, where many of the toweresque growths would point towards the rope, as they are tilted towards it, like arches, or deformed drawn on a curve arrows that, or waves of water.

As they entered the room they simply fell, where these sturdy men, if it were the case, took the full blunt force of the fall, were left with no fracture that might've ruined any lesser man. They slowly drew along, until they made the shapes out of water.

The screens having approached, with their incontestably peculiar sounds, that ought to have become incontestably, unfathomably ruinous at that point.

Speaking in word interpretations of ciphers that are placed there for no apparent reason; to which the men would record them, strike a hit, land a hook, then climb back out, leaping on the flight of leg-stairs, making their way back to where they had come out of.

A great domed gable roof, with two pegs on every side, forming overlapped metallic legs of h's stuck together on g's as well as two dimensional contours of birds and crucifixes put on top of one another, molded together, holding its outer-growths before they burst like springs, growing their heads into little orange peeled off things.

A great high-pointed gate within a rounded on the front, walled-off court leading to a tall castle, with enough towers, raised roofs and strange building shapes to push outwardly in the most peculiar manner possible. High-ledges and bridges and uncanny platforms and rots and floating pillars chained as well as floating stones on which royal tents are put on. The walls barring a barren sight that's lain on a great hill that's connected to a line of step-placed Isles, each placed higher than the other, connected with large planks and taken down trunks as well as peculiar bodies that are wrung about.

The main road faced of many stone-chewed faces, that have missing features, that are now filled with dirt. Large knights that are dressed like centaur-mammoths with large torso-growths instead of arms, hands, and limbs.

Meat-conductors and peculiar wagons driven through from inside the castle; the main room being placed beyond the opening that's lain on the ground, from which the wagon-mammoth organic sculptures are being pulled out of; all of which seem to be the people that are being housed inside the court, by the king. His throat being shaped like a giant spinning wheel, or at least the back of it, where his arms are impaled and spun; him being left with two stumps, as he stands upon a great stool-shaped almost iron-encased drum where little infantile beating against the walls creatures are stored inside. The stood being extended on both sides as to create half a bat-wing shaped metal stopped, that's hiding the sewage-wall-like grates which are hidden in nigh-plain sight.

From the king's point of view, he could see four cross-road-like slightly upwardly inclined raises which lead him to four greatly exposed rooms where peculiar statues that look like him are placed on copies of the similar stools. All made of some reflective materials, placed in outlandish rooms with many trinkets lain inside of them. As well as heaps of torture devices, wheeled parrot-cages with large iron picks constantly being shoved inside the wooden cages with the motions of reflex-checking doctors that are hitting knees with hammers, while the impalements resemble more like magician acts done upon their assistants.

Large dark heads coming out of a nose, shaped like the hands of little people trying to crawl out, most of which had stopped trying as it was already too late for them to escape, having suffocated inside.

Wrap-around-hands, around the throat of a woman; which had curved knives constantly being shoved inside of them, slowly cutting; falling through their guts, as they liquefy them, slowly descending until the women are bled dry.

Fuck-dry machines attached to their cunts, while sawing their lower-bodies in half, large phallic objects pushing through them until they're inflated, completely, bursting. With little knives coming out of their very long ends, forming pseudo-stopped frames like hack saws which withdraw from inside of them, allowing them to bleed like fountains.

Large unsanitary tube-like extension of a shooting-blade shaft that's pushed out of a giant man's chest, drawing every side of his body while shoving it into him, like back-fired upon guns that exploded his wrist and back. Dreadful like devices attached to its head, that wreath around, cutting and eating from each side of the crate his lobes are attached to. Large floating create that has brain-lobe strings pushing onto it, swallowed inside, outgrowing, slowly, the insides of their prison.

The peculiar city of Harrowing O. stood there. It was largely encased by an uncanny things attached to it. Every building was a wall creating a greater city-built tower that's wrapped around in a plastic-sheet like baby-monitor-filled device covered great submarine textured destroyer. Large push-through platforms that draw hidden buildings like tri-dimensional cardboard cut-outs that are put behind each of the swallowing mass beneath them.

Large man with two heads riding a slug-machine, a slug-car with little more than nothing on top of it.

Large board of wood that's eighty for centimeters by eighty five by forty by ten meters that's placed on top of a large table, that's the side of eight put together middle aged little old men that had decayed and formed, upon being chipped by an architect some peculiar altar upon which a scribe wrote with little pasty fingers, dark thoughts. Unnaturally dark skin electrons put inside the most unfathomably put-through, large heads that grow inside serpentine galleons that are used to fight the put-through meals, cut from the dark blood islands, where the thin giants eat from inside of.

Large segments forming u's, connected to from large put-together hills that are filled with billions of people inside, slowly being dissolved by the hill-gastric acid.

Peculiar head-like eater put inside a large, semi-devoured little canine-fat morbid man with large horn-like erections of meat at the back of his head, where they expand and push through until they create sweeping motions that are needed to eat everything in sight.

Large head, robust, put on a pile, eight piles put together as to form the size of a building, hooks attached to it which are being held by wild chains, all the chains being wrought in iron, their insides skin as well. Most uncanny of all, dark-shaped gelatin-like hollow floating objects the chains are attached to, mouths protruding out of them, toothless, shaped like four missiles in the back, which were thrown in the middle of the objects like throwing darts which hit their targets, growing ever more as to push even deeper than before. Uncanny things, dark-sets of crown-like floating circles around each protruding back-missile, from the looks of which, neither of them could be touched by any means. All of which would be set in uncanny flights, being taken from one distant spot to another, in the most dreadful ways. Large, peculiar obtrusions-like spikes drawing out of the heaps, then reeling back in, triangularly deformed holes they push back like worming unnaturally deformed, put through pain melting molds.

A large mask that's attached to a great floating body, no head that could be seen; the backside of the mask bearing his face, as he is but trapped inside for what seems to be an eternity form which he may never be woken up from. Closed eyes lain above the empty hollow spots of the mask. Obscure thing, a metal, almost featureless cover that's but wreathed in the most peculiar cuts, having largely wild diameters that are put through.

Dark moles around the head of a bubonic structure, made to look like a strange gothic-church in form, yet expanding in every direction as if it's a moth ball in actuality, largely deformed and put through a large chained funnel-growth that's filled on top, after the long-gut worm that's lead to it, with a mass filled with large umbilical sharp protrusions that hold giant floating men at each of their ends. Always growing, inflating and expanding.

Peculiar stopped-through, struck boxes, put on rails that are cast in the hallows of almost overlapped animal hangings. Worked by a large cradle-like things that are pushing inside of them.

Large uncanny yarn-fields that give birth to tube-barrels with large flaccid cacti-needles from which baby-torn apart creatures that are shaped like fat-bloated rakes that are put together, grown, fattened, having large termite-like heads at the top, without features from which sting-like trails go around every side of their bodies like come-out of their bodies stuffing that bears little olfactory systems as well as mouth-devices that are closer to being guitar-stings that are buried inside their own barely given birth to jaws than to normal ones. Looking like small rows or worms that enter a hole and come out of another, ever few centimeters, breaking food apart with the corrosion caused by the acid they're coated in or by mere pressure.

A bulked grunt-like creature, akin to a burly man, with his trunk burlier and higher, fatter than the rest of his body, having devoured his shoulders, tendons, arms, stopping atop the knees, having grown the back of the body as an eaten by a giant anaconda's throat protrusion from which trails of giant iron-needles come out, sprouting green liquids around. An uncanny speed to the creature as it simply runs around, unnaturally so, grabbing what it can, crushing objects underneath its giant palms. Eating through the corrosion-protruding little mounts; drawing out little hose-like showers which spray everything in sight, slowly breaking everything apart until one could not do with them around.

They could gnaw as much as they could out of the chunk, but it would never fall off, no matter how hard they tried, they could never penetrated the outer, nor the inner layer, regardless how hard they chew, regardless of their attempts and what happened for them to get themselves before the four. Larger oblongs made sure every bite would be handled properly, as with every chewing motion, the transparent energy that surrounded the main trunk would only make it so the organic meat would grow back in its place, always making so there was no difference between prior to the bite, and after it. A peculiar wrap-around touch could be observe nonetheless, the devouring thing being just a great jaundice-like growth, that added to the main form, a bloated pineapple that was darkened with growths, all flaccidly pushing away from their top, always drawing away as to grow even thicket with every passing moment until their filaments reached the ground, creating a forest of mirror-like flats which curved like carpet-rolls as soon as they touched the ground, molding themselves like prissy pushing rivers that began gnawing every time someone approached.

First the men with their hounds, as soon as they slickened them on these veiled arachnid-like dense sheets, the hours were quickly eaten, broken apart, snapped as to contort their bodies in halves, their bones slowly being spat out as the many billions of microscopic sized mouths began acting upon their bodies continuously. Their peculiar forms only adding to the miasma that started spreading from the lower organs it started pushing out. The chunk bearing an x-circle like opening that begins spreading exactly into four slices, when curl around the circular stops as they're withdrawn back in. Large mouthed full opening pucker-formed organs carried over like machine-hands and long oil extractor arms, that slowly move out of their way on the ground, rolls under them, filled with cartilage, having come from a giant, peculiar object, a hard embroidered jerky-head, and a pair of jerky legs that come into being. Indistinguishably so from anything ever observable; large crystal-box inside of with, bearing a crystal-man, that's slowly being ripped apart by most uncanny formations, incisor-blocky salmons shaped like claws, crystalline pink, fashioned to shine upon the weird formations that drag over the place. Unnatural forms flying around it. Nigh-invisible, like flying bloated trenched with peculiar dark-heads wrought to surround the most unnatural of lookers, all of which are tainted and barely put together, outwardly exceeding an unnatural force, a gloomy like filth-barrel wrought, elongated hose between them, constantly drooping as if it's being melted thoroughly. Always but a head ripped apart, grainy from the looks of it, always made to be put on the side, and eaten away. With every passing second but drawing them back into a larval state which makes them much easier to carry from one side to the other. Unnatural dead formations, as the cemetery of ships, floating in space, that's the only way one could describe this sight, if one were to see beyond their invisible cloaks. As they float around the place, nigh-dead, incapable of feeling, incapable of moving, always extracting from their own guts, spreading away the most unnatural looking distraught comet-like broken apart formations, organic looking in some way. Always drawing back to the outer nests that are the jerky long-bodied nests they seem to be dwelling inside of. In the inner depths of, what would be like hundreds upon hundreds or thousands of miles deeper in the main giant jerky head-like organ from which they sprouted out of, the crystal coffin being mainly avoided by the jerky daddy-long leg-like forms that push out from around it.

A kebabtermite-like nest came out of the depths, being pushed on top of a large coil, an unnatural wrought in tail, unnaturally shaped as to look like an explosion had taken place inside of it, throwing chunks everywhere around the place. Eight headed malformations coming out of it as they become more and more swollen with every passing moment.

Deformed canal, where little children's feet turn and puke out of mouths formed at their ends.

Little kernel-bolts of iron wrought around a great rounded body with plaster like substances put everywhere around it, holding it down. A peculiarly sculpted abstraction, as if the artist was unable to make up his decision whether or not he wanted to build a sphere or a cube, there being various edges that sprout from every angle upon its initial release, throwing out little unnatural forms and little bursts of rock everywhere around, if that were the case. With the exception that it is no rock, and this were but a bloated organic giant house, where stood a black-blue chitin door, opening like a crawl-inside-a-shell lobster, to reveal a tongue-like carpet, carved in teeth that look like statues, leading to an open room that looks like a second maw. The tongue reeling into a hole inside entrance to the second maw, it being but a large square on the floor, in front of the opening that's placed between the teeth-statues and the organic walls. Making it a short organic hallway that's straight, two walls on each side, leading to the rounded front that's a dead-end; yet as soon as one were to come inside and see that door-organ crawl back out as to block the entrance like a crawling unnatural creature, one were to do as much, see it as a largely raised organic bulk of a thumb. Relentlessly pushing around until it could no longer deal with itself growing, spreading and pushing into every possible direction. These teeth inside the almost two-dimension heart representation being different, more mobile, un-carved, easily allowed to move around and to become unnatural in their shape and peculiar form, alas.

The peculiar being that is the False-Martyr, a demigod-like figure, an unnaturally dead-looking thing, starved, strong, burly, his innards, despite his general starving-like nature, he would be more so, blessed with a never ending bulking sack that keeps breathing in and out, drawing in, eating everything, a peculiar anatomy to his power, no cords visible inside, all of his organs wrapped around peculiar net-encased moving innards fish-net worms, that drag his organs to safety, ever growing as to form cushions to his power, preventing an blade, any gun, bullet from ever reaching hit vital pumps, as they would act like safety-bags. No pupils in his eyes, only the flat-changing colors, scanty figure, always drooping like an ancient man. His blotched eye-crown being more of a large tumor-growth than an actual eye, the peculiar edges of each crown-tip being exactly shaped like curved, giant coyote incisors, or canines that are molded into that crown-growth, adding more to the general corpse-decayed figure that he was. Marked Cyrillic-robe, strange text written on it, indecipherable, yet capable of unwrapping itself like a parchment.

Dark unnatural form, many heaps thrown around the place until made to breed with their surroundings. Peculiar head-formations; washed up as they're being broken apart.

Small-raft that's adjustable as to raise itself a few feet in the air.

They lived in it, one of the giant hives, which was just about as wide-spread as peculiar overly wrought bowls that were set aside. There was no point from where they came out of or any signal they would come to a stop. For what was apparently twenty more minutes of growth, one could see a few unnatural thing attached to its back. Large protrusions starting from its back, appearing as if they were put together in the most unnatural manner, which came out of its back on top of.

Unnatural sets of heads that are barely put together on a two sided looped beam of metal that's been thrown around forming a peculiar arc that's twisted and lain on every side of a great tumor-like growth foundation put together, piece by piece.

A red room filled with many metal doors and many trap doors on the bottom that scream out of giant mouthed peculiar incisors that clasp whatever they can as they begin casting one another deeper into the black pits they've been taken out of. Large throats-open ended. Peculiarly strung unnatural hand-like shapes that carved humanoid guts as to be formless after a fashion as soon as they're made to be; small glutton creatures with large knee-shaped sacks coming out of embryo-shaped horns that are sprouted out of their heads pushing towards their open guts as if they're some iron bands or some unnaturally worsened things. A pair of dead eyes that are put together; from peculiarly partially absorbed bodies that begin eating one another.

Sack bodies that are but sutured together, belonging to blinded men that cannot help themselves but be made to suffer over and over again as large canines are forced out of their empty sockets. Unnaturally dead-strung pincers put around their throats.

A shared body made to look like the bulk of eighteen men.

And they felt just as little, to no more demise, what happened after, when they tried themselves and to have appeared in any other place. When they were listened to by utmost dreary creatures whom had sickened their teeth and would to be put to ask no question but to spare no more and what had happened there. They bore but little to no mind for what was going on.

A creature utmost benign, an amalgamation of many forms but listened to itself no more. Before it could be called upon such dam that was to be completely devoured; a powerless formation with many mouths put through an antennae that had been defiled and lynched about the men that hung.

‘I’m listening but I cannot obey. I’ve been here for too many days.’

‘Will you just stop pestering me already? Can’t you see that I’ve got nothing to do with you? I won’t have myself be put through it again.

I’ve been through too much already.’

And he was in pain, from the looks of it, all was lost, at the cost of misunderstanding himself, there were many bottled remains. Spread inside of dead-infant shelves that were spread, crawling around with their long filthy hands which produced bubbling meat formations, many of which were their mothers, who couldn’t help themselves any longer. All too dreadful in look, they were shaken, yet they shouldn’t.

‘I think there’s a time for everything but now it may not come back.’

‘Will we be free from this blasphemy of thought?’

‘I do not know.’

And it was pleasing, knowing as much, never having to worry about anything that might be defiled. With as much as an hour in which they started touching one another’s foreheads, they began realizing that there wasn’t much left there. No nature, no verdure, there was nothing that could be put behind, nothing to be reproduced any longer and no pain, nothing to keep them back. But most importantly, there was the fear for a man who had dwelled deep and near.

A man as dark, as frighteningly shouting, he would not, were it to be, not to be conveyed no longer or set in agony. He had a sight, out for himself, he hadn’t made it to the forest, but by force he was brought to know.

‘This ship is a dead end.’

He called, but at that point, the structure, the armor that had stood near him lay broken and destroyed, or at the very least, it was completely assimilated and cast within the land-destroyed.

‘You’ve come out of the chasm, I’ve brought you here with I, for I am in need of a fraction of your mind, whatever that might be.’

And he looked back upon the structures, realizing that many were destroyed, all the homes and whichever side might’ve been. It was something he couldn’t easily, nor would he want to accept. His heart was beckoned but he was there, a part of him, eternally caught, with all the heads falling in the rain. Many look-a-likes were made to fall, a rain of heads never to be brought to a stop, some smiled while others only brought the most mischievous reminders.

Others were set like large beams that were made to look like eighteen put together overlapping crucifixes that could not be put together, nor by chance allowed to be made about, or be shaped. And they bore many eyes that were popping and spreading everywhere, including the mad pillars and the peculiar creations that started appearing out of nowhere, the faces of the being that revealed himself to him, and many other dark-forbidden incantations that would be set aside. Bloated benign creatures which floated while grabbing their most unnaturally stretched, largely erected meat-producing filter-baubles.

‘He’s watching, always watching and he cannot be made to look as my tormentor, or else they will be drawn to me like bees to most peculiar little knickknacks-holding onto a large clay-tool that’s not been heated yet, not yet and not for long.

Answer me this then, I need to know.’

‘What is it?’

‘It is my heart, I am a sick for I’ve come to the realization that in order to entice myself with such illusions as to entertain myself as well as my solemnly wicked existence I need to do something that might creature such vision, which might be deemed as being evil and vile.’

‘That begin.’

‘Come on, I will show you.’

And just as soon he grabbed a few of the lousy placed around harlots, making sure he readily placed himself between them and it, taking as many of them as he possibly could, placing them on a table before he proceeded to chop them into pieces, cutting them alive, in what seemed to be the most peculiarly bothersome manner.

Then both of the men were surprised by such things as not spring of guts and blood that began sprouting out of them, but the most peculiar things their minds could barely grasp, their open female-guts having become strange mouths that would constantly blow peculiar star-dust vision which began bringing into their world the most uncannily deformation that could get beheld by them, by any means. A large body made out of many unfathomable screeching plots, where little mouth-protrusions had been forced out of, from which the plants that came out of this peculiar spatial-ship like shaped oblong came, a giant guttural explosion which, in the air, began slowly drawing and pushing into every possible direction. Having picked up on the organic material, deformed large headed peculiarly trenched, horn-like bloated little devilish creatures that at time appeared to me made out of many low-hanging flaccid hand had only inherited some of the smaller hands which in turn began spitting themselves, out, being incapable of fathoming the full unwrapping motion which forced the horn-like structures to become flat, where the many armed bodies were and above of them, where they curved around the edges like little erupted from egg-shells from which candle-like growths pushed away until they entered the ceiling, spreading upon every wall. Many of the peculiar fliers having taken everything apart to reveal an endless stretch where many creatures like them were.

Large fins made come curved teeth that began floating away from their mouth, forming large platforms that looked like slit and put together scales which began vomiting some peculiar green blood upon themselves, encasing one another in wild conical formation that were fatter below their gut-protrusions from which mouth shooters began forming, spraying the wax-like floating towers that were carried on by the peculiar many-armed creatures, of which faces could now be seen as being split and splattered but not entirely, on the low-hanging surface of the down-thrusting egg-like shell from which their mouth and most peculiar eyes that were slit as so make plus-sign pupils which bore their edges rounded as if they were blood-cells. From their giant mouths, below-hanging there would hang, most uncanny tool-like curved-melting teeth such as the likes of which, would form bloated bulb-like structures, as they would bring the light it. Ivory-like pipe-extended tooth-shapes springing and spreading like cutters and bloated-deformed unnatural gnarly not working chipped needle-things that would be flung around the place, making it seem as if they had or bore the most unnatural gut tumors which were put through.

Their gums being largely skeletal in actuality, plastic almost, or stone-like as if to make it so nothing could grown on them. These 'teeth' actually travelling from the innards as if they were actually vintage deep-sea divers' air hoses, drawn from the guts, then put through the gum-holes, from which they would be reeled in and out, back in the mouth. Their eyes large domes or tears-yet-to-drop, blackened like tar-pools, yet transparent as to see glowing little light-structures like broken vases or solid-crystals that push the eye-substance away as they're constantly being thrown around inside of them. Both of them looking in two direction while they're being largely separated; yet when the horn-like chitin it put together, they would be akin to chameleons, some proto-spike, pike teeth protruding out of the edges of the egg-shell like rims from which they split, with hole spike hole spike formations as to enter those gaps as they reel back in. Or peculiarly deformed oysters in terms of how they act, with large masses, pearl-like meat inside of them when enclosed, yet larger than that. With little meat arm barnacle like thing sitting of the side of this chitin-horn that's set in flight.

Large towering ceiling fan-shaped tail leading to a giant eight shaped melon-like fat thing with large bulb-like guts-swarms, elongated in their form, while their placement would be lain inside both of the holes that are lain inside the eight', stretched between the two of them as their incessant growth would never come to an end. In their swarm, little dark pieces of guttural things where lain, dark. All dark-skinned to an unnatural degree until tawny burnt insides come to be revealed. To be more precise, the melon-growths being formed by the gut-shaped coils inside the holes, which, themselves, are formed out of a great gut that's twisted itself into the eight, bearing the tail from the side; yet from inside the swarm and from it a single long, adjustable lamp-like arm that's pink and swollen emerges, bloodied and dripping out, from which a great formation that's but a small pop of many pantaloons-shaped things, with little pincers that, upon opening push out large bloated scorpion-like larvae tails, eating what they could from around the air.

Large whip with elongated nibs of skin, all thoroughly placed on the side, all deformedly pronounced, all throwing up their own guts as they become but the shroud of men, all cut-outs as if on paper, but instead, of cartilage.

One could easily shape the being in his mind just by looking at the general transiently peculiar trajectory in which the planetary reaction seems to be put through. If one could easily calculate the amount of troughs of most peculiarly put together rotating cosmic materials as to make a giant planetary belt made out of flooding space debris, they could easily imagine it just as easily gnawing if not pushing itself closer on the planet as to wrap itself as tightly as possible until it will have become too much to bear, rubbing continuously as to form a giant empty gaped-trench in which, where one would cast the most peculiar amount of gelatin inside, he would soon enough, upon, the absence of the belt and the lifting of the gelatin, he would see the most unfathomable figures a man could lay eyes upon. Most strikingly deformed, as if the mass legions of objects that appear to make the profanity of space as well as the supreme lacerated destruction which had occurred, into, strikingly so, a wild formation of look-a-like shapes and forms that are cast in his shape. Although this might appear, at first to be a coincidence, as it just so happens to be in often case, the mere dissolution as to completely split it and spread it apart, slowly, while expanding the belt as fast as possible, which may be completely impossible to achieve by merely removing it from the premise in its cast-in gelatin form, the belt, as it would no longer be a belt but a wide-spread net, out of which the humanoid-like casts would appear to get more and more distraught than they were before, completely being pushed out of the rims of their unnaturally set-s or put together shapes, creating various dancer, or short lived illustrated illusions, spatial animations of wild demonical cackling things, pseudo features such as eyes or expanding in, made to bear the souls of the men and women trapped inside, only to slowly dissipate in the air, as if they are to be brought back into the world of living, in much more distanced faces or spatial planes upon where they stain the plots of the ground, around which they might infest and spread about the planet they landed in. Each shard coming out of this belt carrying a replicable image as that of the great mass from which it came out of, making it so, this trench became, as this little pick or thorn which was taken out of the debris, would infest a large area where the figures would only come out of the ground, then, finally, as if this concentrated spot was but a raised-bump, or a pushed through as if by hand insides of a balloon, as to become an unnatural plethora of many inhumane features with many little nibs and cranks, more solidly inclined to form curved and convex slides the hands would carve from inside out. As these humanoid or simian features aren't the being itself but the workers which had been taken in the employ of the great being, as to be forced to work endlessly to preserve itself, forming little picks and little hammers and little screams as if to remind the others that their work never ended. Yet this deformation, the complete breaking is also caused by its nature as the beings that are put to its employ cannot stop themselves from caving, therefore dooming every bump and every infested parcel of land to eventually be shattered into pieces by its own servant's hands.

One could not ignore the being that observed this happening, who, instead of freely fleeing out of sight as to have come in fear of what might happen after, it's important to know. It was there, it left its mark. With a little shout coming out of three rotating mouth-like visors-things pushing out of ant-queen like breeding-organ that stand out, hundreds of them in the back, corroded and tainted, black-yellow and purple around an unnatural shell-like head with little eyes, with little slits that open and close entirely as to show dust-blowers, and gray things inside their leg-like protrusions in the back. Wings pushing out of them, reeling in and out, with little sting-like growths all around its body, preventing its flight a rectangle abdomen shaped like a box-inside of it, shaped like a tomb, or a coffin, inside of which a little dark man-like figure-organ beats on the walls for some reason that might not be explained by any means; why would there be one like him in there and why is he connected with gut-tubes that enter him from every side? Of course no edifice, hole or anything even closely resembling a feature could be made, yet one could not forget that it's but filled with precious liquid that's being starved out of the mind and put behind bars of bone-cartilage. Cold-producing bags, with little handles on its back, from which parachute-like spreading wings shaped like gliders open; with little iron-like bars standing on a rack holding the bags together.

From the distance it could be seen like a big larvae standing on top of a coffin, with a hole on the front out of which three cylinders come out of. Many big larvae-like protrusions in the back; from both sides two metal frames coming out, holding the open cold backs that spread the wing-like gliders. Open slits on every side of the main-fat larvae-like body. No legs being visible on the main form, yet its wings retract whenever it rests, drinking waterish liquid with the help of its mouthvisors; while it's incapable of getting away from the peculiar thing that's in front of it.

Or rather, the metal rack holding its cold-pouch wings being more like some deformed iron instrument, or two overlapping harp-handles.

Deformed large creature, with a long-top, being shaped like a deformed pile.

Leper with no heads; large bastion of many shapes, all rotund and little more than put around, in an uncanny matter, a legion of leisurely defined little needle racks with more than a few unfathomable tails on the great bodies coming out the main frame where it bears. Thrusting in and back and then again, until it couldn't stop the wonder. Always pushing, through a basin; inserted through it from a spindle open-through wardrobe, shaped as to hold two batteries, its head lobes which are fragmented in the most peculiar manner, being somewhat impossible to classify by any means since they're not perfectly cylindrical. Large pair of phantom legs, coming out beneath it from two round black saw-blades, twisted and put through, large eyed, as it many more are to come and sprout as well as put them, on a cue, exiting out of most malleable objected, some peculiar limbs with little more coming out of them than an unnatural amount of piles, twisted as if sprouting from a den of many snakes whose eggs were cracked open and set of fire, as for the color. Scale-like objects coming from the main form, twisted and mirror-akin, flying around it, with little more than a few faces that watch and reflect the twists, mostly the mass upon which they're strung about. The flatness of the heat, from which, of a transparent-like manner, out comes but them, the parts that control the motion, the direction, the language center as well as the memory-core which is a lump of its own. A little more, sharpened to the side. A great tubular-thing the spine, more so spreading back as to leave for a lot of room to enter. Large pucker-like open throat-oysters, or hardened throats, marsupial as if to enter, upon which many more; unfathomable ends, all entering and all pushing inside, being warmed as it to grow in them. Broken apart and dissolved in part, then inside of them, those who entered the organs to enter inside. From there, all would be set in sight from the long extensions where pushing little antler-like elongations but wrap and push and torn aside, they're not there, but they seem to be the tools that fashioned the push-through, invisible hued grabbers, upon which it walked. Large pincer-like eaters that endure as they're put through the ground, fully shouting as from the scene of a massacre, a serene thing opening out of them as they're but pushing away from what cast against it. A large body of walls that surround it at all time, all but set like a Phalanx but shaped like tombs, open on its side, as to enter, meaty really much so that one could but form the little while-put through, a shape of his own, an image of a man's body, as to replicate each dream it had. Inside of it but bouncing around every single one of them as it's searching for a way out. Trapped inside of it and always searching like a child with but a candle in the dark, connecting with one of the scepter-like extensions that are attached to the evil heads it bears inside. They whom come out of the mass are greeted by the mirrored scales, whom talk to them but never touch, as their tongues but wreathe about. Javelins that got too sharpened, always but to scratch and watch, to grow inside the mightily set-after, the thing behind it, but coils around. Serenely they draw away, whatever they can, then push and pray, to the mark in the tomb, on the coffin carved, but around the head, pushed in, like a syringe that's but doing a shot. From which it draws away as an infant from his mother praying, that this would be a dream, as swaying, through it could finally escape. But there's no such certainty as to fall, to see or feel anything else, to rise about or seem to move, there's nothing there to touch or prove. Only an endlessness from which no flight, or the heaviness may allow, alive for hours as it's searching, for something, something, never ending. No gap through the tombs for the mirrors to pass through, nothing that would be survived, nothing to have set them aside, or put through or seen as well, nothing that would taint them.

Following in the air, upon a world that's unaware; large mammalic ankle biters, shaped like huge put together basins, empty within their lower reaches, from where there pushed deep within. Endless steps as to be ascended, large unfathomable ends, twirled around and grasped beneath them, large containers filled with led, all too well and eaten through. A voice's echo would settle through and only be lost for hours before it could find but solace somewhere around. Unnatural hedge, and built out den above it, shaped out of the body of each bed that's held beneath its claspers. Both extended right and left as if a man's struggle to grab a wheel, three as well. Held together by put through cords, like a violently put through harp that's set on each side, puked about each hourly call. Many put-together grows that spread, out of the beads, flights coming out the sleepers whom are dead, during their dreams but pushed, as if from the underworld called but to seek refuge, caught in this flight of basins, the dream-catchers of meat held behind. Upon a system of gothic architecture put and wrought and set aside. Its rotten core, the snake emerging, dragging it carcass from behind, like a citadel, a being in it, still refusing to let go of it before it's set in flight. A middle formation, a grand creation that's but the intersection of both ends, from where sprouts but what's unnatural, and what's to come when there's no end; of many grows as well as many others, whom easily are cut and set aside, one could see the many spanners of how deep it buried itself. Only to have its flight ended and submerge in wild diseases, most incomprehensibly being ripped apart after, as the mountain calls upon its mad disciple.

A much bloated forth crab-holder, if it came out of a mixture of a billion miles, and hundreds of them but put through the waste of it, a large pool of acid mounts, all but mixing with him in the making, then dreading to grow and spread. Unnatural things coming out of each end; like nuclear silos that deeply submerge.

Some machines are easily disturbed, especially when they're in the process of being ripped apart from their mother-units, and put into the high-consolidated tube-machine and quarrel makers that spin inside of them. It's much harder to make out what kind o organic material there's usually lodged inside of it, as if it couldn't have been made clearer than, it being a large robust, broken clock, or would've been described as such if one were to split it open. But its appearance is nothing other than a mere coincidence as there's no possible way one could stumble or come upon the understanding that there's nothing in it. No head broken in, nothing. It was a miracle that one could see it walk again especially since those leg cartilages were but rather anatomically made or at least crafted, organically grown by some means to carry the fully weight of a machine-gun turret which was carried around by the naked beast. And there were a few unwashed, unnatural beings that would've found themselves, rather, incapable of understanding what the reason behind pulling the headpiece off it meant. It bore little rocket propellers that were attached to engine-shooters in the back of what looked like eighteen open missile rackets that were made to put so much force in what they were doing, the actions and the motions they were bent upon that one might come to realize the danger within it. If growth meant anything, it was the fact that they kept it in a swollen cage, a small thing where it grew forever, like an animal at the zoo, where it would rot forever, incapable of thought. This raised a mental dilemma, whether or not this kind of treatment was somewhat inhumane and whether it should be avoided if that were the case. Since the place in which this machine was put in was rather, certainly it couldn't be called for or reproached as being out of the ordinary, when it came for people who knew something about the business, this being somewhat expected. It was the normal thing to do, something no one talked about, but had to be done. There was no such thing as a lie-abuse, or abuse-abuse, there was no abuse at all happening. The means always justify the ends, and forcing a creature like it to suffer forever, as the two legs were but missing of the originally eighteen legged structured, two-of the pairs, more to leaving eight legs or four pairs in total, which struggled to hold the weight by themselves, just this much could be told. It was no real turret, both something that shot spore-children in the air. Looking around at them was classified. No one wanted to approach the thing, as long as no one would do it, no one would die. It was just how it was, how they listened to it, when the time approached and when the time called for it, that much should be made clear, and aware. Large pistons actioning it; while it was held.

Peculiar dark family, which appeared to be swimming, inside a pool that was up to their throats, as much as it seemed a lost cause, the mover they were in was but froze. In place, not to feel as much of an embrace as one could see, this pentagon-like structure, with its metal legs extending in the back, with the many lifting room that seemed at time to draw in and out, pushing little things out, that would be hardly seen through. Thick walls surrounding it, that could as much as push on every side, extending as to form a thing-skinned tower where a family might rise and fall. Many people struck inside, peculiar hexagonal skies and walls which were but part of it. There it stood but split in half, with every level of this result but projected on the side, as if seen through and made to waste. Unnatural birth having occurred in the strung together barely holding girth that's put them together, barely set on an incline.

Large dark-head with pucker-horns, drawing out of the main structure horn-like influx of little puckers and many bothersome head-throngs, with little dead-heads on.

Weird shape of a dark sub-human Semite with a hooked prolapsed nose whose had his head kicked in through his throat and chest as to form a trail spanning across him, which would make the Semite look somewhat similar to an old woodcut of a man being sewed in half if he were flipped over while they started with his head instead of the other side, leaving a single trail that's opened him thoroughly. From above his frame a single malformed brain-shaped circle that's been expanded then fully drawn behind as to for a great tunnel through which little more than a fifty hound-like beings swim inside a liquid-like gelatin that's being fed to the maw waiting on the back of the Semite, forming an almost peculiar looking fully stretched soap bubble maker with diamond rings all around them-skinny metallic, yet ruses with little heads on top of them. Large yet ubiquitous.

Upon entering the coach, a strange flaccid dynamite being came out of it. Spreading a few strands of awfully shaped long necked distraught unnatural curved skin-jolts that pump up and down.

A beast' like opening from the side of the car, which had been dormant for some time. Spreading from side to side, long teeth that curve and push around the rims of a great invisible surface from which dark heads emerge, cocoon-shaped upon the projection. It's as if the car opened its side door, allowing for a great sucking mouth to press onto the earth, flaccidly liquefying itself until the dark shapes emerged, more abstractedly hardened, opening for a few unnatural people to walk on strange legs, shaped backwardly, as if to form, large contorted marching machines of cartilage upon which they stand.

Chests spreading in the back onto them as every wheel appeared to be of a hardened unnatural material that could never be put on, or be classified by any means.

Dark king with a peculiar hat, a crown that's pushed through his brow out of his jaw, having entered two thirds of his nostrils which were already pushed out; a head that's placed on top of a sea-ray where, both legs twisted in the back like a scorpion's tail cast a dark shadow upon a back filled with many holes. From where there comes out but various ice-berg like mountainous ranges that contort as they make their way through, seemingly uncannily stopped, every single moment when passing through. Its hands but stretched as far as to make him look like a plane, on top of which peculiar shapes, like put together figures without faces but strange disc-like depressions, which bear three holes rotate as to form little spindle-horn that retract and pump, then come out as when in need to sea. This peculiar king but crawling away from where it stands as to hunt whenever to be aware of what's but to happen around him. Unnatural gulps.

A calming demeanor coming out of a strangely submerged pipe-form that's crawling out of a partially decayed semi-hardened pool with two head-like formations coming out of it, headed around the rims of a strange, yet peculiar partially awake creature that cannot breathe inside of it, yet struggles to come out, having lost most of its skin that's been partially eaten out and left to rot in the most unfathomably dark abyss it could've landed into. A dark recess-like star formation on its back, landed across a most unnatural guttural form. Two eyes stripped on every side, eighteen carnage spots left to rot. Giant tubes coming out of its quasi primeval form that's rottenly left behind, out of which it sprouted out of, like a peculiar flower-creature despite the fact that it shed its own skin, what came to it was a strangely peculiar geometrical formation. A rot coming out of it, with four main structural brambles coming out of its top, delimitating four triangular blossoming body petals that are but kept floating above the pool like rafts, the great rod holding a strange malformation that's shaped like the cloth held behind by God in Michelangelo's depiction in the Sistine Chapel, yet bloated as a big liquid holder where the waves are but frozen yet squirm. Large insects but forming them as if trapped in that gelatin like-trap in which they're forced to eat one another and breed inside the left over as they struggle to come out. From the front side of it, if one were to identify it, out of the trap, a large spring but leading to a circular semi-moon black pea-like thing that's fully extended, grown and filled with sack-like compartments that produce dark-drips of steam-like putrid essence that spreads around and kills the flowers. Always beating like a heart, pumping and trashing around itself in attempts to get itself rid of the flies that surround it. Kept under a built in temple and worshipped by the Althrepps. Little creatures wearing tatters, with back tails that are as far as horses and bear leg-like entrapping pincers that come from their fat insides, heading out like little ear-crawlers as well as they bear a bone-rack in their backs that contort in their master's behinds as to carry them away. Yet even they are covered in this peculiarly long mattress cover that's belittling to see. They wear strange masks, that look like they are carved inside their faces and push even deeper than that, feelers inside their organs that beat around. Under the sheet exposed, little things that hold onto them. Arm-like things which humanoid and mammal-arms hold, to the partially encased, ivory-constructed artificial finger bear long needles that are inserted in the organs. Multiple livers, lungs, guts, and many others that aren't theirs; born like that. Upon their births they only live for a few minutes before they die unless they're given fresh organs they can latch onto, yet they squeeze them dry since they bear openings inside their fingerless hands, which bear some tongue-like fat clapper-tongues that beat that smash the organs as they're as strong as muscle. For that reason their parents but attach the strangely put together fingers that are inserted inside of them, as to delay the consumption of the freshly acquired organs. Rather centipede like in the mere-like back, at least the shapes that expand from inside their openly rounded holder, a space where they retract in and hold still as if it's a small cove of their own, resting beneath the warmth of the meaty ceiling. The rack being more so akin to a comb that's been shoved inside the back, deeply pushing in, with the handle inserting itself into a simple fat lump of a body that holds the covered face; which bear two seal arms on each side and all the arm coming out of the open-gutted stomach that drips below it.

It was then they neared it, a large unnaturally developed organic room that's been mounted on top of the head of a great willowing beast, its outer horns but keeping a hold of it, as they suddenly emerged and pushed themselves through it. Its nigh-canine head but split in half as to become almost fully encompassed in the most unnatural system to date. A targe-like spread shot of moisture, that almost looked as if it had been completely if not near completely encompassed in the structure. Through which the fragments of brain that had once been lodged inside the skull come to shape. Unnatural things by the looks of it, covered in bone-shrapnel, every few paces of so drawn forward.

Dark essence manifested in a peculiar mist, a vapor that's moved from dead beast to dead beast, until they form, for what appears to be more than a few emptied rooms.

Little pucker that's shaped like a dark bucket that refuses to move aside, made out of many barely put together snouts that could not move unless forced to. Little more than eighteen dark heads that are shaped like dead humanoids that cannot move unless poked, unless dead and caught and shoved aside. Eighteen darkly put together anchor-shaped following through.

'The dark beast emerges and we must sing in its name and name it so that it might remain.'

A great ledge, a peculiar valley great organic creature that's but looked like a limbless put on its back, flipped tortoise with but one large edge to the right of masses from which a crest of right-curved, right pointing spikes emerged. The inside of a drop, a pool or a well-like depression in the middle of the mass, from which there lay but a strangely curved protrusion upon which it walks, as to be. An elongated limb forming a great C, that's but connected to a cartilage frying pan, with spikes on its handle. Many eyes adorning it, as to look but jeweled and pure; little rods connecting the gaps between the c and the pan, the point of end, between the dragging ledge but bearing a single extracting chain that's been put through the depths of the earth and through the depths of death from which they but cleave.

The soul inside the machine, almost eaten then cast within the hour.

A horde of trashing Mongols that are shaped but like an empty unnatural stretch; little to more of them but barely put together until they can no longer be allowed to move.

In the strange room; what lay inside of it could only be distinguished by looking about the place with the unaltered eyes of someone who's been basking inside the sun continuously for thirteen months at the very least, leaving as much to be held in order to be at peace. Fires rising around the place as the arousal of flames would do their best to prevent themselves from spreading everywhere like an uncannily incapable to be prevented fire.

A giant blimp, peculiar, with product placement on top of it that's shaped like bills of skin and sheet-like protrusion, lines of boils that are shaped like traces of cocaine and little pegs of long-stretched worming extensions that enter the strangest of unnatural heads.

Pleiche

Its great lagoon body but came to life as soon as one could put a fine strange of skin-alike on the floor, floating in the air as it spread between each few meters forming wild directional bloody-concave walls around its floating wall. A small top, like an openly exposed mug shape that looked as if it were a brain, squirming with red torsions that but swam around as if it bore nothing else other than some filthy pool that was made to wait for what came after. There was something about this squared up round headed plump comet-like creature, not the dripping of blood or filth that ran off it but the many growths that ran along it, pushing out, reeling in and everywhere where one could see and snare as many hooks until it could be ripped off gallantry and forced it to be beaten until nothing remains. A peculiar canal-like protrusion, almost phallic, with many sharp long tips making its teeth; the skin being ruddy red, skinny as for the desert in which its flight but pushed around everything. Little particles of dark grit but having gritted its form and shape in time; while from the side or from a peculiar angle one could see a pseudo-line despite there being none, like a highlight that's been given birth by two intersecting edges as that of a finely sharpened cube, which only signaled that its insides were more so, more or less hardened and highly structures as opposed to the bile thing it was. They flew in flock and from the looks of it, sometimes they stacked on top of one another, forming a pseudo-looking humanoid spine, each being forming its segment once they were intersected, yet driven in an uncanny valley since there was nothing else to it, other than a scum-protrusion in the back, one that couldn't be seen in any other way at that, other than the single microscopic view of a hair strand, only the base of it with a pseudo tip coming out, extending from the back of the creature before it reeled back in, at the end of which, a formation bloated out like a rubbery thing being filled out with an unfathomable quantity of blood that's been finely preserved, look-alike to many men struggling to come out their prison, and out of it, and then back in they remain. Particularly looking humanoid fetus-like large headed tetrahedrons with many horns that swing around from which, once they had gathered and formed the great emblem and the great stander, this much was left without their wickedness be set aside. A huge pillar that they formed, unnaturally so, from which at the top they shot like a gazer, connected to the peculiar planet, where they couldn't be set in stasis any longer rose; from four great scepter-forms. They were grabbed by giant heart-marked, as if they had been hot-ironed on top their middle region, where gaps could be seen, the little fingers being stretched as well as they pushed in, out of long chests, without heads, from the throat-regions out of which emerged, many other hands but followed, many legs like that of a basin of tadpoles followed after. Chewed upon, shrew bones being the offering that no one wanted to move on. Little thing followed through, devouring everything on their way through, leaving just as little to be held, magnanimously forlorn and little more as well. A little more than eighteen hundred mouth-stings shot, all around the place they but carried on, long extending peculiarly thin, unnatural edifices and little more than thin sheets of melted wax, little more than unnatural springs of filth at that began protruding from the earth.

They deformed the land, as the toothy stalactite-figures rose from where they stood and froze as within the hour, not to leave something to be held. The ground being caught as well, spread and segmented in many mammal-like shapes, all of which were raised as mounts, near one another after they remained. Little more than a few of them could be seen and more than enough of them bore toothy grins, in which the figures seemed to spare within, to swim before they could be caught, as thin, little bloated churls, they pushed out and wreathed as far as they could reach everything else. They, of all looked like boils at the top of the mammals. Beyond the pseudo tails as each end but cast-out heads, of many fathers. They were big and bloated, and seemed to make the tails look like throats. Dark things with dark eyes with little more than open sores that made their mouths and features, always grinning, laughing from that point on, as they were but endlessly pushed around, until finally their heads were standing no longer, flaccidly after they had but poured themselves down; to have reached and rested upon each other's brows as they wasted away; what followed after were incantations from the people whom had stayed beneath the lower-rims of the earth, beneath each girth of the land, they had followed through, abandoning their robes and shrouds before they emerged. The harshness of the weather made them seem lifeless, hopeless, incapable of doing anything else than the purpose they've been conjured for.

'We've been walking through the plains for hours.'

There was nothing more but the obscure look of the dark surroundings, a land that was dimly lit, there was nothing to it, by any means that held their hands in acquiescence of the first dark forts that followed through.

During those times, it was the first family of Thytheria that emerged. Robust monstrosities, brutes that carried their own in order to make out it alive, mostly covered than anything that might've shoved them on each side. Kept alive by kleptomaniac-tubes that were shoved inside the ground, they but shot them in the beasts' head before it could react.

'It should save us a few hours at the very least.'

Said the Great Igominus of Thint, who took to bear the first of the strands of bloody hairs he pulled out of one of the dead.

Air-fillers were a given, since they could not deal with the invisible statches that crept about, making their way through them, as they buried but inside every man. No one was safe from the contamination.

So much power was somewhat condescending, since there was nothing to it, no elation, nothing to them that would matter or break, it couldn't be achieved no longer, large brained creatures, many of which were tumor headed, and would become unstoppable in time, after their growth became unstoppable, unremarkably so. There was something in them.

Couldn't control it, too many mouths that sprouted, too many of them boil-holes as if they popped, many of them came out from below as well.

All had too many faces to count and all of them were bloated, big incapable of being stopped, too uncannily deformed and fat and filled with that, their mouths couldn't be stopped. Like many antennas that were but formed with mosquito-textures that were but soiled and put inside, their whole filth, filth, filth and chemistry but put inside of the air, they poured themselves out. Harder, much harder to explain, they squeezed themselves until they couldn't help themselves any longer, until they began popping again and again until their remains had spread just about the place, until everything was made.

'I need to breathe, I need to breathe, I cannot help it any longer, I see it.

My lungs are bursting.'

They were tall, kept like flags on top of their large lines, their pulmonary tracts erected from those disabled looking deformed creatures that followed through. They were incapable of breathing, so much excitement, all that which was spread upon them.

Large wide-spread mouth effigies could be seen, made out of white, held by little bat-like thin humanoid-like hands which only dragged and pulled until they couldn't help themselves any longer. It's been so hard, and it's been such a dark thing to look at, such a hard amount of pain, so bothersome.

Malignant voices everywhere, they wanted to sing and sign but couldn't breathe, past the headache, past the wing of pain and what came after, it was too much to take.

Some of them imploded and burst through the air, forming the most unnatural things that joined the great pox-in the air, they were aware they were looked upon and feared.

Larger thing that followed, hardened chitin-wings that were put together in vortexes of pulling skin that were but vertically held and held upon them wreathing things that shot as well into the horizon, forming great peculiar elongations that fell forever in the distant stretch. Bothersome, bothersome, bothersome, the pain in the head; the creatures below took hammers as they but began beating their heads desperately as they were incapable of doing anything else. It had to end, it had to end.

'Too many haggard beings.'

And thus the house of Filth haggard was born.

And to it joined the god of such mold that its back looked like a mound of shapes, goat-like piles dead, but only in squirm-alike since the mound extended and formed two heads that all wore the faces on every side, four and four, they were sharp galore, and would bear their tongues with each arm, they shot themselves like pucker-acid reins that dragged them to stretch and had no legs but constantly dripped limb-like legs. With mouths at their ends which drew out like caterpillar-shapes from which those fat things, those blob-like eyes but started opening and little fly-like creatures started coming out.

It were its children.

'Bilderyhast I deem thee bee.'

I see, I see they thought in unison and gleche and gleche, they said and would pour out their heads.

Little men of little rust cast together after that they followed through incapable of breathing through the sinew that flew into the air, incapable of eating anymore they but gave birth to a piece of land and started sharing it, the mad beings, that wanted to end that thing in the head, to end it, to end it, to end it before it spread, this was no madness but a pain that had to stop.

And the creatures below all began chanting.

‘Joy, joy, joy, joy, joy joy and clarity, we, again approach reality, we shall call upon the cast that shall be put, alas, we create a world out of that.’

And there appeared Bilderyhast who opened its back only to revealed a trail-like formation of mouth-like jaws that were put together as to form a contorted ration filled with little heads, a train-like thing of which wheels were but the rotating wheels of torture that were made out of red skin, which had been pulled from some dark rimmed dimension where they formed, the torture.

‘The supreme torture of the limb-bearing things.’

But there were no limbs left, instead an unnatural thing came after.

Instead of breathing destruction, this elongation from the back started weaving a world together, a womb-planet that would burst and spread, that would go ahead and make everything right, in the head. They could not fathom waiting for another second, as they but began, spreading between themselves, the pain could not be brought to a stop. It felt as if they bore a lot of corpses, from which they made a net. Dead-women, a lot of them were brought in eighteen beaks. A white pale-raven that had scrawls on its wings, chained with peculiarly blue-coral chains of ultramarine-alloy, their eyes were all wrong, they looked as if they were put on top of one another at least twice, and they wore peculiar drawings on them, like an incomplete triangle that points down, the two lines that would’ve connected on top going around each other as to leave a gap passing through. A straight line intersecting the triangle, and their irises were barely drawn ugly scrawls that were rotating and bore strange marks on them. Others had weird words written as well. But most importantly, alchemical writings and illustrations that pushed ahead. And they spat various corpses out of their throats, so many butchered women, all who deserved it.

A man was there in them but he survived. He spoke.

‘I hate women, but I love them, I am caught in this trap, I cannot help myself, It’s not how I’ve been brought but I have come to realize, oh, monsters that I’m surrounded by.

That I’ve spent too much time alone, that, I came to know that I’m afraid of them. I am but intimidated, and I cannot help myself, I am scared but I loathe them because I fear, like trapped culprit, I go to my heavens without fear, now that my confession has gotten itself through.

I am the evil man that has been speaking to you, oh mad beasts for this long, now, my conscious is almost clean, but alas, I am reminded, now my madness almost ended, my focus had been restored, I hunger and fear no more that I look upon thee. I’ve come to realize that there’s something I’ve been missing for far too many days, I come to know myself but fear I do not convey.

I bear the hatred I made myself be born and bred through, I whom but hates those creatures, dark and seen-through, it’s something I shall never move away from, never shall I fear of being known of being shown as the vile thing I am. I come forth as the lord of all evil, the man who shall rule the house of Filth haggard in the name of vileness and for which I was but made to rule through.’

And there was another god whose name was Pletuthad and Illito and Ghluthetar, and they were vile and disabled and filled with gangrene and huge and wildly set and outlandish looking and contorted as if they were made to fit one another as if they were indeed the Gordian Knot that was been cut by Alexander who was the king of wild heavens, and who was but cut in half, at the side of which his entire legacy was set inside, growing as his servants were become him, on the other side, he was widely open as he had conquered everything he had ever stumbled upon, with all the evil being set in his eyes, since they were red. A red miasma coming out of them as they forged everything and out of his open-gaping mouth a peculiar reality was deformed and contorted and it was peculiar, for it was set. A large form like a shark-like pyramid split the land as to form something similar to the Grand Canyon, in which most peculiar of beings swam, in those pools where man has never stepped in, they continued moving around. Partitioned peculiar legs, with peculiar leprous frogs that were dead and were formed to be, large framed of cancerous structures, all placed under shadowy canopies that were formed out for the ancestors of his worn killed fathers.

All of them were present there and all but governed like giants with teeth coming out of their mouths, pushing out until they formed interconnected cartilages that looked like cabinets and stoves shoved together but made out of the most immaterial hardened liquids as well as they shone with green gas and peculiar red masses that started flying on, contorting like lynching ropes, pushing out, then back, from there on, they spread and formed peculiar saw-spinning growths that pulsated with faces that could be seen, spread-right on. They were their ancestors as well and each single one of them but shouted as they were forever trapped in those things, which were just as soon revealed for the disabled pain they spread on. Every single man of the kingdom had its legs taken away from them. Their ability to walk being completely reduced to suffering and suffering without end; gaping as they were, peculiar crucible-freighters appeared to be buzzing in the air.

It is highly improbable but at the same time true.

‘I am elated to be elected as the representative of madness that’s been entered through the gong of skin through which I’m cut, let me split your throats open.’

He said, while as soon as he received the other ones through, his gut was become a dangerous thing, uncannily put through as if through some truncheon, the man didn’t know how to behave. He was the steward, at least one of them, but he received the two tribes nonetheless.

There were two tribes situated on the platform, since they were human, they simply manifested themselves out of nothing as if they’ve been willed into existence. One was a tribe of all females, the other of males. It bequest no question for a man to figure out what happened afterwards since it take no half a mind to see it happen.

The women quickly surrendered then proceeded to being raped by the men who ruthlessly impregnated them. There had been no fight.

‘Champion, champion I declare thee, Elmanach, muncher of carpet-rats!’

It was indeed an art, looking at them so wildly exposed, this being a dark jungle all would but avail than to look at for more than a few minutes.

Regardless of it, they were bashed and trashed and made to pools, as soon as it hat, there was a hat in the middle of the platform. A giant had, a peculiar one at that that, it was not shaped like a hat but a dark cylinder that grew. Their heads were drawn to it and formed the outer points, strung tightly around each corner of the not-to-be-seen room that was in there, invisible faint, it was. All of the sudden the leashes could be seen on his back.

The steward did not like that. He was tall but wore fancy clothes, and walked on two coffin-rose through people that were formed constantly then disappeared once they were done walked on top off. Which only drew so much deeper as to look through them, as for his elation, there was a grand reason for it to happen as well.

‘I’ve been listening for a while.’

‘And who might you be if you don’t mind me asking?’

‘I am the Devourer of mouths.’

And the creature but chomped his right off, cleanly, so.

A moon it was sang to, a moon would be split in half by the blade of the right half of Alexander.

‘Another celestial game which must end, won’t it?’

‘This cannot continue forever, you must know already, everything has an end and from the looks of it, everything you might do, everything you may progress through making no matter how hard you’re going to attempt trying will end up being destroyed.

Unfortunately, I’m afraid. But I’m more afraid of you losing what’s left of yourself than what comes after, you lost your faith, steward, you’re no longer the thing you used to be, worn out as you may think of yourself, there’s no reason.’

‘Shut your mouth, I’ll see no reason, I.’

Settled with that.

They were praying to peculiar shapes that were largely deformed and appeared to be outwardly drawing unnaturally elongations that started pushing out of their main trunks. They were bloated like fat-finger shaped crystals from which four main half-ellipse like shapes came out its top, making it seem like a split open wheat-fragment, at the end of each of them there being a single pus-rotund heads, that are hardened like crystal-dead coffins, in which there lay little men in little put together unnatural silicone-goat-heads.

They floated in tiny skin machines with unnaturally grown heads that appeared out of nowhere, pushing out of pin-head like openings of skin, creating pseudo balloons that expanded just about the place, having contorted as to become the most unnatural claspers there are. Within the hour they became like troglodyte peashooters out of which dragged along some moving antler-liquor beds that were as stretched into one another’s wildly open manifestations of ribs that appeared in the sky. They were pouring out the most unnaturally quasi-globular shapes that drew along as soon as their inception was done. Oblong-globular in the most flattened at the bottom way, where a few lines of thick skin drew below, forming two foamed-upon sheets on both sides, a total of four stretched upon the racks that surrounded the sheet-faces that chewed protruding incisors that tried coming out of their prison. Large eye on every flat, they didn’t come in two. And the globular oblong bore a thin-hair like curved beak shape that pushed out of the visible bowels of the strange flying creature that was given shape. Many of them were poured out, having already been encompassed in the most unnatural glass-cloud they could produce, having given shape to skin-shards that floated around them, green reflection for every hardened apparition that was maintained even for a few seconds before they were bore out of their way and around them. Large pseudo-prune like faces could be seen contorted on them, but wingless and mightily benign. There were open gaps all around their bodies which peeled off during their flights, which were nearly indistinguishable from the human faces they bore on the sheets but they could barely be seen as they crawled deeper inside, tearing their own filth from inside out which they poured out, creating pseudo-strands of flying little infantile protons of skin that bloated the air as they kept growing in the most unnatural manner; having bred inside and bred and bred in quiet.

Large shoulders kept it from snapping its own neck because of the weight, drawing from its surroundings with the most unnatural deformed coils that were parted of the barfed out wings that had been hidden inside their guts. Since they depended on these deformations, they would be constantly choking off and spreading their diseased gut-acid during their peculiar flights, being incapable of surviving in the air for long despite the fact that they were incapable of crawling along because of their fattened bodies. The tips of their talons being more like soft masses than actually sharp nails that could be used to draw along. With them being slightly open and partially split around the tip of each end, bearing along what would seem to be a huge darkly bloated tail with small decorative incisors that are partially devoured, large pieces strolled along, like rail-growths that were twisted and placed like ball-curling infantile creatures that hide inside of one another.

Long stretch of land forming large spherical halls, at each end, a crucifix stretch between them with the two intercrossed lines being even more inwardly curved, finally depressing in a pair of stairs that lead to two different crossroads like patterns that drive even deeper in the ground, gut-like chambers that devolve into less solid shapes, abstract like patterns that could be walked as follows, instead. Straight ahead, below, the side, as if seen on the side, glued to the wall or walking on magnetic bands until the legs will have become but set there while the rest of the body crawls along and bleeds out of the stumps as if the legs had been sawed along, or put through so much abuse that they could no longer push out of where they lag.

Rifles with many sides that push out like tusks, the upper shape protruding and standing out, a square-like mammoth with large canons fidgiting on both sides as they push along and below, pumping almost when they draw out. With a heat-like spherical oblong organ attached to the top that's pumping like a heart with two teeth-like drawing necks-like shapes from which two little pints come out, bearing oozing dark spheres that appear and disappear as if they are but optical illusions.

The dark body of a siphoned little block of iron with little orange heads painted in as they but push out of a smaller bodies connected to everything just about the place by tazer-shot cords that shot along and grew in fat, until these strange ant-like walk raisings were but pushed around the place.

Humanoids with open heads, just so one could see the brain, their faces carved into their cortexes, moving along with an uncanny speed yet never leaving the cranial pool they're in, while their actual faces but featureless, or at least cut in and sutured. Large rots implanted in their heads that are but shaped like branch-chameleon insects, the ones that camouflage themselves like leaves, drawing out and moving around, at times creating the most unnaturally deformed looking pops of power and electricity as they push out in every possible direction, their sparks but creating fires along the planet, like the butterfly effect, but not normal fires. Fires that's but made out of skin and is but spread within the ground and the organic surfaces as to create giant domes and mounts with brain patterned faces that are theirs. Pushing and drawing little fly-shots, that burst out of them like tiny explosions or stepped on mines, as to be largely exposed; body-like elongations of harpoons that are but set in flight, bearing their marks and look-a-like teeth-like incisors that are but hardened like lump irons. These strange Brain-lobed rods but communicating with molecule-like portal shaped-vortexes in the air that look like brain scans if they were cut by as small child with scissors during his play-time in the kindergarten, where he drew an ugly little eye and a smile on top of it which is constantly rotated and sometimes looks like a banana, other times it looks like a fifty five degrees and fifty six degrees, and eighty one degrees rotated smile that's still shaped that way. And they speak but chopping their fingers and toes and by throwing them into the vortexes as they are but trying to communicate their precise instructions to the flying creature whose faces are but missing, but their brains are but projected in the sky every few minutes, right before they explore and spread along cancers of flies, and flying termite like truncheons that breath into one another's breathing plump snatched-in little carrion-shaped rifles to which they're attached, dragging it along as they're readying themselves to assault some of the unsuspecting people they've been tracking and stalking for hours.

The roof of the house looked like a middle aged upper face of a man which was cut off then put into a mixing basin where it started protruding and moving along ever so near, here and there, as to appear out of nowhere only to be broken apart, as if it was thin and reeled in and out, drawn along by heat-chemicals that were but entered into the most unnatural head-exposures that were themselves dug in; a little nasty man with two heads being put out like a fire.

A table that had a few books of different sized like an anthology of selected short stories taken from various authors that is thirteen centimeters wide, twenty point four centimeters in height, with a thickness of one and a half centimeters in total, roughly being zero point two for one piece of the cover, zero point two for the other, while the pages would amount to a thickness one roughly one centimeter and one when squeezed together. Those measurements not being entirely precise since the lines are relative; one thicker novel of eleven centimeters in length, roughly seventeen and a half in height, the pages being somewhat thicker here, as the book is kind of shaped like an axe, being four and a half at the tip or at its ends and four point two at its base, while the back is convexly contorted adding to an edge of three and a half as they were but inwardly pointing at one another.

Neither houses were set in place, as they were grown and pushed out, pouting like little anemic-growths; with little head extensions that pushed and poured out of them from time to time, forming dark crests, that were drawn in front of them; little peg-like ship-fronts that were molded together as to be seen as they were put together afterwards.

Sadness

Father Lomb approached his daughter.

‘I’ve tried my best kid, but I couldn’t do it.

I’ve tried feeling something, but I failed.’

She turned towards her father. A splatter of light on his face, his eyes were on the same spot for the last half an hour. His souls had waned.

They were simply not the same eyes she had seen before, different, worn out, but the same. Still the same.

The man across the street he had passed near had felt it. When the fall. When he was at home, if he’s ever been at all, no matter.

‘Do you want to know where I got this from?’

He showed her a tiny watch he’s gotten a long, long time ago. It still bore a dent in it.

It was hers, and his daughter knew it, even before it was revealed.

‘But you’ve never showed it to me before, why now?’

‘I don’t know kid, I don’t know.’

Her photo, his last reminder of her was ruined. He knew she’d grow up without him from this point on, yet there was nothing he could tell her. It was, it was to be their last time together and he hadn’t even considered giving it to her.

A few feet away.

‘That man died for us, cover your eyes kid.’

‘He can’t be dead.’

‘He’s not getting up, kid, settle down.’

‘Get the fuck out of my way, I need to see him!’

He had been shot eight times in the head, his leg sawed off, a bottle-tumor having encompassed his entire body, eighty five degree burns all around what was left of his body after a fall through the broken building. A spear having turned his insides to shreds of innards, a helicopter having entered him entirely, on its way out and through; a stroke suffered and twenty similar heads placed around his, as if he had died several times.

Yet the child could not accept that the man was dead.

He was trashing his hardest, doing what he could to get as close as he could to the man. He had known him all his life and now he was gone, forever.

‘I have killed my mother?’

‘Yes you have, you foolish creature, you have?’

Your mother? She is dead and you have killed her, just like you have killed your god.’

‘But it wasn’t my intention.’

‘Yet you’ve done it, filth, pagan that you are, I ought to have you punished and whipped.’

‘Have mercy please, I have not realized!’

Both of them were confused.

They had almost made it in time, within the touch, they were but ripped apart by one of the charging through cars, which left them bleeding on the other side. They were tainted and touched, their hearts had stopped while there had never been a time they ever felt alive. Nails were ripped, a scene within the crowd which gathered. She had but failed to weep as eyes stood frozen, she couldn’t see the flesh betokened to her lover, the man who was still alive. Whom had stared at his lover’s scarlet rim eyes, before he started fading through. A heart within reach, he manually pumped through, yet her life would not return, no matter how hard he tried, yet he’s done it on himself, no matter how hard it took for him to be alive, a little more for her.

‘Come on, keep running, we can still reach the station in time.’

‘We won’t, I know it already, I’ve seen it happen time after time again. You don’t understand.

As soon as you’re there, you’ll die. You’re always hit in the same spot right as you pass the street. Always but the man with a strange disease, you cannot stop it.’

‘Then leave, you little brat, I don’t need you here to drag me back, I can make it on my own if that’s what it takes.’

And with that, he tried, again, after a manner. Always leaving his kind behind, between each try, and every lap, he’s always caught between the crossfire, pulled between two sides. Always a man dealing the final blow, always but him pushing it in before he finally leave himself, on. With a broken eye and no charades, all too suddenly, out of this world, until he’s not there to wave any longer. The man died in the same spot, it must’ve been hundreds of times now the child witnessed. Him being caught with him, always sparring; with the other man; there were a few bull fighters somewhere.

A few matadors sparing with the wolf-bulls, of which horns were claws and which faces looked burnt in and sparing nothing any longer as they pushed through, pouting.

They made it far enough within the charge, then stopped. It was below them.

It reminded him of something.

A long time ago, he had been on a business trip to Middle East, where straight out of his envoy he was met by a peculiar Jordanian Pebble boy that was looking over a stand filled with Goats. What had truly surprised him in the little time they had spent together chalking up the talk was the fact that the boy remembered an old story his grandmother used to tell him during one of her many reminiscent trips along the Nile.

She wore a tall smoke-curtain and little peevish ankle-biters, crossed fishnets and a dandelion hat on top of a fairness that gave him the impression that she was nothing other than some out of home English slag than anything else, completely drawn aback by this wild demeanor in which he kept himself up-high. His nose being somewhat strung from the looks of it and always a heel high as if to cut her around the corner before she could step in between him and her grandchild.

‘I’m terribly sorry ma’am. But I don’t think you belong in such a place.

No, no, I think you’re bound to break an ankle around the desert if you stand too much around the plains, you must know by now that it’s rather dangerous being along the eastern waves.

‘I’m sorry young man but I do not know you and I’ve no intention of finding out who you’re supposed to be. Would it to have happened for you to be one of the bellboys whose unaware of the customs, perhaps I could’ve taken you lightly. Otherwise, I beg your pardon but I’m terribly inclined to dismiss you as the pig you are and move along with my dear Alphonse.

Come along child, pack everything up and tug it nicely, we’re leaving early.’

Indeed, man like him was created to exist in a vacuum of the kind.

He is but made to search for a woman, take her home, beat her, then have a child, beat him, abuse him, then die peacefully before he’s hit his fifties. That’s what a man is in his essence and no man might come to dispute that by any means. A man takes what he wants. A man may beat his wife, a man may claim whatever law there’s to him because he is the one who enforces it in the first place. It comes under his hand that the weak might be punished under him, for it comes to those in search of strength and might to throw no conquest off because the likens of a broad. Whom might make of him but weak and all. As she called upon a greater man to take him place, that’s when he might get replaced. It is obvious by that, that the woman cannot help herself, as she is the reason for there being chaos in the world, it seems. Without a man to look after a child, a figure such as his, a woman might only come to shove, to create and give birth to nothing but a criminal. That is what the female wants, for her nature is vile, ounce.

Indeed, it was, the only true at last. Why must they be evil?

Why must they act this way?

Even, from the looks of it, the nephew might come to convey such a thing, as he is whipped by the English woman whom might enact nothing more but what is truly the essence that’s blocked in their minds. It is for that reason that one might not simply come to brush away, what a woman conveys is but the evilness of her gaze. She is but a viler monster, than the likes of a rapist and that of a murderer. For she claims to be better than one, yet those things are but the results of a mother that hasn’t done her proper job. Out of which emerges the means of destruction and the clarity, which may instead destroy what we may refer to as society. A creature like this might not be put in charge, she may not be allowed to cast and call no man under her command, as, other than a few infamous exceptions from the rule, most of them seem rather incapable of, certainly any kind of evidence that they possess such a thing as a cognitive thought. Loathsome as they are, in some way, they are still useful and one can still appreciate their forms. They do have their charm in the way they look and is show, for a short period of time, at least until their youth wears off.

And with proper help and the needed funding, they might even come to make something of a proper boy, into a proper, such as which, this was not the case.

The Jordanian boy was an annoying brat, although his upbringing could not be shoved aside as completely as to be the fault of her mother or that of her predecessor, instead, his heritage might come as a claim, Harley noticed.

Yet, it was something he's never considered before.

Maybe there was more to it, at the very least not to such degree as to completely demonize them. They still lacked what men have, or take for granted, but perhaps they weren't as lowly as they seemed to be. Other factors might come into play. Of course, there would never be a woman that would rise to the ranks of being somewhat grand, of worthy of admiration; yet they're not completely as incompetent as they seem to be. Still, they do seem to be fancifully incompetent in most of the task they seem to try their hands at, which is a given, as they need to be helped. Such is the case with infantile beings, one needs not forget.

'I would certainly enjoy a woman-amputee.'

If only they came as mouth-amputees alike.

'We're always caught in the same dance, aren't we?

We always find each other far apart, yet drawn to one another, aren't we? Yet I can't explain why.

It's getting a bit tiresome, bearing this loathsomeness I bear for you.'

He knew. There would be a time when man will have stopped beating his time, one day; regardless of the eons it started shredding through.

'Enough with the charades.'

Come to think of it, women are actually not only idiotic but easy to manipulate so they might do whatever you please without even having to put much effort into it. As one would finally be endowed to put her into an early grave, he thought, he followed the young Jordanian boy, whose name appeared to be Philippe, knowing that he would be lead to such a hen as to know of a place where women lived in. They called it, the Humane Harem, for the women inside of them were not only not to be touched, but.

He was there.

The malignant voice spoke to him right before he could be exposed to them. He knew they would all be torn open and ripped apart, their chests heaves, and wrought so, their entrails thrown across the floor.

‘They do not know of us master.

We must hide for now in their insides.

It is a cruel thing that we must hide.’

It spoke, with the little slit inside its pucker, the peculiar broth of mouths, twists of eyes and drooping features melted by the sky appeared; of filth that refused to disappear.

It wanted to hide in them and that would be done.

By midnight, the child lynched and them, having become the effigy of the malignant birth.

‘Their sub-humanity need be hummed in order so I may be brought to life, master.

You must do as I tell you thus, in order to bring me back, bring me back to life I beg of you.’

It all made sense upon the night he fisted the pillow with his arm. As many women as were needed to be killed, as many of their souls given to such an essence as the malign were to be brought to him, in order for his emergence to commence.

‘Do as I say muster, start sawing off their feet. There is power in them, you must collect as many of them, and form a heap that I may be summoned through.’

And thus so, thought saddened for what was to be brought upon him there. Upon a brazier he had but heated the blade, and started off sewing them.

‘It’s something neither of us will have to admit but in the end we have to live with what we’ve done in order to finally continue to survive.

No amount of pity or shame can be brought on the other side, remember that. But I may not live for long without this kindness you’re doing to me, your kind servant.’

‘What will be my reward other than your servitude?’

‘We shall have to wait and see.’

For the entire duration of the night, the Jordanian boy just watched this thing unfold without saying a word.

Ancient sages of Sicily confirmed as much. There was power in women’s feet, for those who’d cut.

He kind of considered that what he was doing, was somehow wrong. He did not enjoy doing it, but he had to keep his servant alive.

No other creature would.

Would.

‘I’m sickened by this, can I stop?’

I didn't mean to hurt them now.'

'You must realize that It's far too late for regret, now.

Especially since what you've done could be, somehow interpreted as being a kindness you've done to me.'

'I am butchered, I am butchered, look at my face!'

Said the child, the Jordanian came out of nowhere, with tears on his eyes; the poor young beast had shocked him by the likes of his mere stance. He had within him the proper distance, with the man standing prone, exposed, his throat could've been had. The boy could've sworn and enacted revenge, yet. Upon seeing them, there was nothing else he could think off.

It was something neither the servant nor the master had spoken off, as the boy fell on his knees. Just as he abandoned whatever chance he was left with to see again.

'You dumb boy!'

Philip's eyes but froze on the boy's frame, just as he reeled in, wrapped around him, he took him home.

His father had been a great man.

'I hate niggers and I hate kikes.'

'Tell me more.'

'It's the only thing this world could do without. I'm sick of seeing them, I'm just sick of having to deal with them and with their bullshit. I loathe them' beasts alike, for they is the devil, walking on this earth.

They is the devil incarnate, and it is left to us to remove them from this world.'

'What lead you to this conclusion?'

'It's that they hate us because of what we are. They hate us for what we is and what we made in the past.

Niggers are lazy, niggers are obnoxious, evil, they're criminals, all of them. And the Semites, they're eviler, and they keep grudges for a long time, and they don't know anything about fairness. So they seek to punish us for treating them as they deserve to be treated.

They is to be lynched like them niggers and be put by them niggers' side. They know niggers are dumb; that's why they want us mixed with them, because they was us dumb. It's how world works, because the kikes find it easier to exploit the niggers, but not the whites; at least not the ones who won't take their shit.'

'I presume you're one of those people then?'

'No sir, I'm just a dumb old crazy man, that's all. That's all they call me. That's all they call a man trying to tell the truth. But they smear a man like that, they put him on the paper. And they yell nasty things at him, call him names; say he is insane.

You know they make money off fake numbers, right? They fake the numbers all the time, but they never mention when they does wrong to other people. It's always them, sir, always them on the first place, everyone else is left to suffer, sir.'

'What do you hate about niggers then?'

'They're lazy, dumb, have smaller heads, they're not smart, they're uncreative, they keep bashing white folk but never their own. And most of the niggers are busying themselves with killing other niggers, which the kikes are busy sweeping under the rug, while hiding it away because folk know better than to trust a nigger.'

His father was a great man.

He instilled a great deal of things onto him.

His father was a good man. His ancestors owned eighty slaves and when the time of their release came, they chose to stay.

Yet he wasn't exactly like his father, or much like his ancestors.

As peculiar as it were, he saw something in that boy.

For that reason he chose to take care of him from that point on. While the flight back was unsteady, broken, and split in half, the plane being crushed from every side, having prematurely landed, or only the front-side of it at the very least, the back-side of the plane would eventually make it. At the very least it's what he expected.

'Jordan, I think it's what I'm going to call you from now on, boy.'

But the boy didn't speak to Philip.

Instead, he retained a sad look in his eyes. One he couldn't draw his eyes away from him. Most of the passengers couldn't, at the very least.

They were incapable of fully understanding why he took him under his wing, though it was not something they outwardly displayed.

Cold winds brushed past them from the gaping wound that lay in front of them. Somehow he knew that the pilot didn't survive the crash, yet the back of the plane was still set in flight, and would continue so until it will have reached its destination.

He looked at the boy for a moment before he wrapped his arm around his shoulder.

'I'm taking you to a place where you won't have to feel pain any longer, boy.

A place where you won't have to.'

He was silent. For a moment, it's. It's as if he remembered, who he was; what he was, from where he came from, who his ancestors were. Most importantly, it was the fact that, even if it were for him to change, he had still caused enough harm to become irredeemable. It's who he was. Taking care of a scarred boy wouldn't change a thing; nothing would. Whatever other claim to the contrary would be a child's toil and he was not a child any longer.

But he didn't feel bad for himself as much as he felt guilty for the boy.

'The boy's your responsibility now, Philip; you hear?

His parents were killed during the Arab-Turkish fed un' the eighties', there's nothing left for him anymore. Not for a dumb blind child who knows no better than to ask for his parents and gran'.

If you don't take him with you, he's going to die.'

He reflected on it for moment, yet his mind was still yet to be made. If only I could.'

'Listen to me Jordan; because I am about to impart as great a knowledge onto you as possible. And careful not to mind yourself, as I'm only going to say this once, I know you can hear me, don't cover your ears boy.'

Philip stepped over his toes, then he began violently punching him until his ears rang.

'Sometimes people need to be harsh and evil in order to have something done, you understand?

It's never easy, but you got to know that some evils are acceptable. Lies may not be, but committing acts of what might be considered evil, which might apply even in a world of grays, in which something like that is completely, objectively, undeniably harmful, destructive and unexplainable, one cannot deny that it's what a man must do.

It's a harsh choice we don't want to think about. Regardless of what people might think of you for some reason, one must commit as harmful as act if that means protecting his own. Otherwise future generations might suffer, just like you, right boy? Do you hear me boy? Are you listening to me boy?

I'm only trying to help you, it's what I always wanted to do, it's the only thing that will do.'

Before long the plane had finally arrived at its destination, right in time, right where it needed to be.

He's grabbed the boy, leaped over, was the first to go through the rails, then took his time abusing him, giving him a beating such as this world has never seen before. He's hit him just about everywhere, relentlessly butchering him in broad daylight but never as close as to kill him. Only as near as to get as close as to cripple him, only that. He had anger problems and the kid was but scum, he had to be put through a wall. He's seen too much, he still had a mouth.

But that was enough in public, they still had to reach home, that's where it would truly begin, that's when he'd be put down to work. It's where he's had his first shot in a long, long time, all the way back from Jordan.

Once the waters cleared, he looked at the puddle in the middle of the room. This was a new carpet he's paid a lot of money for.

'You know who bought that fucking carpet boy? I have.'

He'd just as soon chop him into pieces, sell him over part by part until he's done. He had to be shoved through a fucking brick wall, he had to suffer a little. He had to be abused, just a bit, only a bit. That's never done no harm to anyone. So he's beat the child in the morning, during the mid-day, throughout it, then, when the night came, he's put him in a bright-lighted room where he would lose not a second, despite what he would mutter, the little shit knew what went on, he's not blind. I know he's not blind, he's merely pretending, dumb little shit.

Grabbed by the throat, thrown across the first wall until he splattered then fell down; picked him by the collar then flung him on his back. Stomped on his throat, spat on his face, only to draw the soles of his foot across his face and rub it in. Then lift the boy up, unwrap him of everything then make him stand in shame. Beat him again and again, then again and again, only to drag him around the corner and make him lick the spot, remind him to lick the spot, back inside.

'This is what I've become, boy.

Did you hear me?

Now look at me, boy, look at me now, boy!'

But he could not and it was late, he's. It was.

It was always like a dream. Always waking up from it as if it came as a lucid realization he could never get out of.

'You killed him.'

The voice spoke.

In a never ending fit of rage, he stood there and didn't know what to think.

'You shouldn't have kept me alive to witness this.'

'I.'

'You should've left me die.

I would've had myself heaved into nothingness than to witness what you've become, Philip. I never wanted this, I never asked for this, but now.'

He was stuck.

The dream was over, and it was still like he had yet to come to the realization of what he's done.

There was a knock on the door but it came too late.'

'You know what they'll do to you, do you not?'

'I.'

There was the blue sky waiting for him, in a sea of red, in the midst of the night. There was nowhere else to run. There was nowhere he could hide.

‘I don’t know where to go.’

‘There’s only one direction, how could you forget about it?’

‘I didn’t think they would know. I.’

But there was nothing else he could think of.

‘You should’ve known they would catch you eventually.

I’m the only thing you’re going to hear from now on, before they enter, before they break through the door.’

But he refused to listen.

His eyes seemed surreal, blank, transparent, non-existent. He did not even dare touch the child in the pool he lay; as he simply averted his eyes, drawing near to the shaking door.

Before he realized what happened, it was already over.

‘And now that the court adjourns, I pass the sentence to you Phillip Cling Montgomery, as guilty of all charges of first degree murder, to which you are to be escorted the chair as you are to receive the capital punishment.’

Where his heart finally sunk into dirt.

But he survived, Phillip Scarf survived.

‘Master, dear master, I brought you back.’

To where it all started, back in Jordan, in that secluded den, where, between every dead woman, a portal made out of cut-women feet appeared to be set. As soon as they were used, every single one of the untouched slippers was made to fall to the side, then left to abide.

Knowingly he asked.

‘Am I in a coffin?’

‘Your first cast was initially, incinerated, my dear lord, I presume you’ve come to expect this, if anything at all. This is your new body.’

And before it shut itself up, the peculiarly deformed, red-tinted malignancy he had come out of, disappeared, then was set to lay aside, not to be met again, not to be put, and dead. Throttled, every woman-foot was then burnt as they fell. Buried as well, but him? He felt rather elated. Philip never felt greater than he felt then.

‘Wait, but what have you done?’

Alas, he had finally realized.

As soon as he turned towards the empty slippers, upon the face of the one contorted sitter, whose body leaned against the nearest side of this stone-lodge he entered, he stumbled upon her face. He neared her, then with a brush across her face, he finally came to realize who she was. It couldn't have been her, not here, not now, not then. But it her, it was indistinguishably her.

He had killed his wife, it was none other than her; that could not be denied. And this vile thing that pushed deeper in his heart only begged for this to be some illusion, a fake, a look-a-like, anything but her. Yet. This was the last time I could ever stumble like fool, he said to himself, lain upon her brow where, upon a split eye, he came to realize, it was not him.

'It wasn't the one who did it.'

He pushed his fingers through her socket, only to pull out a letter.

'It was I.'

Singed by no one. He immediately counted everyone in sight. He knew something was off. Two feet were missing. It was hers.

But he wasn't in Jordan anymore, it couldn't be. Someone took out the sand, someone cut that piece of the world, and they reconstructed it in his room.

A door stuck out against this peculiar reconstructed background.

Of course, this was her room. He was still in his manor, back into his childhood home.

'The murderer cannot be far.'

'But Philip, he knows where you live, he knows where you are, he knows of our ritual, look, the bodies were taken, carried over, then placed in the exact same spot. Even the sky is painted on the walls.'

'That's a hole.'

'Which is irrelevant; you shouldn't known better than to do it under public view.'

'Yet you're the one who ordered me to do it in the first place.'

'I cannot be solely blamed for it.'

'Then we shall find the murderer.'

And from that point on, it was settled. First, in order to be certain, he had to check whether or not it was as he suspected. He would have to check where Jordan was buried; stopped immediately as he saw a few detectives, all lain across the front door, across the room, standing there, sharpening their fingers, standing. Eating, preparing, this looked closed and dilapidated.

The investigator remembered a conversation he's had earlier with his wife.

‘Mary, I am your loving husband, yet I feel betrayed by you.’

‘Why, what have I done?’

‘You looked at another man.’

‘I’m sorry for what I am.’

‘We’re getting a divorce and I’m also beating you.’

‘Don’t do it, please.’

‘I’m going to do it, I’m going to beat you, woman, then I’m going to divorce you.’

‘But Bow, we haven’t signs a prenup.’

‘It doesn’t matter because I’m going to be you to death. I’m going to kill you with my fists. You are going to get beaten to death. My fists are going to break you, I am going to end you.

You my wife are dead to me and will be dead for everyone that’s even known you. But that’s only because you betrayed me.’

‘Why must we always have this conversation over something that happened ten years ago?’

‘Because, as you know, every time I get within an each of dealing a deadly blow that may shattered your wrists, cracking your ribs, smashing your jaw, squashing your pretty little plump lips, undoing my buckle, I stop. That’s only because I’m a good man. And good men may not do what I do, to put you, in an early grave. I spare you because I love you.

Yet at the same time, I need to make sure you understand that I don’t like you looking at other men.’

‘That happened a long time ago. I’m blind.’

‘I made sure of that.’

‘You cut me down there so I may feel no pleasure either, yet I never betrayed you in such a manner.’

‘From what I know, but I said to myself, better safe than sorry; I know you don’t understand what fairness is. You owe me as much, you owe me your life, because I took you in, I put clothes on you, I spent good money on you. You’re fed, you’re played with, I gave you gifts. And how did you repay me when the time came?

You threw it all out of the window, with my heart. My heart is broken, just like your body. Just like my body.’

She was having a seizure that sent her in a coma, where she lost her consciousness, before the back of her head curved backwards, slipping off the stairs, as the entire body weight dragged her down, completely shattering her lower body, ribs and then carving her open like one of the pig-fillets that were put on a Thanksgiving day where she became a seal-shape effigy that began opening herself up only to be completely rotten by the amount of pain that shot through. Two seconds, at least spent dry. Without the on-lookers one would know when to die.

‘I have killed my wife that day though I feel little shame for what I’ve done, or so I thought.

But I’m starting to feel regret now, and I. I don’t know what to do from this point on. I’ve started thinking about growing old. I started thinking about living a life, consider a life without suffering. But on my way to that paradise, through that peculiar stretch of light, I don’t know why. It was an impulse I could never explain, but I.

I looked behind me, in my confusion, thinking I could see her again. Then I remembered, and just as soon, in that moment I realized she’s not there. She could never have been there.

You see, fellow inspectors. It was a dream, this expectation of mine, I thought it would never end. I thought I could hold onto everything and make it as it was, my friends, my family, those I loved. Yet then I realized, I can’t; this is what put me on this thing, this quest, this search of mine if you will it. This world of lies, this thing, it made me think, does it truly deserve to survive? Should it be allowed to?

Why? Why should anyone be allowed to make it? Why should anyone be allowed to survive in a world like that?’

‘Yet you’re the one who ran away, isn’t that what you told us? You’re in no measure fit to judge us when you’re no different than us.

In the end you could never escape the nature you’ve accused the world of being guilty of. So what then?

Will you hold yourself accountable for the same crime you’ve criticized us of? You don’t know anything of loyalty either, but who does? Loyalty to a limit is no loyalty and no amount of lying will change it, either to the state, to your fellow man, to your family, or to everything else. It cannot work that way.’

‘It does, it has to, I know it has.

It’s not fair, I failed to keep a hold of them, I deflected, that doesn’t mean other people will.’

‘Most people do, you cannot put an end to something’s life in order to preserve it.’

‘I can, I can, I know it’s not the fix, but it’s all I have. With it, I. I will be capable of preserving everything as it once was, everything as I once was.

One day, I shall do it. I shall take claim over this world, no matter what it does to me, I will find a way to keep it all as it once was.’

With it, he stopped talking.

‘I am insane but no one believes me, I want to slaughter you all.’

And he turned and all of the sudden pulled out a gun and made like in a sauna where they were sweating red vapors, having left early.

‘That fool just did my work for me, now I can leave and be at peace.’

He thought and just as soon as he was back to his nerves he considered the following, finally being allowed to do as he pleased, as he felt his duty to simply go there as early as then.

Chern and Other

'I can't fucking stand it, all of you. All of god damn all, of you, criminals, all of you!'

Too damn tiresome.

God damned frustrating broken world.

Everything was torn apart, every piece of wall, every stranded piece, every floating city, falling pit, every continent and the ones within. Too hard keeping up with everything.

'Deep Scum-throng Nine has come to report.'

Coming from a blue Paradise of long, deep-burrowed parasitic hounds-cars, he started shaving skin away.'

His long-finger stretched, drenched in what appeared to be a head-chariot which drew him around the room. Enough space lay for him to display the malignant side of his skin-shaping sapience which drowned his senses until his heart throbbed no longer. Ill-in the head, he spoke with a false tongue, once it was looked upon, wronged of evil, it spoke even less.

'Could've gone two more steps there partner, no one was hiding. No one out in the open either. It was just how it was suppose to be.

Everyone acted accordingly.'

'What are you talking about?'

'Some men were killed during our stay.'

There was nothing there.

Although eventual, despite having taken time, both the Duke and Malt would not comply, and at the threshold of destruction meeting, through torn ship and least of all, melted reality, there stood in front of them, where lay, an open door to the planet where he laid.

There, they walked, simply in sound. And once upon the sight, they met him, less in doubt.

All of the sudden he arose.

Whence he never met, deposed, there stood Tongue-Agagemnon resting, watching upon an utmost uncanny sight. He never understood how mighty, and how least of all were they benign.

He rose up from his standing fat-pillar, upon whence he rested from the tireless pace. Whence again, he would be met uncannily, before the others could find a way in, and test the rims and outer reaches. Barriers from whence humanity arose. Thence the tenderness faded and never would he awaken forth, only now could he understand whence, the making, when it happened for them to come forth.

‘Why have we been brought here?’

Asked Malt, who could only think of a man named Charles.

‘You were in need to be shown and look for it so you may know of a way out before the death that’s about to come and claim us all down.’

The Duke responded.

‘Both of you have been dragged here by my choice.

Make no mistake, for I have willed it so. And If I were to will it so, remaining, I shall do it no more than I’ll have stalled it more and more so.’

Thence, upon a sudden stare, finally Tongue-Agamemnon finally confronted them, aware.

There was only a ripple in the water, but neither of them made it through.

Everything had to be left behind, there was no point in pursuing any of it any longer. All was too flawed and too sickening.

‘Who survived?’

‘I don’t know.’

‘There’s no one there any longer, we’ll have to make it through, somehow.’

‘I can’t, I haven’t. It’s, it’s late to be sorry, isn’t it?’

‘It is.’

‘What now? Why won’t you tell me?’

‘I don’t know.’

‘What did you expect?’

We found out about it too late now. It’s, there’s nothing we can do.’

‘They all had to die.

Plain and obvious as it may be, there was never a chance for either of them to make it through.’

‘But.’

‘It’s better that way, there’s no need to lie about anything. We’ll finally be at peace now.’

They walked, a few of the survivors.

‘It is too late that I realized what was happening there, but I’ve got no intention of lying. We’re both responsible for this, aren’t we?’

There was no clear land ahead. And those who made it still felt as if part of the world still crumbled behind them.

‘Why, what shall we do then?’

‘Walk and meet the man in-between the rows. He shall help us make sense of everything then.’

And they were only trying their longer-hands, they dead beds and the bodies that were pushing through themselves again. For plainer steel and tiny mountains kneels and followed, levitating atop the earth.

There was a poor thing twas’ that followed.

They were in the house for hours, after all, standing around, picking off the table, through it, past a hole, and through the building, and on the road. They seemed combined, pushed through, bitten off, molded together, as one would see them through. Some of the walls were made of hues and shades. Reality was broken down to the slightest and the nastiest of looks again. Bitten down and melted. Shoved through. A few of the ceilings were part of the watch. Towers were encrusted, and many alike.

Some kettles made of livers passed around, the faced one push just about everywhere as his kingdom’s fall had only been part. And there, surrounding them the dark. Farther standing, the ships and the submarines and everything that fell about, giants of decay, the legacies and the ones that fell. Many dead and all surrounding, those that fell and never found them; one would bow upon meeting Chivalry as he wasn’t proud. Of being looked down by the bird, by the nastiest of turns.

Masked men gathered and came. And many lepers, Laplanders and those that came, fat, the gluttons with vessels on their backs. Mischievous liars and many petty blinds, some men who tried and others whom died, most of all, him of all.

But nothing could stop his outstretch as his tendrils pulls, his spires writhed, tendrils whipped, and long-defeat, he finally arrived. Agamemnon’s will, his scum, his try, all lead to death.

And there was no life that escaped his reach, no universe and no end that would thick or be missed, and in the end humanity ended.

There he lay, a man walking on plains land. Named Choke, he stood aghast. A dark wind had only strewn his neck as it pushed through the last of his people.

He was pale, suddenly, looking back at a legacy of lies. How could one hope to carry on like that any loner? Within his grasp, the dead had touched, of plain corruption as well as everything else, there was nothing else for him to look back to. All too tiresome, all too plain to see.

He walked and tried, but after a while, bad habits all around. His throat was stuffed, and could only walk while pushing through. A fairness of knives, all pushed deeper inside had turned the insides of his throat to confetti. Two substances cold, they torn apart the insides of his mouth, and walked upon a cradle of gore from which his wings had sprouted. And from what was left, inside that burst inside his chest, there pushed out a single opening that crushed the stones and worthless ones who followed after. Wreathing as they chained themselves with long skin-ropes around his waist, to a man who stood there, turned, and revealed a chest all too protruding. After kneeling, yet he felt, all that worthlessness pushing dread. For he bled in the making; and inside there he stilled, all the children yet he drilled, right through his bone-girdle.

His face was as pale, they all hung past the rails, and could only stoop so low and yonder, they were pulled, dragged behind, never stood.

Dirty, he was dirty from the residue which encompassed his body, from which he could never sprout about. Nor could he remove all those dead oranges that were impaled through his skull, though his spine never shook as he ate them. Though it tore, and it turned, though disjointed and plowed, he ate a bit of his head ceiling.

From whence he came, they stood plain and ate what came after him. But two men chose to lay, and pointers dragged, his throat was strained.

He held no hope and shared no wonder. And whom shall fear him, least of all would they be spared, there in the distance there lay a Vigil, waiting for his return, as from servants yet to masters begging for him in their statuesque heads. With their never-more tormented dread being shared between one another as they spared none more the sight, through their ribs and in the depths, from whence like tadpoles they crept, soon enough they stood there, standing. In the dirt and past forth, through the filth or the grit, many of them started foaming.

They formed huts, little rods, and their homes, were of no worth, as it only happened for them to be sinking.

He willed it and so it was.

A head imploded and from the remains a single musk-like trench emerged, as his blood coiled, hardened and clogged in the air, running rampant as it filled the scent with a single feeling that emerged. He was only trying to seek yonder.

He yelled and would not tell. He spoke tongues but they fell flat, as they were brought by the mouth of the burning iron, holes being wrung all around his body as he was poked. By whom if none else but the adversary that came out of the old door, there stood the tree-like substance, which gurgled itself as desperate as it had become.

As a serf would be desperate to stand his ground, this was his land and not a single piece of it could be defiled by that one. Filth of forgotten gems, he carried them and strangled each in part, suffocated in boiled blood, turned around by the mere forced of the tubes that came from inside the ground and connected to his throat. The man had been wrapped and caught by them, unfortunately unaware of what was going on any longer as the strongest of bonds all of the sudden pushed inside his socket bolts, pushing them out.

For in his eyes there were but pints, and they crept out of him, and as they gotten through, with all sinew, they started pushing out flying. Brought to the desperate man, he merely skirmished around the ground in search for something he may push around and claim his own. His throat was only open now, and in the making, it pushed itself around so much more, only for the adversary, whose body was of such a metal just as pure as he seemed to be fashion out of the gurgling substance that flattened the surface it melted upon and swoon.

He saw and only nodded. Many other bots and many wires that were pushed around, inside his body flattened, as they kept him living. Though in peril he could not, for the likes of him understand where the dirt had come from, why he was eating it, instead of searching for his eye-bolts.

‘You should look at the flying crown of clouds, they’re yellow-orange and have hardened as they crisped. I see that there are angels caught inside of them, many of them are just as eyeless as you are within them.’

And he went on to describe the chains and the ropes, both of which only pushed along and around and only pushed, dreading on, making them feel of light. Even lighter than a feather as their bodies shot out their heads, as they looked like the insides of sculptures, finally praying to their orb-the god, a cube that was being brought to roundness and have fashioned a man out of the most unnerving things they could find around and push inside of. And this hybrid had become a strange foundation for all the elements of gas to enter in. As from every side of the cube, from every edge that was rounded, there appeared a man, dumb-founded, barely born out of the barrel of guts that pushed out of his head, worn-out, he had come to be. No longer a humanoid, but a barrel head that could see on every side. From every segment there looked no normal face but one that projected the entire arm-span of a eighteen meters, being replicated even inside of while keeping its small primate brain intact. And from there on he started singing as his mouth projected even farther, spitting every tooth outside.

From the insides of his scum maker one could see only the derange ball that formed inside of his gut as well. He could not tell, but by then, the angels had entered the barely formed man in order to eat as much as they prayed and begged the cube to produce. Otherwise the demise of their race could come as quickly and way fastened as it were. Already they were on a still and could not do to tell. Where they might feed their lord, and of how much worth could they pay to keep the quiet?

For every one had started soon, entering their meat bodies in the crown of the swoon-sun which was the eye of the storm. No star had lain in the sky but a wind that turned and couldn’t, for the likes of it, try keeping the distance, straying into an abyss as the likes of which one has never seen. And no desperation could lead to them swaying, no wonder, and no praying.

Dark portrayals of man appeared, everywhere in the dark sky. They only grabbed one another as they came screaming, desperate to catch the creature below the rims of another cry. An echo that would be sojourned, subjugated by the likings of the heathen-pagans that had come, out of flights of desperation, they ate what they could of the castrated fiend and creatures, servants of their lord.

And would’ve killed the one below them if they had the ability to move on their own.

These broken images of man, who were as giants in the course of their veins could do nothing but beg and spare none for what was fair.

Their bodies were lackluster and begged to get bedraggled when they could not fathom being unfed. Some were reluctant to do it, as, despite having been bred with a long arm that outstretched and pushed out of the bone-socket in which they had been buried they could not fathom pulling out. They were only dreaded as they had been unable to carry themselves over, therefore they only pulled and impaled their own heads, immediately ending their own lives as they bled. And the oak was bloodied, pierced by the most unfathomable shades of color, until they could no longer be kept in place.

‘Kill him, you need to obey me, angels, for I am the Adversary Plate.’

And Plate could only look the part as he revealed that much of that which appeared to be the soles of the ground was the gourd of blackness, the metal had been wrought in a black chasm that had been darkened by the fire. And the same fire had almost turned his oak to crisp. As he looked upon it, he realized the unfavorable event of the catastrophe that was about to be instilled. The peculiar man only began stabbing various parts of his face in order to find the sockets.

As Choke had done, finally he achieved sight. And with it in mind he started stabbing various parts of his body as pain fueled him through the funnel, seeing how every grim-piece of the ground was of an absolute dark-like red, he only pierced the sight even further after noticing that one of the angels had flown across the gap in sight, and flown through the air, he’d come alive. Only to be noticed and pulled, length by wire as he was eaten and pushed. Eaten slowly but very much alive, as every strand of the cord that he was made of delivered a signal of pain into the angels’ head, that could be seen in his eyes. He suffered ever and ever more as slowly as the man had gone through him. His inability to stop only reflected as one could not even, for the likes of him, help with the tenderness. The whim of death had flown through.

He was dead for one second, then came back through. And by the time Choke had reached the head, he started eating the angels’ face slowly. Which only acted in the same way a human would, gashing and gargling with the blood, the oak-substance only shuddered in the distance upon the sight, as it slowly disappeared, Plate neared and challenged Choke.

Although unarmed the feet and weapons that would be perilous would never be brought again. Not in the light, in vein they asked of him to be hanged. Pain would settle after that. But the inability committed.

He was sickened by a simple bow, and Plate fell below, unable to wreathe and fight or face the challenge that was might. His mouth erupted from the back-spines, and metal dined on hard land. Upon the fall, Choke drove forth and messed with his worth, blow after blow and pounded, he sickened him with just another wedge. Pain had served just as much as he would be aware of the pain instilled.

‘I yield to you, greater foe, I am no longer an adversary, but I should know.

How is it that you’ve come to be as strong as this?’

‘I shall reveal naught but since uncannily starving.

Since you will starve of blood, I take it that you’re to be flayed.

My servants store my organs, lying in their ditches praying. Know that I’m but invigorated by their might and the sight of them alone is enough for me to grow as I should know of no better hope.’

With which, the explanation, upon looking back as his creations, he grew in bulk and meat came back on, pushing as he grew. A staircase of stairs pushed him out of the way, until he grew an eight-forth scoundrel-leg, from his chest there pushed, with all the ribs connected and wrapped around it, set in flight. From that point on he flew into the sky and then killed all the angels.

With each that fell, and every death, Plate had realized that he was ruined, all ahead and never wondering of what he's done. The sky was pale as his skin was, but never had he a mind of the headless nature that was the storm of the sun. 'Wicked, no, I think there's something else about him.'

'What would that be?'

'I think there's some agony which is just as hardened as is his throat.

I think they planted but an uncanny stair-bobbling throb inside of it.'

'He'll kneel then, don't worry about it. I think he will, he has to, within reason. I will make sure one of us will slit his throat.

In the making with a single rope being used, once we dine, we shall see him stray and set aside everything he's even gone with.'

Forth they looked and shook the passing. They took turned, never understanding what the masses had meant upon coming back together and forming the most unnatural heads and bobbling dead-curtains that united. Many structured were enacted, wrought into the towering holds, the citadels being wrung from them, as they split their own and opened.

For in every man there was a skin-riot seed that could act in two ways. Either it would cause everyone to fight one another as they clashed, or it would cause a growth that would instead reach even farther and recreate the world as it once was. And there was no pity to be given. Pain was constantly being felt and passed down wild surroundings.

You could see it on their faces as their teeth were bloodied and only foamed instead. No man should face the dead that way. And no mirror would reflect such agony as that, the one would feel upon being faced with the reflection. Daringly they started cutting, never stopping until agony had been supreme. Fealty was a thing of the past, they were rats after all, all of them. And none would suffer more than they should be allowed, the gore of the stage.

The one that fell from beneath them started spreading, like the tongue of a liar, wrapping, stopping only when it could be done no more. Pain had made stars, and they were only present in miniatures, tiny yet benign. Others started spreading around, being unable to slip past the dead.

One could not be spared of the blood senselessness that was being shared between the two of them. They ate, the cannibals, they ate from their seeds instead of allowing for a city to be wrought.

'You filthy, disgusting, disturbing.'

Mad they told, they couldn't help it, this was just as worthless as their pitiful lives had been. There was no good reason to look upon the whim that entered them.

‘I wish there was a chance to spare, but, whom, are you tell them what to devour upon, to build upon pain and wonder. To build upon a butcher’s desperation.’

Yonder he relented, saw it fit. They could not help it but eat, and eat they would. Least of all would they devour, and seethe as to impress, confess to the pains that entered their heads.

But like rabid beasts they could not help themselves but eat and eat until one of the seeds came out of their own and wont. They floated about and cut through the pieces and the slightly deformed pockets air had breathed in.

Farther above the rims of the sea

A spoil of spoils and blood was reddened by the insects that carried it. For they came and foamed and brim upon the sails they neglected the view, from below the main-mast where the servants, kidnapped from the in-most cabin stood. Long before they had been given a chance to flee and walk upon nail-shut planks, upon a metal sea of coal surrounding the metal case upon which the entire ship had been ensnared and wrapped in. For, there up-front stood the captain, marked, then betokened as his head fell, the executioner then pulled him forth towards the many insects coming inside their own. He had been full of them more than any stoop and hive. Inside there were the tenebrous cacklers that started sharing in the light of many lost days and humming as they would they melted along the way as the ship drove forward and the blanket of metalized coal, within its coat turned to fire. Pushed through this hellfire of burning skin they saw the images within the ones that fell, the ones that had remained and knew it not to be the hellish realm their faith had once lead them to believe and lend upon the first and foremost of the first that fell, they realized again that this was no hell. But the first and foremost canary-cemetery, the insides of a forge where birds would be pushed in and make do with growing within the flames. Only to grow with feathers that were inbred, poking their own eyes as their tiny skulls started protruding and pushing the rest of their organs inside their enclosed beaks only so that they might survive the fire. And as it happened, the skull started wriggling like worms as they leaped on top the ship, using it as their own.

Setting forth to what seemed to be a poignant point in the sky, towards it they settled to flight and flight had not stopped any, for no weight could keep the ship down. Despite what was seen, there was a malignant device beneath the deck, made out of eight living men that were contorted and attached, their heads were not of men but of plain bits, almost old sheltered monitors that were completely made out of a cartilage that pointed in four directions and expanded upon only their ears but no other features. Blind and unable to breathe, they were hearing and with the help of their ear-drums they started converting heat into waves, which in turn appeared to redistribute weight into organic-matter like air molecules that started gnawing at them and punishing these inbred creatures for helping the mad canary and the humans escape. For it was not allowed for any creature to leave towards the hole in the sky for the maddening reason that they would die on the other side, but not instantly, nor normal means could be employed any longer since subjugation was an alternative that could be done for. And their guts were, if anything on display.

Since one of the lower crewmen started sharpening a knife, he realized that the other men had no better and no other alternative than what they had. They left him there to his own regards so he might cut to his own heart’s content and do as he pleased and molest and do until his hands could do it no longer.

Afterwards, he got bored of unwrapping their insides, seeing how they were never-ending and pushing out of them, as if they were eternally connected to a gutturally production dimension of unfathomable quantities they could not, for the likes of them deal with, if they were to be cut. Men had long been warned about that but they could not help themselves but wonder, just how deep and how much farther in could one go through this gut tunnel until he could finally be met by something he wanted to taste.

And this was such a man, first Man Joint-Skinny, who had skinned one of the air-privateers who were helping the ship set into fight. He didn't know that, but outside the ship, the planted Canary and the human beings were already looking at a sky that was spreading and was completely made out of gut-clouds that added themselves together yet were inhumane and anything but humanoid. Since they were only put there waiting to become something else, suddenly they transpired, becoming puffier as skin started wrapping and pushing around, while variously headed-anchors-like puffs of smoke poked holes from their lungs. And in the distance, tiny smoke-like foundations could be seen being shot like mad-bullets that were being attached to the flying shrapnel-like stones that were being thrown from the other side of this blotched-like prison they had been imprisoned in for too long. It could not be, they were eaten and only pushed out diseased formation that were levitating in the air.

Once the stones started stacking on top of one another, many have pushed down, below the grounded water, in which they swam with fish-formations. Entire basins started drawing in together until they formed wild forms that were mostly hybridoids of various sphere and man-like pears that wore like mechanical black legs, arachnid-like with many men-fingers in their back which curved along as if they were actually only one giant snake that entered a hole, came out of another, entered one, came out of another. And those started flaking, but not skin, instead they coated their own with their nails in order to reduce the friction and the damage they were doing to their blood-curdling minions that came out. Some of them were parasitical in nature and only appeared to be stuck onto the main body before they could finally change in size.

And many of those formations were dragged down because of the entire weight the parasites were seemingly producing out of their bodies while the back of their heads were only growing ever so smoother so the legs could get into their automatic motions. The black-metallic legs were only skinning their backs in order to appease this wild living fire which would stop taking their lives.

But there in the distance, they broke the illusion of there being an ever-encompassing ever-lasting piece of all. Instead of one paying its respects to the damning architecture of the wildly deformed, one had to look at a near-canon tube that had a light in it. Which seemed only to fire or prepare to fire at will, from the depths of which a cry of roses tainted the destruction of a great portion as it fell into the sea. Revealing that below the rims of the anchors and below the ship there were many window-like plasters of stone that blocked everything from falling through, pointlessly throwing itself past the reeking masses of skeleton-bashed out bodies that followed. Many thrown and breaking, as the hole emerged upon a much greater incertitude.

The fire stopped erupting from the metal sea as soon as the water started connecting with the one outside, steam hardened, creating malignant structures of white-puffy alloy that tried creating canary-heads, wings, even human hands that stretched along in order to grab the ship. But they couldn't reach it in time before the entire façade fell down. And the Canary and the humans escaped the malignant hopeless woe.

‘Who is he and why has he come to beat upon my spiked door?’

He was someone of name, the heritage of which was poorly if not malignantly understood and taken out of the way. He was skinned alive but walked and appeared to have as walking prosthetics some uncanny looking leech-fat blobs that were wrapped around his legs with the teeth of a shark. And they were bone-deep pushed through as they allowed no kind of traction to be held or dragged no less than they should. It was even, they were drowned, in the room, the water was sound.

Every time someone made a noise, they looked upon the skin, breathing deeply as to attempt to curb the suffocation only to point at the flight of the ship.

‘Is that the thing that’s causing us to suffer?’

Have I only been disturbed to see my end?’

‘Indeed you have, my dear master, but I see no point in drawing on when they want you dead.

Look out there, past the tainted oak-like buildings, the stuffing of skin in the surrounding black-like pools and skin-like tools encompassed around them like armor. Are they not the sole survivors of the age when apes and cannibals mixed together to create eight-legged creatures?’

For their backs appeared so, in their trunks, at the middle, pushing above, they proved to bear encrusted traps, rounded and so, if not as much as the door, to hold their primitive sides above. Hanging upside down as all the limbs pointed out from the primate. And if seen from the distance one would think that instead of a neck, a long hand held upon a primate head, yet it was not so. As it only seemed to push even deeper and have instead, taken hold of a few human children.

‘We have to claim them back.’

But the man stopped and grabbed his neck, ready to choke when needed and never questioning any of what’s been happening so far. His feet were broken in, he had no mind and was only a disease for this plighted earth. The primate didn’t need to eat, they didn’t need to breathe either, because of their bone-like meat-fragmented devices which looked like giant guns turned on themselves which pumped air through their very veins and blood with the help of nail-shooting motions.

Long before they fell, they came to realize. If everyone was choking but them, why were the children, the infant still alive, kicking and yelling while being unable to stop or be as concise or contrived by what was going on? It was simple, too simple yet too benign. They didn’t inject the children but had combined with them, feeding them until they’ve been out of their minds.

And some brains and necks melted. Others were unable to push out of themselves, while there, out in flight they asked.

‘What happened to this town?’

The people did not respond to what was going on. Instead they appeared to be too appeased by the disease known as choking. There they stood and waited, despite the fact that they shouldn’t, nor would they talk for hours, until the last reverb came and killed all humans, with the exception of the infants who should grow.

There was the Mad Cattle Herd

In the Prairie, where their legless fat only dragged them forth, many cut and wrought to knees. Kicked down and below to see, some walked upon as men on cinder. Other defiled as much as to be completely butchered until their bones stuck out like beds of nails.

‘See? I can sit on it and I feel no pain, oh this majestic equilibrium in uncanny.’

He said, but just as soon as he placed his body, right as soon to be, an ultra-sharpened bone a throttle, pushed through his neck like the bottle in a sharp battle with the drunk. Men took another shot in his name and left him to rot there in the open field. For his own sake he could not help it, on the whim, the cutting. Desperate, another man arrived forth, stood in front of him and started pulling a meat-cone, complemented by meat-blood.

‘I wish I could drown in it for once, do you understand?’

I wish I could be placed upon the altar of stone and see.’

But it was there no more. Instead the cattle formed a circle in the air, where they floated, reverted their skin inside out, evaporated half of their insides only to rearrange their bones. From inside of them they shot each man, pushing them around until they could be gotten no more. Instead they begged for mercy which the cattle granted. Lo’ so far and see, they were gathered around and before anyone could see, they formed their own territories, where their bones had become their fence. Men were trapped inside as they were being punished.

Yet this was no divine justice as they were not merely tortured. Instead, slowly but defiantly they started extending their mouths until the lower jaw became their legs and the upper head drew into their tail bone. From inside of them came out the humanoid-bulls, which simply trampled over the fences, being as deranged enough to be completely armored in bull-like deformed skin, their own kin being used for protection. Black horns pushed out of them and surrounded their collar bones from which the flowering root system drew out until they grew bull-like charging expressions.

Before their rituals could begin, they only seemed to surround one another as they wept within the circle, for the loss of man.

‘We know of your sacrifice, oh, masters.

But at the same time we know of everything you’ve done to us and everything that shall be done.’

For what dope their insides were pushed through them, the result had only carbonized the lower sides of the bull’s guts until something as repulsive as a chrome started pulling out instead of their normal looking blood. And they prayed towards the dead men skin. Waiting for hours until their patience thinned. Grouped in pairs of twos, unable to make do with what was going on they split in halves.

‘What’s been going around here?’

Asked the in foremost Gennecessor of the cattle, whose ingratitude to the new arrivals showed only now.

‘We need you to lend upon us a single, one, but one, not many one reason not to kill you on sight.

We shall do it if we have to, skewer your guts and make a role. We have to creep forth and climb upon that altar of stone.’

For the inner most important dream of the cattle was to be sacrificed upon an altar in the same way a lamb would be, otherwise, who knows what might happen, who might look and who might see what’s going on there. Lo’ and plunder, guts were plenty. For the holes inside the people were wide-spread and they only followed the dead coming from only one and one simple direction. Through North and even farther, they came yonder, the bovine liveries, whose backs were only prone to growth.

And servants came through serpentine-fat worth as they started floating in the air. Hanging low in true despair.

‘Shame we have to go and shave a little off our numbers.’

‘We have to work harder to appease the cattle-prowl.’

Of which hardened greater husk, upon being revealed upon the empty field of dust, they rested on empty graves and had nothing to eat any longer, largely deformed an uncannily fermenting. As their worthlessness only dreaded, upon the fields that never ended, from which the fragments, yielded of air, disease was carried and pushed away. From their depths, they had known and had thrown but the most uncanny bulls into the spring-walls until their heads were bashed down their knees and ripped out, standing. Some sat, but other died as bipeds.

‘I see no reason to continue past that mark of land. There’s a patch there, we might be able to stand and count.’

Worthless, all of them were worthless, and unusable. And once the master had returned, one of the impure humans, they had been butchered in front of his young as he plowed with his uncanny doubtless gray hounds. Many whom had tied eight-fours, and many whom had died and were pushed into the most strident curves, neither of them being spared. None to care and none to plunder, they were slaughtered before reaching the altar.

‘See now, my dear sons, I see no reason to climb there.

There’s just one ladder made out of their remains and there can only be one, unwasted.’

‘Lend it onto us, oh, father, allow us to do as we please. We shall see for a view after and do to them as we came through.’

And there were other reasons they might spare him of the talk, especially since they could be beaten after that. Yet the chance to be met upon the altar did not fade. They were granted as much, the remains.

‘Use them but don’t stall up there, I see no reason to spend as much if never such a thing as might belong to me. I don’t want to stay here any longer.

I think we’re being tailed.’

But by whom not even he could tell.

Nonetheless, one by one, the children were going, trying their best, thawed upon the smolder coming from the sun, distracted by its heat, they noticed it done. There was but yet a pair. Of young cattle-prayers whose legs were there, inside their heads, connected right beyond and in front of their ears. What appeared to be protruding from their backs, bodies longer than they were supposed to be had, worn out before they were wasted, eaten and detested, lay the remnants of a bull. Within an ear-shot, and the slightly put in-front centimeters that came along, there came only they knew, only they knew that he wasn’t supposed to be there.

To be carved or have the strange pointer, that was rounded as if made in clay but not by hands, only the fingerprints could be said to have crushed their prefrontal cortex.

And they only spoke to the ladder and the ladder came back. Though in trance, the first child only realized that he was unable to figure out the tendons that pushed through. They were unable to feel now, both of them, tenderly crying past the true sight of the world. A fragrance of colors that were being shined in their eyes; which indeed brought from the farthest spaced in the distance the men who were only made out of their other inverted cattle-prods, spines of insect-like appendages of bone, thrown around a flying cowl of fat that almost appeared to drip. Bearing it they started messing, with the dripping, empty-gazing.

As every sight of the cowl only managed to grow and push them out, as the young hated being shown. Messed with by desperation, they were created out of the most peculiar elements that could be taken from their surroundings. Many nails flew from the empty coffins, mixing with dust, the insides and everything around. And uncannily set they were only pushing each other ahead to melt and mix. Yet the vocal cords were not made for such a connection, nor the cognitive organs, nor the direction in which they spared. Through and through they shattered their bonds, and stared at each other for about minutes at large.

They fell, dragged below, unable to stand and show what they were made out of.

‘Father, cut the ladder!’

One of the children shouted. But he wasn’t heard, nor would he face himself, of little worth as he was, he questioned his future and left everything behind. They felt the shakings, saw vibrations in the ripples of air. Chimes heard, and seen through the curved that entered their throats.

It was a mere spine-thorn, or something as sharp, like a nail coming out of their humane-hands, as they drew near in flight. And despite the barely put together face, two sets of eyes were deformedly placed on it and on its chest, which was being way outstretched, as it formed the most deranged idols. Though it could not be seen, it pushed through its back, revealing as much as it could be thought and dreaded, waited as the red turned to a deeper hue, hardening as meat revealed, an appeal of worm-like features drawing out. Yet they stopped and hardened making it seem like some device or the piece of a puzzle that was being broken through. Shivering as it were, the child took a pair of straws and shoved it through its chest, seeing it wreath about as its children came to the rescue.

The little cattle-fiends only leaped and wrapped themselves around it, being largely unable to let go. For all the dread that was theirs and in the wrong, they drank from the blood as deer would eat snow. Stuffing the other ends with their tongues, they stopped it just in time for the ladder to be cut.

Their father knowing it to be so, he pushed the axe handle, throwing it to the side. Then he caught both of his children without having realized the damage he had done.

Instead of falling, the ladder writhed then started curling itself past the point, drawing upwardly until it grew into a single point where it had entered the altar. From its depths and past the stone, inside the cracks, there they shone, as their eyes could be seen distancing themselves from within the largest of depths. Deformed but retracted, thrown and messed with as they came apart, they darted inside, even deeper than about fifteen meters, then pushed through a single cloud.

Then as they messed, yet they ran.

Vowing not to speak about it any longer as they put their past behind and made out of the Pirie.

Two Tendons

Made its heads, and they blew each other past malignant proportions. And not to forget themselves or whichever one of them was wrong, or to forget the fog that entered their skulls in part. Yet a shade of skin managed to push through, it hung about the sinew.

‘Here, there ho’ and wonder, who’s that man and whence he yonder?’

It was little than a prayer, the man who came, whose dance had been a saying. He beckoned for them to come and gather up, being stricken about their heads, broken down to pumps. Men grew in fat as did women, even the youthful despite their might, pain defiled every expectation as it drew on.

Past them, one could see, from the highest peaks of a roof, and be it as it may, he spoke no less of the dreadful birds that spoke to him, in dressed made out of nests taken out of the suicide forest. Where they brought him a piece of rope, so he may dwell upon it before he woke. Eternal slumber in a mad, forgotten paradise, he saw the men and women plowed through as he drew out their pink oil.

‘He’s made, isn’t it? Thief, he’s a thief, that’s something one ought not to do.

He’s going to kill my kin, what shall I do?’

‘Take this small blast of glass.’

And one bird spat it out in his hand and arm. Though it was painful, and though he bled, he couldn't help it again and again, he poured out of himself, unable to refrain from doing it again. Through and over, the reverie, he saw the shards deepening as far as a single blade would, but even worse, the butcher faded and only a bird from the crevice spoke and ended. Each sentence came with an end. And each verse was broken but it pointed in reverse.

'If you do not stop them from fattening they will only grow and push past, ever angered with distrust. You need to pull them off the oil chambers.

Down in the ground, there is dirt that filled the ashes with the girth of fire. If they each reach and bite on it, they shall all spread the dire fate and end all life in the rending. And past the woe, you must know that there's no way back after.'

And the crow bore the incisors of a viper, though hardened much more so than a needle-bottle that grew and pushed through its boundaries, and it broke its beak and skull. Deranged in term and only gone when dismissed.

Now that it felt at peace, it pointed at the creature responsible with a wing.

Though it was nothing to be ashamed or dreaded to be looked upon, it bore the crowning-body of a lunging-centipede made out of eight hyenas that were wrapped around each other, that in its roundness and with the legs and canines pushing out, while the legs were inwardly placed and not to be seen about. Pushing out of the base, leading only the head of a radiator that was filled with eight dead men that were constantly pushed out of it, then drew back instead. Though their features were coincidental, they had heads like hammers and eight sides that protruded only through their arms. Some of which were long and melting, and ever-endingly flaccid set, dripping in quiet in the space left by the large encasement that was the self-eating centipede-hyena which guarded every piece of organic matter that dripped inside of it before it spake.

'I know that you're hiding.'

Short intermission, for what was worth.

There was a pitiful man, miserable to no end.

Of past attempts he sought, as lesser things arose to fashion something of his own. It was all a failure, every single one seemed to belong to someone else. They had to be poisoned and abandoned, filled with duds. Killed on the way up front.

'We have to keep the heels inside the god of misery going, otherwise we won't be able to reach that point.

One day, perhaps, you shall reach him, but until then you must return to thine work. It doesn't end until your hands drop and your body dies with them.

Return to it now, in full focus.'

He called upon it, but the god of misery did not answer. He was too benign for his own good. Too forgotten after a fashion.

‘But this is for your own good, remember. Let it drown, be it as it may. We were never meant to make it this far in the first place.’

‘We can still make it through, just barely, even if it’s in the nick of time. We’ll find a way. There should be something out there.’

They looked, dragging their arms as they were shaken and almost torn apart. A weird motion arose, from the looks they bore in each other’s solar regions. They basked so much into the sun that it almost looked like they were.

Done walking.

‘Can we take a break?’

‘Not yet, every ounce of an effort makes a difference, I think. Perhaps nothing is meant to survive, perhaps some things should die off, you know? It’s for the better if everything dies into a swoop.

And, nothing, there won’t be anything holding us back any longer after that.’

‘Do you truly think so?’

‘No.’

But neither of them looked at one another past the rocks. Somehow the sea still merged with the horizon. The surroundings were bland and forgotten. Everything was off the shore, cities in the distance and everything already worn out, including them.

‘We could’ve made it a long time ago.

Look, don’t look at me this way.

You’ve already failed to make your living that way. And this? This is just another failure, another dying beast that was your idea to keep driving.

Have you not poisoned it enough already? What is the point of dragging it along?’

‘We could make something out of it, still.’

‘That line was the point where your naivety should’ve died. Move on, grow up, abandon it while we’re still going.’

A few more meters in the front, past the broken hill, and into the surrounding stone verge, where the sky blended with grays and greens, forming muddy colors.

‘Neither of us can help it, but at least we can still abandon it out there. No one will even think to look into the black coffins, no one will dig into them.’

But at the same time neither of them realized they were in one as well. There was no sun and no meaning, only a painted. It didn’t matter. Both of them still carried off the burden, shared between the two of them, through pastoral plains.

‘All this talk but nonsense, meaningless blabber.

You’re filling both of our minds with empty thoughts.’

‘It’s not my fault I can’t remember anything.’

‘Liar.’

‘On command, I can’t remember anything on command.’

‘Then what’s the point then?

What is my name then, can you remember that?’

‘Mouse Greendot, I think.’

‘Great enough, is that easy enough for you to remember?’

‘I don’t know.’

They listened to music, it was a bland soundtrack, which held no basis in reality. It was something less symphonic as well as it was ethereal. Blurred out in some way, as sight, but painted on missing walls. First house was not long after. It was unoccupied by the previous tenants, other than what seemed to be the entry to a long tunnel which lead from inside the rustic house to that town. But it was unsafe.

‘Now we have your break.

Why do you even want to do this any longer?

What’s the point?

Neither of us can enjoy what we’ve done now, can we?

It’s our little sandbox filled with insect and metal-dust rubbing you the wrong way. Care to explain to me when the next stop is?’

He looked outside and didn’t stall before he came through.

‘This small house, does it make you uncomfortable?’

Mouse said.

After a while, Red-Black Marker seemed to asses that there was a second floor.

There was a second floor somewhere out there as well, floating around the air. Not like this one, but something was in it. Anything, it could’ve been anything.

‘Don’t think too hard now, go on, get to the second floor and tell me what’s up there.’

Front, first row of stairs caught in the wall, right, another set of stairs which made the first one look as if it was on the right. Green Mouse looking in the opposite direction, then the door to the other floor. A simple room, at least by the looks of it, there was a wooden floor and many ceramics, one in particular cracked. And there used to be a chair somewhere, only signaled by a small mark of dust.

There was nothing up there worth picking.

‘Hope you’re happy wasting your time there.’

‘I don’t really care now.’

Can we go somewhere else?’

‘No, we’ll stay here until I’ll have had my satisfaction.

I can’t waste more time mourning, I can’t go on the same with either of your wrong-doings. I can’t stand it, I simply had enough of it, do you understand?’

‘Can we please leave?’

I don’t like it in here.’

‘Do you want to go outside then? Do you want to leave?’

‘No, I don’t want to leave, but I want to do something else.’

‘Who’s stopping you then?’

‘Won’t you come with me?’

We’re partners.’

He didn’t respond. How many hours should it be now? Another failure, it was pointless.

‘Think you can do better this time around?’

‘There’s nothing left to say, is it?’

Another pair of minutes fell by.

‘Why did the Greeks practice pederasty?’

‘Why don’t you put a gun in your mouth?’

‘Let’s go.’

A sun doesn’t need to exist on its own as long as there’s white paint on the walls.

‘We seriously need to keep carrying a knife with us.’

‘Good plant.’

‘I’m serious, Green. I’m serious about this. We could use a knife, both of us.’

‘What’s stopping you?’

